For example, it is figured that the same amount of damage could have been inflicted on Hiroshima by the use of about 325 tons of high explosive and 1,000 tons of incendiary bombs. What makes the atom bomb unique is the overwhelming nature of its destructiveness. This is especially true where incendiary effects are concerned.

The intense heat waves I mentioned earlier can cause fires. Remember how we put up those black-out curtains in air-raid drills during the last war? Well, in Japan, the heat radiation from the bomb caused thin, dark cotton cloth such as used for block-out curtains to catch fire up to six-tenths of a mile from the zero point. Some thin paper and dry-rotted wood also began to blaze at this distance.

On the whole, however, it is believed that relatively few of the large and numerous fires that left much of the two Japanese cities in ashes were caused by the heat waves.

In fact, there is evidence that close to the explosion, the terrific blast waves following a few seconds behind the heat radiation actually may have snuffed out some of the fires started by the heat waves.

What seems more probable is that most of the fires started from other or secondary causes. These would include upsetting of stoves, electrical short circuits, broken gas lines, and so forth. In several cases in Japan, industrial plants were set ablaze when the blast overturned furnaces and boilers.

Once these major fires have started, several things help it spread and fast. The blast breaks windows, collapses roofs and walls, blows in fire shutters, thus making all types of structures vulnerable to the spread of fire and to starting of blazes inside fire-resistant buildings. Burning brands from nearby buildings enter through these openings.

Firebreaks were of little avail in the two Japanese cities except around the edges of the "lost area." One trouble was that fires started at once on both sides of the firebreaks. Combustible material frequently was blown across the firebreaks by the blast of the explosion.

But there were some cases where firebreaks did help. The weapons effects people say that if the breaks had been wider—say a hundred feet or more—fewer buildings might have been destroyed by fire.

There are some ways in which an atomic blast actually hinders the development of fires. For example, when frame houses are completely collapsed and blown down, they do not burn as rapidly. Noncombustible debris sometimes covered material that would have ignited easily.

There are two serious problems to be faced by the fire fighter.

One is the loss of men and equipment and the second is failure of water supply.

In Hiroshima, some 70 percent of the fire-fighting equipment was crushed in collapse of fire houses. Four out of every five firemen were unable to go into action.

I think we have better dispersal of equipment in most of our cities, but this dispersal certainly is a factor to be considered in planning future preparations against possible atomic warfare.

In both of the Japanese cities, the water supply failed. This was not because many underground mains were broken or because the pumping stations were hit.

The pressure went out rapidly because most water lines above ground were broken by collapsing buildings and by heat from fires which melted the pipes.

Water lines crossing a bridge in the "lost zone" also are in great danger of being broken as the bridge is distorted or collapsed.

Another problem which perhaps can be tackled more efficiently in most American cities is clearing paths through the debris to permit fire companies to get to their targets.

We know now, that in an overhead burst, it is reasonably safe for the fireman and his equipment to push in right after the explosion.

We do not have to worry too much about radiation. But at Nagasaki, one fire company from an area that escaped destruction was not able to get within a mile and a quarter of the target point because of debris that piled up in the streets.

We know a good deal more now about what is called fire storms. About 20 minutes after the bomb went off over Hiroshima, a wind began blowing toward the burning area and reached a velocity of from 30 to 40 miles an hour.

This kept up for 2 or 3 hours, decreasing to light or moderate winds varying in direction about 6 hours later. This wind was accompanied by intermittent rain over the center of Hiroshima.

Now, because of this strong inward draft at ground level, the fire storm proved to be a decisive factor in confining the fire to the area where fires had broken out immediately following the bomb burst.

Within that area, however, virtually everything that could burn, did burn.

Similar fire storms have been reported after incendiary bomb attacks in both Germany and Japan and in large fires in the United States.

However, these fire storms depend on conditions existing at the time the bomb is exploded. There was no definite storm over Nagasaki, which was much more hilly than Hiroshima.

There the fire tended to rush up valleys, aided by a 35-mile wind which developed about 2 hours after the blast.

The experts figure that the small number of houses exposed in the long, narrow valley running through Nagasaki probably did not furnish sufficient fuel to whip up a fire storm.

In all this discussion of fire effects, it must have become plain to you that many of the casualties from atomic bomb explosions are going to be flame burns, the same kind of burns that would be received in any ordinary fire and flash burns from the heat waves.

In an atomic attack the number of casualties may be far greater than in any disaster that we have had to cope with in our country.

It is believed that burns, both from the immediate intense heat waves and the fires that developed were responsible for more than half of the fatal casualties at Hiroshima and Nagasaki and perhaps three out of every four of all casualties.

The magnitude of this problem points to the urgent necessity for making plans to deal with thousands of burned patients in event of an emergency.

And that leads me to the third point I wish to stress here today—your responsibility as a citizen.

First, it is evident that volunteering for civil-defense work is an absolute necessity.

Secondly, it is of prime importance that such volunteers become skilled at first-aid work by taking refresher courses.

Third, every possible assistance should be given in encouraging the Red Cross blood-bank program.

And finally, we should learn all we can about atomic energy in its various phases.

I have been talking about the A-bomb and its potentialities. Whether or not you realize it, some of our scientists could accuse me of talking about a puny bomb and about a civilian defense program that may become obsolete overnight. It is not my intention to alarm you, but I feel that before I conclude, I should tell you that if the scientist's calculations are correct, almost every measure taken to protect a city against an A-bomb of conventional type would be useless against a hydrogen bomb.

Most scientists figure that an H-bomb will be almost 1,000 times as powerful as an A-bomb.

This type of bomb would have an explosive effect of 20,000,000 tons of TNT.

To explode the H-bomb it will require 1,000,000° of heat, and flash burns from this type of bomb might be expected within a radius up to 20 miles from the point of explosion.

As I said, it is not my intention to alarm you about the H-bomb, but such a bomb is in the making, for experts are working on it as fast as possible.

In conclusion, nearly 100 scientists, technicians, editors, and reviewers, when they had finished putting their data together, looked back over the 450 pages of this book and then wrote:

"It will be evident that adequate protection against the effects of an atomic bomb will require very comprehensive and detailed planning. Such planning will be necessary to avoid panic.

"Mass hysteria could convert a minor incident into a major disaster * * * the organization, preparation, and techniques designed to deal with these situations * * * are * * * beyond the scope of this book.

"Their precise nature depends upon many factors which must be evaluated nationally. Their application will vary with the pattern of regional and community development."

It is stated on the basis of our experience at Hiroshima and Nagasaki, should a single atomic bomb be released over Pittsburgh, it seems highly unrealistic to prepare for less than forty to fifty thousand casualties.

The Atomic Energy Commission has estimated that the ideal treatment for just 1 severely burned victim of the atomic bomb would demand 42 tanks of oxygen, 8 nurses, nearly 3 miles of bandages, and nearly 40 pints of whole blood.

Therefore, gentlemen, it behooves us to learn all we can about atomic energy, because the A-bomb is a new weapon of great destructive power, and knowledge of an atomic explosion is of vital importance to all of us.

Views of a Constituent Concerning the Critical War Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. REES
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker, in line with a request heretofore granted by the House I am including the contents of a letter from a constituent in my district. This letter is from an outstanding, responsible citizen. He is a businessman; he is also an educator. He commands the respect of the people in the community where he lives.

The writer of the letter gave permission to publish his statement. He did not ask that his name be withheld, but to include his name would serve no purpose. I believe the membership will be interested in the expression of his views.

JULY 26, 1950.

Hon. EDWARD REES,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.:

This communication is going to be somewhat different from some you have received from me. I am angry, disappointed, disgusted, and simply furious at Congress. And it seems to me there is good justification for this attitude. There may be a critical situation which makes it necessary for Congress to say to the boys who have enlisted during the last 2 years "no matter what your agreement may have been at the time you enlisted we are going to tell you how long you are to serve." The situation may be that serious. If it is then the boys can take it. However, if the situation is that serious it is time that Congress get serious about some other matters. Why not say to the leaches, bloodsuckers, and parasites who are making money out of this situation that you are not going to get rich while these boys are rendering such service to their Government. There are only two reasons why Congress does not immediately freeze prices and wages. One of these is that some Congressmen fear that it might cost them a few votes. The other is that some Congressmen have financial interests from which they will profit by a rapid upsurge in prices.

In the long run it will be the very boys who have been frozen in military service who will pay the cost of the increased prices about which Congress does not seem to be concerned. After these boys have served 4 or 5 years some of them may get back to civilian life. When they do they will find prices out of all reason and a debt created by the purchase of military supplies at greatly increased prices about which Congress was not concerned and they will pay the bill. That is they will pay part of it and pass the rest on to their children. Yet the bill to freeze these enlisted men in the service was passed without anyone raising the question about excess profits and inflated prices. No wonder Stalin looks upon America as being weak.

This communication does not require an answer. In fact, I hope you do not answer it because to try to explain such attitude on the part of Congress would increase my contempt at Congress which is more concerned about partisan politics than it is about the welfare of America in a time of crisis.

Yours truly,

Los Angeles County Leads the Way to Expose Communists

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to announce that the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors of which I was a member for 11 years before being elected to Congress has taken a bold and patriotic step to expose communism by passing an ordinance requiring all Communists in the county to register with the sheriff or suffer the penalty of a $500 fine or imprisonment or both.

Los Angeles with a population of more than 4,000,000 does not propose to allow the Communists to operate underground to demoralize its citizens with its un-American schemes and deception to overthrow our form of government without knowing who they are, where they live, and where they work.

I am proud of my former colleagues. They are the kind of good, sound, fearless American public officials that all of us can be proud of. The action they have taken should, and I hope will, stimulate other city, county, and State officials throughout the United States to take similar action against Communists in their communities.

I further hope that this action by the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors will encourage and stimulate action by the Congress to speed up approval of similar legislation on the Federal level which has been reported by the un-American Activities Committee.

We must come to the sharp realization that the Communists are playing for keeps and are using every constitutional right under our form of government to take this Government over by force and violence if necessary just as they are now trying to do in Korea.

I am proud to represent a part of Los Angeles County, and I am confident that the city of Los Angeles and the other cities in the county will soon adopt a similar ordinance to expose and reveal all Communists.

Puerto Rico

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. FERNÓS-ISERN
RESIDENT COMMISSIONER FROM PUERTO RICO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. FERNÓS-ISERN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at San Juan, P. R., on July 4, 1950:

ADDRESS GIVEN BY DR. A. FERNÓS-ISERN, RESIDENT COMMISSIONER OF PUERTO RICO, IN SAN JUAN, P. R., ON JULY 4, 1950

Last May 21 marked the fiftieth anniversary of civil government under the United States flag in Puerto Rico. Today, therefore, marks the passing of half a century since we first celebrated the glorious date of the Fourth of July in Puerto Rico under American civil government. I have deliberately chosen the term "American civil government," because Puerto Rico had civil government before 1900. Until the time when the military government of occupation took over in 1898, Puerto Rico had a civil government as a Province of the Spanish Monarchy.

And in the last year of the most critical period of our history—the 30-year period from 1868 to 1898—the Spanish Province of Puerto Rico had a civil government under an autonomous regime, an autonomous civil government within the framework of the political system of which it was a part.

However, it is my historical interpretation that, in the course of time, the guiding lines of that autonomous regime would necessarily have led to a final separation of Puerto Rico from the system in which we originated. Puerto Rico was destined, regardless of the Spanish-American War, to be wholly integrated into the political and social world of America as inexorably benefits our geographic position and our ideological position. Puerto Rico is a part of America; America signifies a new era in the world, a new way of life in the progressive evolution of humanity by way of liberty and justice.

Thus, for 50 years July 4 has been celebrated in Puerto Rico as its own. Fifty years ago Puerto Rico entered rightfully into the social and political life of America, from which up to that time it had been isolated. The historical process which was inevitable, our separation from Europe, was realized suddenly by the Spanish-American War. Since then Puerto Rico has been adjusting itself to its new position as a clearly and definitely American people.

Historical events are not improvised. The development of America, of Christian civilization in America, of human freedom in America, have not been the result of a spontaneous and sudden explosion, without antecedents or determining causes. There has been no event which surprised us as if it had been controlled by the fiat of a superhuman power.

History is like a tree, it develops from the seed; like a river which flows through mountain canyons, which thunderingly disgorges itself in cataracts over the rocks, which splashes down the cliffs to find the levels of the sea; then flows serenely and ripplingly across the coastlands to the sea. It emerges from the deep recesses of the mountain whence it came, as a tree rises from a seed to extend its branches to the sky. There is a subterranean relationship among all trees; they feed from the same soil; their roots interlace in the subsoil and absorb together the nourishment of mother earth. There is a heavenly relationship among all rivers; they spring from the same earth; in the same sky the clouds soar which, turning into rain, penetrate to the subsoil, and there unite again and come to the surface to swell the rivers.

The people established in America have their roots in the same European historical base; they receive their ideological inspiration from the sky of America. They warm themselves under the same sun of freedom and arrive eventually in the course of time at the same free and constitutional life.

If trees celebrated anniversaries, they would celebrate the anniversary of the first seed. If rivers were to celebrate anniversaries, they would celebrate the anniversary of the first rain. The people of America celebrate together the 12th of October, the date on which Columbus planted the seed of western civilization in the New World. Together they celebrate and should celebrate the Fourth of July, when the bell at Philadelphia announced the enjoyment of the first rain of liberty on American soil.

Because of that event, the regime of civil government in Puerto Rico had to be free, republican, democratic, American. Today we can celebrate this fiftieth anniversary in Puerto Rico as one of the glorious resonances which, within the limits of America, has followed the ringing of its bell at Philadelphia when it announced the first rain of liberty. Our civil government had to be American. It had to originate, not in sovereign grant, but in the recognition of the principles enunciated on July 4, 1776. That was the mother document. From Philadelphia the peal of the bell expanded in the waves of the air until it was repeated 20 times throughout the enormous continental expanse south of the Rio Grande. In fact, the ideas expressed in the document signed on July 4, 1776, had repercussions not only throughout the New World, but in truth throughout the universe. Recently, in San Francisco, in solemn convention, representatives of all the people of the globe came together again to reaffirm the declaration proposed by the United States of America, signed by all the other nations of the world, and found in chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations. Chapter XI of the Charter says:

"Members of the United Nations which have or assume responsibilities for the administration of territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government recognize the principle that the interests of the inhabitants of these territories are paramount, and accept as a sacred trust the obligation to promote to the utmost, within the system of international peace and security established by the present Charter, the well-being of the inhabitants of these territories, and to this end:

"a. To insure, with due respect for the culture of the peoples concerned, their political, economic, social, and educational advancement, their just treatment, and their protection against abuses; and

"b. To develop self-government, to take due account of the political aspirations of the peoples, and to assist them in the progressive development of their free political institutions, according to the particular circumstances of each territory and its peoples and their varying stages of advancement."

Thus there was not a corner of the world where the influence of the fundamental document whose adoption we are celebrating did not reach.

Civil government in Puerto Rico had to be rooted in July 4, 1776. And from today it will represent with greater spirit the principles enunciated in Philadelphia and reaffirmed in San Francisco. The historical roots of the nations of the south have been nourished for more than a century by the same nourishment as those of the north. The people of Puerto Rico, in spite of the ocean which separates us, have found a way of entwining their roots with the great Nation of the continent where the liberty of America originated.

We call this date of July 4, generally, the Day of Independence of the United States. But, I ask if this so brief qualification adequately describes the significance of that day. To be sure, on July 4, 1776, the end of England's authority over the Thirteen Colonies was proclaimed. To be sure, the Thirteen Colonies from that day on ceased to depend on the authority of England. But this is only one aspect of the event. The Thirteen Colonies ceased to depend on England, but not in order to languish in a political vacuum. Ceasing to depend is but one condition for the affirmative, positive work which was to be initiated. Involved here was not only a separation for the sake of separation, and nothing but a separation.

History is full of separations, pacific or violent, voluntary or forced, which settle a conflict or create a bigger one; which liberate a nation or a civilization, or cripple a nation or a civilization; which permit a healthy development of the people or suck the lifeblood of the people. Separation was not the only significance of July 4, 1776. More than anything else it was the date on which it was stated that only that government is legitimate which derives from the consent of the governed; that all men are free; that man and the authority of man is the source of the legitimate authority of governments. That is the great affirmative significance of July 4, 1776.

On the basis of these affirmations, 13 Colonies were converted into 13 free States—13 States composed of freemen. Thirteen nations broke their political relations with a government to which they had not given their consent to be governed; with a government which had attempted to function against the consent of the people it governed. The independence of the Thirteen Colonies from England was, then, nothing but a necessity, a necessary condition in order to make possible the establishment of the principle of government based upon the consent of the people.

If England had recognized the right of the Thirteen Colonies to their own government; if England had recognized the principle of government by consent; if England had listened to the conciliatory and eloquent words of her own Burke in the British Parliament, and to the temperate words of the colonists in their long, unheeded claims, separation would have been neither necessary nor desirable. It would have been possible to develop some media of mutual understanding and harmony within the traditional and historical union of the English peoples.

Having learned by experience, England has long understood this, and has created forms for living in freedom and partnership with other peoples. Today, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand form with Great Britain a great federation of free nations. No doubt, the course of history would have been different if, at that earlier time, instead of Lord North there had been at the head of the British Government a man inspired by the principles which it was vital to maintain in the trials of a long war; at Bunker Hill, at Valley Forge, and at Yorktown.

Once the separation was consummated, the fundamental affirmative work began. Each of the Thirteen Colonies was converted into a society of free men and into a sovereign state. Each adopted immediately, for itself, its own written constitution, affirming and preserving the principle of legitimate government with the consent of the governed.

Those who have visited Monticello, the gracious home of the author of the Declaration of Independence of the United States, the home of Thomas Jefferson, have seen to the right of the road which leads to the top of the hill, the tomb of that illustrious sage. His epitaph written by him, reads: "Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence of the United States, author of the Declaration of Religious Freedom in the Constitution of Virginia, founder of the University of Virginia."

There is a deep philosophical lesson in that epitaph. When Jefferson inscribed it shortly before his death, he had already been Governor of Virginia, Minister to France, Secretary of State of the United States, Vice President, President of the United States. But, so far as he was concerned, the offices which he had held in the service of his country were not the most important thing in his life. The real measure of the magnitude of his services to his country, the matter of real significance for him, was that he had taken part in eliminating the obstacles which stood in the way of the freedom of the people; that he wrote for America its democratic charter; that he had written, for his people of Virginia, in their fundamental document, the affirmation that the people gave themselves their religious freedom and, moreover, that under a government thus created by the consent of the people of Virginia, there could be established, and was established, a center of knowledge, education and culture, the basis of civilization, the foundation of spiritual liberty. In these aspects of the life of Jefferson are embraced the basic factors of the life of freedom. Elimination of obstacles to freedom, affirmation of the principle of government based on the consent of the people, spiritual liberty. For the enjoyment of this freedom, for the expansion and liberation of the spirit—the university.

Liberty lives neither within itself nor in an atmosphere of abstractions. It must live in the reality of the hearts of men. Man must conserve and defend it against all odds. Liberty has at all times been menaced by tyranny, on the one hand, and by demagoguery and anarchy, on the other. Only in a constitutional democracy is liberty secure. If each of the 13 small republics, because of provincial spirit, had buried itself in local and hermetically sealed individualism; if the Catholic of Maryland had not been willing to live with the Puritan of Massachusetts, with the Episcopalian of Virginia, with the Quaker of Pennsylvania; if, in order to justify this local spirit, the differences of social organization in each of these 13 republics had been emphasized instead of the common interests of these republics; if the petty ambitions of their people had caused them to insist not only on separation from England in order to remove obstacles to liberty, but on remaining separated from each other in the name of liberty, they would have endangered their liberty and not protected it. Their liberty would not have been surrounded by security, but they would have been exposed to the grave danger of losing it. They would never have been able to achieve the present greatness of their liberty, of our liberty.

England from Canada, France from Louisiana, Spain from Florida, would have been able to make easy prey, political or economic of these fragile republics. Russia, years later, began her advance along the Pacific coast and managed to begin establishments in California.

What did the great men of those small republics do? Were they fearful of the perils of liberty? They were not afraid. Expose liberty to weakness? They did not expose it. Create an authority superior to the people, which under the pretext of protecting liberty would have been able to destroy it, resulting in a dictatorship? They did not sow the seed of dictatorship. They appealed to reason and common sense. They appealed to the federative idea, to the principle of local government within a general solidarity. In addition to a constitution for each State they adopted a Constitution for the common welfare of all the States.

They tried articles of confederation. Based on the experience thus acquired they took another step forward and created the Union of States and a Federal Government of the 13 States. They then adopted the wonderful document which is called the Constitution of the United States of America.

They did not copy federative forms of any of the other countries; they did not don a suit which was not made to their specific measurements. They adopted that formula which suited their own particular circumstances. They did this with all wisdom. In the normal expansion of population toward the territory of the West, till then uninhabited, the human societies which were being born—the daughters of the 13 original States—were forming additional States, all with the same individual and general rights.

Thus, the work of colonization in the northern region of the New World, which was begun by the Pilgrims of the Mayflower and continued under Penn and Lord Calvert, was continued after the separation from England. The federation of the States was extending its democratic institutions in equal step with the colonization of those virgin territories. From the original 13 States the Union grew to 48. Besides, Alaska and Hawaii have been formed and await statehood recognition. The colonizing process of the pioneers was not stopped by the ice or snow of the North or by the waters of the sea. It continued to the Bering Straits and the islands of the Pacific.

In meeting here today to commemorate the anniversary of important events in the history of mankind, let us, the people of Puerto Rico, see what lessons these events have for us. We may discover how in the course of history the roots of our civilization are linked with those events, and how these principles are embedded in the spirit of our people. We may see in what form these events have affected our ordered and peaceful progress.

The separation of our people, like the separation of the 13 Colonies from the respective European nations in which we had our origin, was written in the Book of prophecies, in the book of the things that were bound to happen. Betances saw this, as did Ruiz Belvis and Hostos. But there was written—and they saw it also—the necessity for the integration of these peoples into a greater unit in America.

Hostos and Betances visualized the entry of Puerto Rico into an Antilles confederation which would strengthen the international political life of the weak people of this chain of Caribbean Islands. Before them, Bolivar, of broader vision, aspired to no less than a hemispheric federation. The history of the New World, and above all, the history of the Spanish-American countries, would have been different if the dream of Bolivar had come true. Bolivar died believing that he had plowed in the sea. Indeed, his dream did not come true in his lifetime, but the idea has remained. Today, enlightened men of the North and enlightened men of the South have joined in the organization of the American states, and thus have started a gradual progress toward the political integration of democracy throughout America. In Puerto Rico, after its separation from its country of origin (an ancient nation which still struggles to find its way towards democratic life), there is no doubt that we have found channels to make possible our democratic development and our integration with America. Since 1900, these channels have been offered us in ever increasing width. Therefore, now, at the end of a half century of gradual progress, not only are we commemorating here that half century of progress, not only are we commemorating the anniversary of the great independence of the United States of which we are a part, but we are commemorating another event which is of vital importance in the life of our people, so recent that it could be said that it is taking place at this very moment.

Today, before the statue of Victory, which symbolizes our contribution to the defense of democracy during World War I, the veterans of former days take part in this celebration and see and hear us together, with the veterans of World War II, in which, with the same objecti e as before, the Puerto Ricans also participated. Young people hear us, for whom it may be necessary for a third time with the same or greater enthusiasm to offer their lives so that democracy may not perish from this earth.

Therefore, before this statue of Victory, before this symbol of our dedication to the cause of democracy, with the veterans of the past and future, we are celebrating today not only the proclamation of the principle of government by the consent of the 13 colonies, not only the extension of that principle to the rest of the continent, not only our entrance into the civil life of America, but also the fact that 4 days ago the Congress of the United States passed a law extending to the people of Puerto Rico that same right, that same principle, that government has to come from the consent of the governed. Yesterday July 3, 1950, the President of the United States approved this bill.

Indeed it is no longer a bill, it is an effective law. Puerto Rico is today, as we gather here, authorized to set up itself as it wishes, its own constitution freely established. The system of civil government of Puerto Rico is rooted definitively in the Fourth of July 1776, and is nourished from the same waters which run beneath the surface of the land of America; laws made fertile and blessed by the rain of liberty with the declaration made in Philadelphia, 174 years ago. In peace, in happiness, in the spirit of fraternity, our people will now determine whether it will have a government of its own creation; whether it wishes likewise to write a constitution which will give form to its political and social life; whether it wishes as did the people of Virginia, to write into it as should be written into it, a guaranty for freedom of spirit. And this with the profound satisfaction of the people who wrote the Declaration of July 4, 1776, who in 1898 accelerated the course of the history of Puerto Rico for our more rapid integration into the life of America, and who this last week accelerated their own legislative proceedings so that on this day we could celebrate in Puerto Rico the recognition of this basic principle of political liberty.

The attitude of the people of the United States toward Puerto Rico was expressed by the House Committee on Public Lands, United States Congress, in its report in connection with the bill relating to constitutional government. It says, among other things:

"By permitting the people of Puerto Rico to formulate, and by its own initiative and decision, to adopt a constitution, the bill would implement to the highest degree the principle of self-government established by the Congress as the cornerstone, as the fundamental policy, which governs the relationship of the United States toward the territories under its jurisdiction.

"Furthermore, it would fulfill in the most outstanding form our obligations with respect to Puerto Rico under chapter XI of the charter of the United Nations relative to the administration of territories which have no government of their own."

Here the report quotes the text of the Charter of the United Nations, to which I have just referred and which thus has been incorporated specifically in our political history. I wish to repeat the words in order that they may penetrate our minds:

"To develop its own government, duly taking into account the political aspirations of the people and to aid them in the progressive development of their free political institutions, in accord with the particular circumstances of each territory and of its people and its various stages of development."

It has been clearly stated by the Congress of the United States that it recognizes its obligations as trustee with respect to Puerto Rico. It has evidenced its willingness to listen to the voice of Puerto Rico, concerning its political aspirations. It has proclaimed its readiness to aid us in the progressive development of our democratic institutions, taking into account the particular circumstances of Puerto Rico. This without forcing or imposing formulas upon us; least of all, if they are anachronisms, or not adaptable to our present circumstances, if they might jeopardize the very progress made or place obligations which are beyond the strength of our people.

Eloquent proof of the fact that Congress listens to our voice and takes into account our political aspirations is the approval of the bill which establishes in Puerto Rico a government by consent when and as presented to the Congress by the Representative of Puerto Rico, who was elected by the voters of Puerto Rico and who spoke in that Congress in the name of Puerto Rico. He went before the Congress to endorse the bill, with the indisputable support given to him by the highest leader of our people, Mr. Luis Muñoz Marín, Governor of Puerto Rico by the vote of the people; elected by the people to serve them. He proclaimed this principle of democratic government within this federative formula for Puerto Rico on another Fourth of July, as on this one, on July 4, 1948.

Without sacrifice on our part and with sacrifice on theirs, in 1898 the United States eliminated from our path the ancient obstacles to our democracy. That was the moment of our separation from Spain, as 1776 was the moment that the 13 colonies separated from England. For us it was free from the grief of violent battle such as the people of the United States had to endure during their struggle for emancipation. Puerto Rico after its period of adjustment, now enters into the democratic constitutional life of America, as gallant and pure as a youth entering the temple to take his first communion. It is the communion of liberty in the temple of American solidarity.

The period of separation is behind us. We are now in the era of integration. To enter this stage, instead of receiving the bullets which the American people received at Bunker Hill, cordial hearings were held by the Committees of the Congress. We did not have to suffer the inclemency of a winter at Valley Forge; the bill progressed rapidly through the legislative process which all bills must undergo. It sped through with extraordinary speed.

Instead of a surrender at Yorktown and bitterness and resentment, the air is filled with the echo of the applause which expresses the gratitude of Puerto Rico to its noble friends in the Congress, some of whom are present here with us, and share our joy with us. To the Government officials, and to all the people of the United States we express our thanks also. Today more than ever echoes in the bosoms of the Puerto Ricans the feeling of solidarity, of the union between the people of Puerto Rico and the people of the United States, within the patriotic solidarity of our common citizenship.

In consideration of all foregoing, who can have doubt about the future? Puerto Rico will go forward, uphill, along the road of liberty and democracy, along the road of progress and civilization, into the American community, enlightened at all times by the spirit of dedication to human rights, freedom of man, and self-determination; in harmony, in agreement, in accord, under a compact which makes us part of the great independency of America, of the freedom of man all over this earth. For the first time since its foundation—for the first time in the 442 years which have passed since Ponce de León began the history of Puerto Rico with the founding of this noble city of San Juan—our people will be living under a government which they have given to themselves; under a government of their own creation, under a government democratic not only in form but also in origin. Instead of living under a government they will live with a government, with their own government, created to serve them.

The Congress says: "By this law you are invited to assume full authority over yourself. Until now you have been told how to govern yourself. But from today, although the Federal Government will remain in charge of the functions which are entrusted to it by the Union, you may create your own local domestic government as though you were a State in the Union. You may create your local and interior government as though you were an independent republic. This, provided you do it in a democratic and republican way."

As to local and domestic government there is not, nor need there be, any difference between a republican State, member of a federation, and an independent State with a republican government. Note that the Independentista and the advocate of statehood, apparently such opposites, find a common denominator, the common denominator of the constitution, republican in form as provided by the law. This constitution will be of the same nature as the constitution of a State of the federation; of the same nature as the constitution of an independent State.

First of all, when deciding upon one or the other, the independent or the federated State, if we had to go into the one or the other, on the basis of the present organic act, we would have had to begin by adopting a constitution of republican character like that for the government of a State or the government of a separate republic.

A State of the Union is a republic united with other republics, all grouped around a federal government of their own creation. An independent republic is a state which has not united with other states to create a federal government. By the adoption of this constitution, Puerto Rico will not have become a member State of the federation, within the Union of States. Nor will it have become an independent State, separate from the other States. Instead, it will exist as if it were a State or as if it were a Republic, linked to the Union by citizenship and having a relationship to the Federal Government as prescribed by the statute of relations in a form suited to its circumstances. Puerto Rico will not have assumed the responsibilities of the unfortunate international life of our day. Nor will it participate in the Federal Government to a greater extent than at present. But with the same obligations toward the Federal Government it has today, it will acquire the attributes of a free and democratic people within the great democratic and free systems of the freest and most democratic nation on earth.

Considering the just attitude of the Congress and the people of the United States toward us, who would be willing to reject this law, and why?

Let those few, who still sleep in a hammock suspended for 50 years from the stump of isolated independence on one side and the stump of unattainable statehood on the other, let them awake and see that it is not these stumps which are sprouting today as yet. I invite them to hang their hammock under the shade of the tree which sprouts into this new concept of a life of liberty in confederation. In its shade they may hope, if they wish, that one of these days one of the two stumps may sprout if this should be our desire. Let those recall this who unpremeditatedly have declared themselves against the law, as if it would deprive them of something, as if it did not mean much to them. Let those think about it who have opposed the law for party pettiness.

Let me say to the people of Puerto Rico, in this solemn moment of our lives, that we must not believe that today there are either victorious or defeated parties in Puerto Rico. Nor do I want to claim any personal triumph of any sort in this story of civilization. I am saying, rather, that the advocates of statehood for Puerto Rico, although in a minority, are partially triumphant because with this law half of their program—the Republican Constitution of the State—has been realized through men of the majority. Let me say also that he who aspires to independence, though in a minority, is also triumphant in part because he sees half of his program realized through men of the majority—the Democratic Constitution of Puerto Rico. It is clear that it was not necessary to resort to the independent Republic of Puerto Rico in order to have a Republican Constitution of Puerto Rico.

Neither of the two has gained everything. Neither has lost anything.

There is a great victory in all of this. It is not a victory of parties. It is the victory of the people, of all the people of Puerto Rico—of the people who have overcome their blindness of generations, the mistakes of many years' standing. Prevented for years from going forward by the disputes among those who had pulled in opposite directions, the people have found the middle road leading to the north along which we can advance together. If we who have shown the way deserve any credit, it is this; the fact of showing the way; of having seen the way and having dared to travel it first. Let us all march along the road together.

Who knows if at the end of that journey the changes, which are today going on in the world structure in general and in the hemispheric structure in particular, and above all, the natural evolution of this new federative formula, will have made the old dilemma disappear from the minds of all, as unrealistic. On earth, events may occur which are just as portentous as those which occur in the sky. Things may occur on earth as if its north star and the southern cross were united in the heavens and joined into one constellation.

Let us all march uphill together. We have already made great headway uphill. There are still some who resist. These resist, because they do not wish to rise up by walking, they wish to rise up by jumping or flying. Let them consider whether they have the strength to leap; let them consider whether they have the wings to fly.

But, because there are impatient people or because there are obsessed people; because there are those who cannot fly and will not walk, and those that, if they cannot jump, prefer to remain still. Do not stay still. Do not knock your heads against the wall. Do not fall flat on your face.

The people will continue uphill, their minds filled with the light of understanding; in their breasts the dignity of freemen: in their hands, fashioned by their hands, their own constitution.

Why Has the United States Air Force Chosen the Los Angeles Area as a Potential Military Target?

REMARKS

HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Chairman, at a time when we are engaged in a war with Russia through the backdoor by way of Korea, the United States Air Force has released for publication in the metropolitan newspapers of Los Angeles an aerial photograph which clearly identifies the major potential military targets in the Los Angeles-San Fernando Valley area.

Why was release of this vital military information permitted by President Truman as Commander in Chief of our Armed Forces? Why has Secretary of Defense Johnson permitted release of this graphic survey of Los Angeles?

The photograph of the Los Angeles area appeared in the papers described as "believed to be the highest aerial photograph ever taken from a reconnaissance" and "was taken from the Nation's newest camera plane."

Well if the Russians do not have the plane or photographic equipment capable of duplicating the work of our Air Force, they need have no regrets. With release of this picture no Russian plane is necessary for reconnaissance over the Los Angeles area. The American Air Force has done the work and in spite of the present hostilities has failed to exercise the most elementary security precaution to prevent material of military value from falling into the hands of a potential enemy of the United States.

I have demanded a full report from the Air Force. The people of Los Angeles are entitled to an explanation, and I am going to see that they get it.

With the constant threat of Communist aggression poised over our land, a threat which would never have grown to such alarming proportions if the administration had not bungled our foreign policy continually since the end of World War II, and if President Truman had not insisted upon placing and keeping men in the highest positions of our Government, in charge of our foreign policy and our national defense, for personal and political motives rather than in the best interests of the future welfare of our Nation.

If the United States is to be preserved, we certainly must have a change in administrative policy and have it now. We cannot afford to present potential enemies of our country with vital information whether through lack of proper security measures in our Armed Forces or through the employment of subversives like Alger Hiss in our Government agencies and departments.

Publication of the aerial photograph of Los Angeles released by the Air Force is just one of too many incidents which have occurred and continue to occur which threaten the security of all our citizens because of inefficiency and indifference of the administration.

Panama Canal Reorganization Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN F. SHELLEY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. SHELLEY. Mr. Speaker, since long before coming to Congress in January of this year, I have been greatly concerned with the problem of revitalizing the United States merchant marine and the maritime industry as a whole. I have addressed this House at length on some aspects of the problem and have been working in committee and as an individual Congressman, in every way possible, to develop a program which will insure that we do maintain a shipping industry capable of supporting a proportionate segment of our economy at all times, and, of meeting the water transport needs of the Nation in any emergency which may confront us.

In order for the industry to be in that position we must not only have a fleet for use in overseas water traffic but also, and of almost equal importance, ships, facilities, and personnel for operations in coastal, intercoastal, and inland waters to handle our domestic traffic. In considering H. R. 8677 we have an opportunity to take action which will not only promote realization of that objective, but which will also react favorably on all segments of industry and agriculture which now make use of, or can make use of, over-water transportation passing through the Panama Canal. Passage of H. R. 8677 will also act to insure redevelopment of west coast shipping operations, now deplorably lacking by stimulating shipments originating in west coast ports, and passing through the Canal bound for the east coast and other points, and also of shipments terminating on the west coast. This stimulation must be provided if we are to have a maritime industry with its facilities and personnel properly distributed geographically to serve all possible needs.

The shipping industry has been hampered in competing for cargoes destined for transcontinental points by the burdensome effect on costs of the tolls charged for Canal passage. The burden has been made unduly great by virtue of inclusion of operational and defense costs not fairly chargeable to commercial shipping. These tolls must be passed on, either to the producer or to the consumer of the goods shipped. The effect has been to remove shippers' incentives to use water shipping by reducing rate spreads already extremely narrow. This can be illustrated by the fact that prior to the war 172 ships were engaged in intercoastal shipping and we now have only 52 ships in that trade.

The industry asks only that it be required to bear, through payment of Canal tolls, its equitable share of the costs of construction, operation, and maintenance of the Canal. Under the present organization and administration of the Canal and its subsidiary operations, including the National Defense Establishment, there is no systematic accounting procedure by which such an equitable share can be determined. There has been no proper determination of what portions of the total cost of Canal Zone operations are correctly chargeable to commercial shipping, and of what portions should be charged off to other interests, principally governmental. As a result of this situation the commercial water-borne shipping industry has been saddled with a tolls system under which they have been forced to add to their costs a toll rate established, within limitations, on a largely arbitrary basis, and bearing no necessary relationship to the actual costs of operations benefiting it. The inevitable result has been to discourage use of water transit by producers and consumers in favor of other means of transportation. Our domestic shipping industry has, accordingly, been unable to recover its competitive position and to take full advantage of the economic factors which normally operate to induce use of water-borne shipping.

In urging passage of H. R. 8677 the industry is not asking for a subsidy. It simply asks that the operations of the Canal and the toll setting functions be so organized as to make possible a fair and systematic determination of equitable tolls which the industry and its customers in all branches of industry should be required to pay for services rendered. I believe that H. R. 8677 will accomplish that purpose. By the separation of commercial and civil functions incident to Canal Zone operations which the bill provides two important results can be achieved: First, more efficient administration of both types of operation will be possible. This should result in a lowering of costs with a consequent toll-rate reduction. Second, the separation of functions will permit establishment of accounting procedures by which an accurate determination can be made of costs directly or indirectly chargeable to commercial shipping. Thus, in setting tolls, a fair share of total costs can be apportioned to be borne by commercial traffic, and suitable offsets for operations not fairly chargeable to such traffic can be established.

It is not possible now to accurately estimate what the final effect on tolls will be. We can be assured, however, that the tolls charged will accurately reflect the actual costs of the service which commercial shipping received. This is not the case at the present time. It is fair to assume that when the reorganization provided for in the bill is accomplished reduced tolls will be possible. More efficient operation and the eliminations of costs not properly associated with commercial shipping should have this effect. In any event, the effect of passage of H. R. 8677 will be to resolve conflicts which have existed for 30 years or more as to the proper basis for the operation of the Canal with regard to its commercial shipping aspects and to the civil government and defense functions. It will resolve these conflicts in a manner which will add no undue burden to the taxpayer and will, at the same time, effectively settle the question of what share of costs should be borne by the Government for the defense value of the Canal.

Any formula for determining the exact share of Canal costs which should be charged to the Federal Government as an offset to compensate for the Canal's value for national-defense purposes must, of necessity, be purely arbitrary. The factors involved are largely intangible. After hearing a considerable amount of testimony on this subject the Merchant Marine Committee determined to eliminate interest charges during the period of construction, for purposes of determining the amount of capital investment on which interest payments must be made by the Panama Canal Corporation from revenues. These interest charges, compounded, amount to approximately $129,000,000 out of a total of $522,000,000 invested. While admittedly arbitrary, I feel that this represents an equitable arrangement for removing from shippers a charge which has been extorted from them since 1932, when this interest was first included by administrative determination to absorb some of the profit then accruing from Canal operations. Removal of these interest charges, together with provision for payment of offset of tolls on governmental vessels, now toll-free and comprising approximately 10 percent of total shipping through the Canal, should do much to permit tolls reductions to private shipping. It is, however, not certain that a reduction will result from the reorganization at first. Present tolls are fixed at 90 cents per ton. In order to prevent the drastic effects on shipping which would result if, through unforeseen changes in conditions, tolls had to be raised greatly to meet the costs set up in the bill, a proviso has been added limiting tolls under the reorganization to $1 per ton. This safety feature is necessary as insurance against disruption of vital shipping services. All indications are that the limitation will not have to be put in effect, but I strongly feel that it should be included to preclude possible disaster to the intercoastal trade.

Mr. Speaker and fellow Members of the House, I emphatically urge passage of H. R. 8677 as a needed measure to place intercoastal shipping on a fair competitive basis with other forms of transportation and thus permit its fullest development. I urge passage because the Nation must have shipping facilities at the fullest possible stage of development in this and future emergencies. Proper development must include flourishing domestic shipping facilities as well as those for foreign trade. These facilities must be available on both Atlantic and Pacific coasts and on the Gulf. The Pacific coast has suffered a tremendous set-back because of decay of the intercoastal trade. To revive that trade is a matter of urgency, not only to the coast economically, but to the Nation as a whole, for defense purposes. H. R. 8677 is designed to aid in such a revival, and its passage will be a first step in the program to bring back American shipping to the point where it can effectively perform the services expected of it in time of need.

The Silver Lining

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SID SIMPSON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. SIMPSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Quincy (Ill.) Herald-Whig for August 20, 1950:

THE SILVER LINING

Now that the first shock of Russia's unprecedented behavior in the United Nations has passed, something like a dispassionate appraisal of the situation is possible. No reasonable justification for the tactics of Jacob Malik is possible. The result has been to tie the security council in tighter knots than the frequent use of the veto by Russia was able to do. But there is a silver lining even to this dark cloud of international disagreement.

Although August will go down as a month marking time in the council, the period will not have been wholly wasted. True, nothing tangible can be accomplished with Mr. Malik in the chairman's place, but a great deal can be done in the tremendous task of pleading the cause of the freedom of man.

More citizens, in America at least, have learned more about the United Nations and of Russia's policies during the current deadlock than in the five previous years of the life of the world organization. Perhaps millions have heard or seen the Council in action by radio or have read about the sessions.

This is a long-range hopeful condition. It promises more intelligent thinking on world problems even if it currently heightens the international tension. This is not to say that the deadlock is to be welcomed. It is not. But there is a certain amount of valuable salvage possible.

Almost everyone has been able to contrast the smoothness with which the Council operated during the half year when Russia was absent with the confusion since her return to the Council table.

Mr. Malik, by his unconscionable falsehoods, has brought out the best efforts of the West. Certainly his crude exaggerations suffer by comparison with the logical discourses by America's Warren Austin, Britain's Gladwyn Jebb, the Norwegian, Indian, Chinese, and other delegates. The western peoples know now why we are in Korea. They know the depth of Communist perfidy. They know the need for strong defenses and they should have a better understanding of democracy. Under the western system, the people are the real bosses and it is important that they concern themselves with the issues.

Whatever Malik's effect on Asiatic peoples, his propaganda has backfired in America and western Europe. The people know now what manner of men rule from the Kremlin. This knowledge may be most important in the months and years ahead.

Perhaps no other incident since World War II has so firmly united the American people as has the policy of Mr. Malik. The Russian has plainly shown the necessity for cooperation of the world's free peoples.

What will happen after Britain's Jebb takes over the Council chair from Malik at the beginning of September? At least parliamentary procedure will be followed. The Council will have opportunities to vote on issues. But that is all. Mr. Malik will use the veto power as did Mr. Molotov. No real action can be expected from the Council so long as Russian policy remains as it has been from the beginning of the UN. Moscow knows now that her big mistake was in absenting herself from the Council. Had she been present the Korean action could not have been taken by the UN.

It is apparent that so long as Russia remains, the UN Council will be mainly a debating society and that any necessary action will have to be unilateral, with Russia bypassed. It is a difficult situation, but not entirely hopeless.

Ending Segregation in the Army

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, reports received thus far from military bases and camps where segregation and discrimination are gradually being eliminated indicate that all such efforts are proving successful and that no trouble is being encountered. At a time when our democratic system is on the defensive, the elimination of racial segregation in our Armed Forces is a very encouraging factor. It is the best reply to Communist hypocrisy and double talk. Nations throughout the world cannot fail to realize that as a Nation we stand united, in peace or war. They, likewise, will realize that the rights of minority people and human rights for all are best respected and defended in countries which practice true democracy.

For the benefit of those who may still be skeptical about the results obtained in the efforts to end segregation, I am placing in the RECORD an Associated Press report published in the New York Herald Tribune of August 20 on the subject and commend it to my colleagues:

ARMY UNIT ENDS SEGREGATION, FINDS IT WORKS—TROOPS IN FOURTH DIVISION MIX IN TRAINING AND LEISURE; TEXAN PRAISES PROGRAM

FORT ORD, CALIF., August 19.—The Fourth Infantry Division has been pioneering in ending all segregation—and finds that it works well.

Separation of colored and white soldiers in different units has been completely eliminated. All the men sleep in the same barracks, eat in the same messes, and sweat out their rugged training together on the drill fields. There is no coddling. And no trouble.

The results obtained have been more than a little surprising to some of the officers who during World War II served with units where Negroes were segregated in companies, battalions, or regiments. Inevitably, these men resented being set apart because of their color.

Now, in the Army's progressive plan to eliminate the race issue throughout its widespread operations, the Fourth Division perhaps has gone a step farther than any other unit.

There are many units where Negroes are serving with white troops, but usually the Negro soldiers are placed together in regiments and battalions. Some such units are fighting today in Korea.

Negroes assigned to the Fourth, which now is engaged in its most expansive training program since World War II, find they are treated exactly the same as white men. If they don't maintain the same standards they are told to snap out of it. And when they make good, they are promoted.

The Fourth is turning out colored noncommissioned officers in increasing numbers, and they are doing a good job.

Officers believe the incentive for a man to stand on his own feet, competitively in a sense, is the main reason this antisegregation program is bringing such surprising results.

One of the unforeseen developments has been to foster friendships between white and Negro soldiers. Instead of the pairing off of Negro with Negro and white with white, so commonplace in other activities, there is a very evident tendency for the men to mix freely in training and in their leisure time.

One white field-grade officer who had considerable duty with Negro troops in Italy during the last war says, "The quicker the entire Army adopts this policy the better."

Another, a Texan, who has been training these mixed companies for many months, swears that it is the only solution. He emphasizes that absolute impartiality is necessary, however.

There still remain a couple of vital questions as to what will follow when these trainees, and the draftees who soon will follow them, are sent out as combat soldiers to man line outfits.

Officers would like to see them assigned in the same manner as they are in the Fourth Division. They feel that if Negro troops, after training with notable success in units where there is no discrimination, are suddenly thrown into solid Negro regiments or batteries they may be sorely let down.

What will be done about this is a matter for high-level Army policy to decide.

A second question is how well Negro noncommissioned officers will function if and when they find themselves handling white soldiers. The best guess in the Fourth is that they will do a bang-up job, provided they are not stymied by some psychological factor.

But, as far as officers at Fort Ord and in the Fourth Division are concerned, they are sure this training policy will succeed.

Hunger as Democracy's Foe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES G. FULTON
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter to the editor of the New York Times, published on August 18, 1950:

HUNGER AS DEMOCRACY'S FOE—ACCEPTANCE OF COMMUNISM LINKED TO SUBSTANDARD LIVING CONDITIONS

NEW YORK, August 16, 1950.

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

Once again our country is being forced to divert a large part of its resources for military purposes. With arms and force we are trying to bulwark the freedoms we hold precious. Yet we fail to understand the basic problem that undermines those freedoms throughout the world—the simple fact of hunger that makes so many people easy prey to other philosophies.

To people who are not sure of tomorrow's meal the democracy and political freedoms we feel are fundamental can have no meaning. They must devote all of their energies to maintaining life. Too frequently they are unsuccessful in that struggle, as the recurring mass famines in the East testify.

As executive director of CARE, I have had an opportunity during the past 4 years to visit more than 50 countries. I am convinced that the world cannot have peace and security while people are hungry. The continuous craving for food that has been the daily lot of millions of our fellow human beings in many parts of the world is something that most of us have never experienced.

SPREAD OF DOCTRINES

But until we are able to understand what that means we cannot understand why people accept political and economic doctrines that seem completely wrong and false to us. Nor will we be able to stop the spread of those doctrines. You cannot feed empty stomachs on ideals.

Two years ago a peasant in an eastern country told me that he had one bowl of rice a day and that the Communists promised him two bowls a day. He was shrewd enough to realize that the promise might be no more than words. But he said: "If they give me an extra bowl a week it is better than I have. Why should I fight them?" That concern for another bowl of rice guides millions of people. It is one of the basic factors that the Soviet propagandists use so effectively in gaining adherents.

In India, a few months ago, I was told by a Government official that in 100 years no one would starve in that country. But what of the people who are hungry today? As I write this, stories in Indian newspapers report famine conditions in many sections of the country. In the northeastern Province of Bihar, entire villages are reduced to eating leaves and grass. Numerous deaths have been reported. An estimated 30 percent of India's people do not get enough to eat in normal times.

Nor can these be considered normal days. Both India and its neighbor Pakistan are beset by the problem of providing homes and jobs and food for some 12,000,000 refugees—about equally divided between the two countries—who were uprooted in the bitterness between Hindu and Moslem. Their plight can be clearly seen when it is realized that even the employed Pakistani has a struggle to stay alive. Prices of staple foods in Pakistan have shot up 100 percent since partition, but wages have increased only half as much. The majority of Pakistani dip a wheat flour pancake into weak mutton gravy—if they can afford mutton—and consider themselves fed.

Still looking toward the east, where so much of the world's future hangs in the balance, every hour 18 persons in Japan die of tuberculosis, the disease that goes hand in hand with substandard diets. The Japanese tuberculosis rate is 5 times that of the United States.

But Europe, too, has its continually hungry, despite the progress toward recovery that has been made. In Italy, alone, according to United Nations figures, there are 4,000,000 unemployed—4,000,000 persons, and their dependents, who cannot count on their next meal.

WAREHOUSE SURPLUSES

At a time when so many people throughout the world need food, we have stored in this country millions of pounds of farm surplus. Some of it is already spoiled. More will spoil unless it is used. And every day it remains in the warehouses this surplus—eggs, butter, cheese, dried milk, poultry, and other life-giving products—rolls up a storage bill of $237,000 for the United States taxpayers.

Twice recently I have testified before the House Agricultural Committee and urged that these surpluses, after we use what we can for school lunches and relief here at home, be made available to American private relief agencies for use overseas.

Two weeks ago a bill was reported out by the committee—but the appropriations authorization to cover shipments to ports in this country from the point of storage and to cover ocean freight to those countries unable to pay for it was deleted. So the bill serves no purpose. Warehouses here will remain full, while stomachs remain empty in the countries we seek to convince of the benefits of our way of life.

Until we come to understand the widespread basic human need for food we are going to find that millions of people in other lands cannot understand the word "democracy." It is not that communism is more successful at winning converts. Rather, we are losing potential friends by our failure to use the most effective weapon at our command.

PAUL COMLY FRENCH.

Javits for Mayor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter appearing in today's New York Herald Tribune, which pays a fine tribute to our colleague the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS]:

JAVITS FOR MAYOR—READER CITES NEW YORKER'S RECORD IN RENT CONTROL

NEW YORK, August 22, 1950.

To the NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE:

The action of Ed Flynn, of the Bronx, in engineering the deal which kicked O'Dwyer upstairs, necessitating a mayoralty election in a gubernatorial year, may well be considered a political masterstroke. On the other hand, it may well prove a boomerang. This it will be if the Republican Party will seize the opportunity presented and will nominate a man who will capture the imagination and the votes of the overwhelmingly large majority of the independent voters of the city. Such a man is Congressman JACOB K. JAVITS—a true Republican, but a forward-looking Republican, who has become a leader among the group of Republicans who are truly progressive and who are seeking to free the Republican Party from such references as conservative, reactionary, and the like.

In the very nature of things, there cannot be complete agreement with everything that Mr. JAVITS or any other Congressman does. Whether we agree with him in toto, however, there can be no disagreement with JAVITS' continued and zealous support of the rights of, and his interest in, the problems of tenants, displaced persons, racial and religious minorities and persons of the working class in general.

As an illustration of his activity, I refer to the establishment of Javits Rent Clinics throughout his congressional district. Such clinics rendered valuable assistance to many thousands of tenants both within and without his congressional district. They did such effective work that the Republican Party in the county of New York, ably assisted by Mr. JAVITS, expanded them so that they are now in operation in every assembly district in the county and are continuing to render inestimable service to many more thousands of tenants throughout the entire city of New York.

I also would like to call attention to the fact that the present emergency State housing rent control law, passed by a Republican legislature and signed by a Republican governor, incorporates a provision known as the "Javits amendment," which, in substance, provides that any landlord who obtains an increase in rent because of increased facilities must stipulate in writing to continue those facilities throughout the tenancy, thereby preventing landlords from obtaining such increases upon that ground and thereafter depriving tenants of the benefits of such facilities.

Congressman JAVITS is a proven vote-getter. In 1946 he was elected in a district which for many years had been carried overwhelmingly by Democratic candidates. In 1948 he was reelected, over an opponent who had been indorsed by both the Democratic Party and the American Labor Party.

We need JACK JAVITTS as our candidate. We need him as our mayor. Besides, his nomination will strengthen the Republican State ticket more than that of any other candidate. I strongly urge his nomination by the Republican Party.

SIDNEY FORSCHER.

Today's Challenge to Our Freedoms

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the address entitled "Today's Challenge to Our Freedoms," which I delivered before the thirty-third annual convention of the International Association of Lions Clubs in Chicago on July 18.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TODAY'S CHALLENGE TO OUR FREEDOMS

(By KARL E. MUNDT)

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, for that encouraging and friendly introduction. Good morning, fellow Americans and fellow Lions around the world who are associated with Lions International. I salute you all.

It looks sort of homelike to look down in the first two or three rows here and see a South Dakota banner flying there and the sun-kissed cheeks of South Dakota citizens sitting proudly under the fair name of my home State.

I am surprised and pleased to find so many people here so early on a hot July morning in Chicago, and had I needed any further corroboration, which I do not, of the fact that the people who belong to Lions are a superior type of citizenry in the respective country or state to which they belong, that corroboration would be afforded me this morning by seeing so many of you here for a morning session of a convention which is already several days long.

I recall one time addressing the Los Angeles Breakfast Club out in California, and I saw across the head of the breakfast table as I came down the aisle to address those sons of the Golden West, this rather appropriate statement, which I think is fitting to you. On the sign it said, "Any old bum can stay up all night, but it takes a thoroughbred to get up in the morning." So I know you are a group of thoroughbreds.

And if it is necessary to make the analogy any more complete, I must confess that I feel a little bit like a bum, due to the fact that the exigencies of your program, the cancellation which preceded my appearance on the program, and my own schedule necessitated that I stay up all night last night to get here by plane just a little bit before I appear on the program.

I think I should say in all fairness, due to the reading of the telegram that just preceded my introduction, that while I have known Dean Acheson for a long time since he has been serving in the field of foreign affairs from the administrative angle in Washington just about exactly the same number of years that I have been serving in the field of foreign affairs from the legislative angle, I think in all fairness to Dean Acheson, I should say that in all probability anything which I say this morning which remotely resembles anything that Dean Acheson might have told you will be just a coincidence, because we approach the situation from a somewhat different angle.

We approach it differently, perhaps, because of our background. I don't know. Perhaps we approach it differently because of our alma maters in which we attended college. I don't know. Perhaps we approach it differently because one of us is working as best he can in the administrative branch of Government, which necessarily has a different viewpoint from the legislative branch, the branch of Government in which I work. Or perhaps we approach the problem differently, I don't know, because the Secretary of State pretty well limits his contacts to diplomatic people and people high in positions of Government, whereas a Member of the Senate of the United States must expand his contacts to include in large measure the good people such as are represented at a convention of this kind, just the ordinary people of the world.

So I am going to have to talk to you as a friend, in pinch-hitting for Secretary of State Dean Acheson, and a neighbor, and a fellow member of a service club, and just an ordinary American looking at this problem along with the rest of you, with considerable disturbance and with a great amount of alarm.

You know, when one has been down in Washington as long as either the Secretary of State or the Senator from South Dakota, unless he watches himself carefully, after some 12 or 14 years of sojourning in that great Capital City, he is inclined to believe his press notices and begin concluding he is a mighty important individual; and when men decide that they are as important as the headline writers indicate they are, when they say something that the local editor approves and consequently he banners it across the front page of a newspaper, that is the time when they are apt to make their most serious blunders.

WASHINGTON IMPORTANCE

Washington is an important town. I suppose it is the most important capital city of the world these days. It is a beautiful city. Lying down there, as it does, on the wrong side of the Potomac River, nestled in the District of Columbia, I think that Washington has become today the focal point, the exchequer, the financier, the leader of all the forces fighting against tyranny in the world today. And so, because it has become such an important metropolitan capital of so many people, undoubtedly those of us living there are inclined to feel that we should reflect somehow the importance and the significance and the power of that great Capital.

Ask any taxicab driver when you come to Washington any number of problems that you care to interrogate him about, and as he takes you for a 30-cent drive from the Union Station in Washington, D. C., to any destination in the first zone that you may select, if you are asking questions about domestic policy, about Federal spending, about how to solve the problem of taxation, or about the international situation, he will answer your questions promptly and firmly and boldly and directly. You can get a college education in Washington for a 30-cent taxicab ride.

He is an important individual down in Washington, the cab driver. I grant, his answer may be wrong, but he is never in doubt; he gives it to you, at least, at the drop of your hat. He never dodges your questions.

Other people in Washington are important, and the House of Representatives is filled with 435 important men, representing you and your lives and your freedoms and your fortunes in the greatest legislative body in the world. And almost every Congressman assumes that sooner or later he is going to become a candidate for the United States Senate, so that in itself makes him a mighty important individual as he sits there and contemplates that most expensive and most difficult and most dangerous highway in the world, the 575 feet leading from the House of Representatives to the inner Chamber of the United States Senate.

And then we have a United States Senate in Washington, and certainly that is comprised of important people. Every Member of the Senate and and every member of the President's Cabinet believes that he is a potential candidate for President, and certainly that makes him an important individual, and he goes around pompously preening himself, and looking in the mirror, and listening to the echo of his own voice, waiting for the magic call that says "You must lead the people of America in their hour of need."

Then you have some other people down in Washington. Of late, you know, we have people occupying the White House who assume that everyone who gets there ought to have a lifetime lease on the White House, and that makes them important people, too. And it occurs to me as I stand here and have the high and happy privilege of thinking out loud with you as one common, ordinary, garden variety American to others, that one of the things that is wrong in the world today is that there are too many people, in too many capitals, of too many countries of the world, who feel that they have gotten too important as compared to the rest of the people in those countries.

THE SITUATION TODAY

So we need folks like you; we need folks like you and organizations like yours, to keep men like me in jobs like mine, and in jobs like that of the President, and the Secretary of State cut down to knee-pants size once in awhile; to let us realize that the people in America were originally conceived to be its rulers, not to be ruled by the politicians. It is well for us to go back occasionally to those words of the founding fathers of this Republic, and that is that they were placing in the hands of the people in their several States, rights and opportunities and privileges to be enjoyed, and to be explored, and to be exemplified and, above all, to be exercised, because if we don't exercise those privileges, they perish through disuse and lethargy.

Now, look at the situation in which we find ourselves today. As Americans, I want to think out loud with you for a while, man to man, straight from the shoulder, just talking off the cuff and from the heart. You know, whenever you can get a man in public life to talk to you without a manuscript or without notes, you may get the truth once in a while, because he doesn't have any opportunity to cover up his convictions and to substitute polished phrases for points of fact. He just has to say the things he actually believes. He doesn't have to get a ghost writer to write it out if he is not going to use it. There is no chance to take out the things that you ought to be told and to stick in the things that he thinks you ought to become confused about. All he can do is to try to recite the story of our times in the language of America, the way we talk about it when we are sitting around a table in a restaurant, or waiting for the fish to bite in a fishing boat on a Minnesota or a South Dakota lake. This morning, I want to discuss with you in that capacity and in that way, free from all polished phrases and mental reservations and careful, cautious diplomatic doubletalk, the situation in which the world is, and in which you are, and in which I am, as we meet here on this melancholy day of July 1950, coming down close to the time when we shall have been in an undeclared shooting, blood-letting war for more than a month, in a country 6,000 miles away. The last man I talked to when I left home said to me, "Karl, my boy is in Korea, and I haven't heard from him now for 5 days. What can you tell me about where all this is going to lead?"

THE FUTURE UNCERTAIN

Well, if we could have had the Secretary of State there, that would have been a legitimate question to ask him. And as we listen to the President's message tomorrow night over the radio, that certainly is a ligtimate question to put to him. It is an equally legitimate question to put to a Member of the United States Senate and, while I cannot answer it categorically or prophetically or positively this morning in Chicago, I can assure you that had the Secretary of State been here, he could not have answered it any more positively, or any more categorically, or any more directly than I, because, unhappily and unfortunately, as we shall discover when we listen to the President tomorrow night, he also cannot tell us where all this is going to lead. This unsavory situation exists because you and I, as Americans, and you and I as members of a great service-luncheon fraternity of Lions International, with its clubs in so many quarters of this earth, you and I have lost the initiative in foreign policy as we have lost the initiative for the time being in the military program, and so the only people that can tell you positively today where all this is going to lead is Joe Stalin and those 13 associates of his in the Kremlin, who belong to the Politburo in Moscow. If you could induce them to come and address your convention, they could tell you. Nobody in America knows. That is one of the great tragedies of our times.

Oh, we can trace back the steps, I suppose, how we got where we are. We can argue as intelligent, freedom-loving, self-governing human beings about how to solve the problem from here on out. We can hope, and we should pray, but nobody in America or in Whitehall in London or in Paris or in South America, nobody outside the Kremlin today knows where all this is going to lead. The free world has permitted itself to lose the initiative. That is always dangerous.

MUST BACK OUR FIGHTING FORCES

We would better be pretty serious about it, you and I, because there are certain things that we can do and certain things that we cannot do and certain things which, unless we do them, are probably going to help determine the issue permanently insofar as freedom is concerned. But insofar as Korea is concerned and our war there, we simply must rally around the flag and get behind the fighting forces of America and those who will join with us, we hope, in the ground fighting with the blood-letting activities in that United Nations effort. We have got to support them, of course, until we win a determination satisfactory and successful to the cause of freedom. That, we admit. That, we stoutly adhere to. But just nobody can tell us yet what the target in Korea actually is, other than that we want the Americans and southern Koreans to quit marching south and to start marching north again victoriously. That, we know. That, we know, and that, we are going to do, come what may. But beyond that, we are stymied, confused, uncertain, and in the dark.

Nobody in Washington can tell you whether that march northward is supposed to stop at the thirty-eighth parallel, at the boundary line of northern Korea, at the gates of Vladivostok, or at the Red Square in Moscow. Nobody knows at the moment where that march is supposed to stop, but we are going to start going north pretty soon in Korea; we are pretty sure of that.

I don't think it serves the public interest too directly to discuss the paths by which we arrived at a fighting war in Korea, 6,000 miles from home, illy prepared and poorly equipped. On the other hand, if we don't learn from experience in a world as wicked and as dangerous as this one, things such as have occurred in Korea can be repeated in so many areas of the world that we can lose our freedom without even being given a fair chance to fight for it.

As intelligent human beings, therefore, we not only should look ahead and plan a course of action, but we should look back and try to figure out how we got into that difficulty, so we can avoid having the same men make the same blunders again in another dangerous proposition. And, because I wouldn't consider, certainly, sitting up all night in an airplane for the happy privilege of talking Pollyanna pleasantries and meaningless nothingness to an intelligent group like Lions International, I want to discuss just very briefly some of the things so we can be sure that that type of difficulty doesn't happen in Iran or perhaps in Turkey or in Berlin or in Finland or in India or in Indochina or in Formosa or in Japan or the Philippines, or any one of another half dozen places where, if we permit policies to be fabricated and pursued such as led to these calamitous decisions in Korea, it can destroy freedom at its greatest bastion, in America. Even a rich country like Uncle Sam's can't simultaneously maintain forces of conflict fighting in half a dozen different corners of the world, such as we are now compelled to arm and support; we cannot do it indefinitely.

LOOKING BACK

Everybody knows hindsight is better than foresight, but it isn't any better unless you use it. Hindsight isn't any good unless you can profit by looking backward to see what you can do when you next move ahead. A good motorist on a crowded highway, before he pulls out of the line to go around the car ahead of him looks in the rear-view mirror to see what is behind. A lot of Americans would be better getting ready for some tough movements ahead, and in order to be sure that the movements we take ahead are right, we better take a serious look in the rear-view mirror to see what has been going on behind. If we are honest about that, as most Americans are, if you want the facts, as most Americans do, if you put patriotism above partisanship, as all Americans must, we recognize that the difficulties began, insofar as the war in Korea is concerned, at the conferences preceding, and immediately following Yalta, when we made some very serious blunders in diplomatic policy. When we, at Yalta, arrived at certain conclusions, as the freedom-loving leaders of the world, which led our then leaders to believe that we could get along happily and safely with a Godless tyranny like communism in Russia if we simply would permit it to grow by piecemeal methods until it tripled its present size, we planted the seeds of disaster. We gave them at Yalta, gave to the Communists at Yalta, the portions of Poland east of the Curzon line, and they continued to take the western portions of Poland and all of eastern Germany. We gave the Russians domination in the Balkans, which they now control. We told them at Yalta that they could have Manchuria, and they took it, and they liked it so well that they moved in and took the rest of China, and we did nothing to stop them. And we told the Communists at Yalta and at Potsdam that we were going to draw a line across Korea and call it the thirty-eighth parallel and divide up the Korean cake between the Communists and the freedom-loving people of Korea; and we agreed at Yalta and at Potsdam, among other things, in the occupation of Berlin, to permit the Russian Army, to permit the Red Army of Godless communism, to put its armed forces entirely around the American military occupation forces of Berlin. We didn't even ask for exit and entrance privileges. Consequently, we had the recent airlift that you know about.

PAST ERRORS

Now, those were blunders· those were errors; those were miscalculations; those were based on the concept that by appeasing communism, you can live with it. And we have found out now that by appeasing communism, you die with American boys facing 60-ton tanks in Korea, and we have to learn to avoid mistakes like that if we are going to have freedom in America.

I am not interested this morning in assessing blame or assessing responsibility. I am interested in having Americans, who are supposed to be governing themselves, be positive that they know what the situation is we are in, so we don't get into a like difficulty some place else. Members of Lions International are certainly as intelligent, on the average, as Members of the United States Senate, so I don't have to gloss over anything to you or attempt to conceal the facts and the evidence. How else can you contribute to self-government wisely?

I don't know how much or how little may have been contributed to all these melancholy decisions at Yalta, because the young man who served there as confidential adviser to the Big Three at the time the decisions were made behind closed doors was a fellow by name of Alger Hiss, who has been found guilty of what is tantamount to perjury to conceal treason by a Federal court in New York. But I know Hiss was there and I would have felt a whole lot better if Hiss had been at home, and a good American, believing in the cause of freedom, had been there, I'll tell you that, I don't know how much Hiss and the Communist cells in the State Department contributed to the cause and the creation of the war in Korea and the appeasement policies which led to it and the collapse of our American foreign policy in Asia, which has resulted in the beginning of a military program which is not going to collapse. I don't even know how tremendously much Alger Hiss alone contributed to that, because 2 weeks before the State Department people met at Yalta, 2 weeks, even, before the President arrived with the Secretary of State, a mission of American State Department planners met at Malta, an island on the road to Yalta, and at Malta, for 2 weeks, this little coterie of four important State Department appointees wrote out the decisions and mapped out the plans and set up the briefs that our President and our Secretary of State were supposed to propose and defend. And the most articulate spokesman of the group that connived and schemed for 2 weeks at Malta, by the record, is the same Alger Hiss who ought to be in jail for his infamy right now.

BYRNES—A FINE AMERICAN

I know there are some who say, "Oh, we don't think he had much to say about the whole thing."

This is not the place to argue that. All I know is that Hiss was there, and that Ed. Stettinius and Jimmy Byrnes, that great statesman from down in Dixie, that Dixiecrat—well, I hear some rebels yelling out there and I want to tell you that as I have observed Dixiecrats down in Washington for the last 12 years, I have decided that they are not such a bad class of folks after all. I think a Dixiecrat is simply a Democrat with his two eyes open, knowing where he is going and deciding to get rid of the past. A Dixiecrat is a fellow believing in the principles of Thomas Jefferson and Woodrow Wilson, and some of the great Democratic leaders of the past. You know, I am impressed a bit by the fact that when you spell "Democrat," there isn't an "i" in the term; and when you spell "Dixiecraft" there are two "i's" in it with an "x" in between, and if the two "i's" can just use their "x" courageously they can go back and have a good Democratic Party once again.

Jimmy Byrnes, I consider a fine American, and that is what I started out to say—and that is poor business of course for a Republican to start doing, eulogizing a Democratic rebel from South Carolina, but Jimmy Byrnes I think is just as good an American as anybody we have on the Republican team, and better than some. Jimmy Byrnes wrote a book in which he told what Alger Hiss was doing at Yalta. Henry Stimson also told what was going on over there. So did Ed. Stettinius.

CAN'T "LET THE DUST SETTLE"

I simply want to point out to you, as we measure up to the challenge of the hour, as we must, that surely we must never again permit in American history at any time, such a sorry appeasement policy in foreign affairs to be enunciated to the world as our American foreign policy. For example, I hope we never have a foreign policy toward the Republic of Turkey, lying in the danger zone, as it does, such as we have had enunciated toward the Republic of China, lying in its particular danger zone, because the last full-blown expression of American foreign policy toward China was, "We're going to let the dust settle for a while in China." I hope we never adopt that as a foreign policy for Turkey, because I am afraid if we decide that we are going to let the dust settle for a while in Turkey, and let the dust settle for a while in Iran, and let the dust settle for a while in the Philippines, and in Hawaii, and Formosa, the same dust is going to be turned into red mud by the same spilling of American blood as we have found happening in Korea, where the dust didn't settle as the State Department so naively hoped it would.

So we, as Americans, have to start trying to discover some way in which to establish a force, and influence, a positive movement for directing the "dust" so it settles where it belongs and not in the eyes of freedom-loving people all over the world.

And now, moving from there to the world as a whole, it seems to me that the situation in Korea, and the battle being fought in Korea, is the battle of Britain, and it is the battle of France, it is the battle of Italy, it is the battle of every South American republic, and it is the battle of the United States in this trying hour.

THE PRESENT ISSUE

What we have to decide in Korea is the thing that freemen have to decide and place they have the right to be free: Are we going to surrender freedom to dictatorial human beings determined to push us around for the rest of our lives? That is the issue. That is the issue at home and abroad.

You say "No" here this morning, and I hope you are right, but as one who has served down in Washington for 12 years and has watched this thing unfold, I am not too sanguine this morning that we are going to be able to activate the forces of the free soon enough, and hard enough, and deliberately enough to get them well enough organized to defeat the highly activated forces of tyranny and communism.

Let me point out something to you from the record that you may not have thought about. With only one or two exceptions, all around the globe, for 20 long years, the areas of human freedom all around the globe have been growing increasingly smaller. Have you ever taken a look at the geography to figure that out? Twenty years, 20 consecutive years of history, and in that time a considerably small number of human beings are free than were free 20 years ago, or 30 years ago, or 40 years ago. Civilization is moving in the wrong direction.

Have you ever stopped to realize that it was the year 1848 when the first Mein Kampf was written by the first German tyrant to scheme out a diabolical idea of world conquest 100 years ahead of Hitler? Two fellows by the name of Karl Marx and Dr. Engels wrote a book called Das Kapital, and then wrote an interpretation called the Manifesto to Communism and launched what the world thought was a crackpot idea and nobody paid any attention to their Mein Kampf, any more than they paid attention to Hitler's Mein Kampf 100 years after, but Hitler, a would-be dictator growing up from the German soil, meant what he said and tried to get the job done. So did Marx and Engels.

While we have been busy, as necessarily we have been busy, fighting the forces of nazism and fascism, the forces of this earlier scheme of German dictatorship, this earlier ideology which was trying to establish a world collectivism, the scheme of the Communists, has been growing, growing, growing, growing up until this hour as I address you in the city of Chicago.

LION'S RESPONSIBILITY

Have you measured up to that challenge as Lions? Have you recognized that, as members of Lions International, you have a stake in that? And it isn't going to be the boys dying in Korea that is going to determine the outcome of that fight. What is going to determine it is what you do as an individual citizen.

I never had the happy fortune to be a member of Lions International but I served as one of the national and international officers of Kiwanis International for a while and they are all-out fighters, just like Lions. If you are a young man, you either join Lions International or Kiwanis. If you are an old man, they wheel you up to the table in a wheel chair and you become a Rotarian.

But we all, Rotarians and Exchangers and Lions and Kiwanians, have a responsibility which I confess to you that far too small a percentage of us measure up to. If we can't increase the percentage, all they can do to turn the forces of tyranny back in Korea is to hold them for a while, defeat them in a military venture, build some beautiful new cemeteries and sit back with melancholy expectation that we are going to continue to lose the global battle for free human souls, as we have been losing it for 20 or 30 years.

I wonder how many of you have stopped to realize that in 100 years, communism, pagan, collectivistic, materialistic, aggressive, cruel philosophy that it is, an international conspiracy built on the premise that men should rule men, that the state is supreme, that folks like you and me are not the proper kind of individuals to have the ballot or the power of decision or the power of free speech or free movement or free enterprise—I wonder how many measure up to the fact that that kind of a villainous philosophy in 100 years has come to control the destinies and influence the activities of as many human beings today as Christianity in all its forms has been able to do in nearly 2,000 years? In 20 times as long, we who worship God, as Catholic or Jew or Protestant, around the world are fewer in number today than those controlled and directed by a group of 14 political mad men in the Kremlin in Moscow. It is a fact, from the record, that lions should chew on between the piece de resistance and the dessert course everytime you have your luncheons, because only Lions and folks like Lions, businessmen, doctors, dentists, farmers, clerks, free enterprisers all, only men and women such as are gathered in Chicago today can save the world from collapse.

You can save it only by doing those things that you ought to have done so long ago and doing them now by your freedom, meeting the big problems of the community and the country and the world, even though you can't devote quite as much time temporarily to the smaller problems of your own immediate success financially or politically or socially.

COMMUNISM A WORLD THREAT

We heard last week in the United States Senate, and you read it in the newspapers, you heard it on the radio, that 72 percent of the current Federal budget is being spent because there is loose in the world today a force called communism.

Have you ever tried this interesting little parlor game? If you have an opportunity sometime, call in your neighbors and contemplate for a while what a wonderfully happy world we would all be living in today, with our great victory in World War II, with Hitler sent to perdition where he so rightfully belongs, with Mussolini hung in the public square at Milan, with Japan brought to its knees—what a gloriously happy world if only there were not rampant today that evil force of communism, both abroad and at home. It is weren't for that.

MUNDT-NIXON BILL

And most of us have never taken time, have we, to be honest with ourselves, to establish a working definition of communism? Well, I happen to be one of the Senators who joined with others who have been working for a long time on a very simple piece of legislation, sometimes called the Mundt-Nixon bill, as referred to by the gentleman who introduced me, now called in the United States the so-called Mundt-Ferguson-Johnston bill, a bill to require Communists to do primarily five things, perhaps. First, require Communists to register their names and come out in the open like Republicans and Democrats and Dixiecrats do.

No. 2. Require the Communists to label all their literature with the imprimatur of the party, like the United States Congress has correctly insisted Republicans and Democrats have to do when we go out campaigning. No anonymous campaign literature. You have got to put your name on it and speak out behind it and before it.

No. 3. Require the Communists to do what the Democrats and Republicans have to do, make a financial report to the Government, where they get their money and how they spend it.

No. 4. Require the Communists, when they make a radio program, to identify it as coming from a Communist source.

No. 5. Require the Communists to identify by name all of the front organizations and kindred creeds which they support.

Primarily, that is the bill. You would think we were trying to assassinate every Communist—and that might not be such a bad idea, either—but you would think we were trying to do that from the hue and cry that is raised against the bill. In other words, the Communists and the synthetic liberals and the pseudo-progressives whose minds are controlled or contaminated by the Communists say, "We would like to continue to let the Communists be the only organization with a cyclone cellar which is moving around trying to influence public affairs; the only one that doesn't have to sign its name; the only one that doesn't have to make a financial report; the only one that doesn't have to register its members openly, that doesn't have to identify its supporters."

THE "ANTI-ANTI-COMMUNIST"

Certainly, I see no reason, just because a few people want to get a few votes from some Communists and some people who think communism is just a nice agrarian policy, like the State Department once thought it was in China, I see no reason why the rest of us have to risk sabotage in the dark of our war effort, that we are fighting at the moment, to give those Communists this special consideration, and so I am against it 100 percent. But there is a great and happy aggregation of quick thinkers and fast talkers in America that has been referred to quite correctly recently by an American author as "the anti-anti-Communists." An "anti-anti-Communist" is a fellow who can give the toughest speech in the world against communism, especially just before November when he is looking for votes. Oh, he can be tough against communism then. He can get up and he can condemn it, he can criticize it, he can cuss it out; but when you try to get him to stand up and vote for a measure to do anything effective to stop it, he is always off fishing some place, or he hasn't the time to consider it, or never finds legislation which just quite satisfies him.

Anti-anti-Communists. They want to do everything against communism except to insult it to the point where it and its organizations which are controlled by it cease going along with their votes when they are needed in a close election.

And then there are other people who oppose the legislation because they say, "Well, after all, the Communists are a political party."

Actually, they are not, but if they were, I would like one of those apologists for communism tell me why the Communists should have advantages as a political party that are denied to Republicans and Democrats. That is what they have now. That is what they want to keep. And when you write your United States Senator, as I hope you do—and if people like you are not interested enough in protecting the home front to do something about getting legislation on our books now to curtail, identify, and expose communism here, then I think the jig is up. I think then the jig is up, because if we can't get people of your type interested in doing a simple thing like that, I don't think the boys with their bazookas against 60-ton tanks in Korea can do the job alone.

COMMUNISTS IN UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

Now, we do two other things in the bill. I am going to be honest about it. Oh, we offend a lot of people on this one. We put in the Mundt-Nixon bill, or the Mundt-Ferguson bill, or S. 2311, whatever you want to call it, we put in this tremendously anti-liberal, antiprogressive, police-state type of thing that the Communist Daily Worker talks about in every issue that you see—and in Chicago you can find it in some other Communist papers published in Chicago, and if you look at them, you will see as of today they are attacking the bill and they will probably have the place picketed by the time I leave this noon.

We do another thing in this bill, and I want you to know what it is. We offend those people by saying if this law passes, it will not be permissible by law for a Communist to hold a job in the Federal Government; and if he gets it, he goes to jail, along with the fellow who gave him the job. Do you want it?

Oh, if the optimism, the well-known, world-wide, globally heralded optimism of Lions is so great tha you think we can win these conflicts abroad diplomatically and militarily while the Communists continue to be permitted to operate inside the Government, you are bigger optimists than this Senator is. I think we have got to weed it out now, while we are free, instead of trying to do it like they did in Czechoslovakia, after the Communists had moved in.

The main reason why they come out, as they do, in their literature every day—and I think I brought a copy of the Communist Daily Worker along with me to show you—the main reason they do oppose the legislation in that connection is that if you make them go to jail instead of letting them sneak their way into a job, they lose their influence to help pervert American foreign policy and they lose their power to sabotage and spy from within.

I am not going to insult the intelligence of a great group of Lions like you or take advantage of the fact that I was willing to come and talk to you straight out from the shoulder, man to man, or a subject which your scheduled speaker was unable to come to Chicago to discuss. I don't want to take advantage of that fact, but I do want you to know certain things. I am not going to talk about Communists that might have been in the Government, but I spent nearly 10 years of my life as a member of House committees finding out Communists who were in Government and trading and trafficking in disloyalty. I guess we can mention Alger Hiss all right. He has been convicted. I guess we can mention Carl Marbani all right. He is in the Federal penitentiary. The last job he had was in the American State Department helping to figure out the policy in China. We caught up with that Communist and he is in jail.

I guess one can mention Henry Julian Wadleigh all right, because he has confessed. He was in the State Department and he confessed to the fact that over half a thousand times he had taken State Department documents and delivered them to Russian agents, and he went to court in New York and turned State's evidence and testified against his colleague and associate, Alger Hiss. Then he syndicated his confessions to the newspapers and made $5,000, and to this day he has never spent a day in jail for selling America out like Benedict Arnold did. I guess a fellow can mention him all right, can't he? He confessed 15 minutes after we told him in our Committee on Un-American Activities the silly old statute of limitations had run out on his crimes. The statute of limitations makes you immune to such crimes in 3 years, so he felt perfectly free to confess.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS

That is why one other clause of this so-called Mundt-Ferguson-Nixon bill provides that the statute of limitations will not run out for 10 years on crimes against the Government on the part of traitors. And I was ambitious enough to make it lifetime but the lawyers cut it out!

Oh, I guess a man can mention Judy Coplon all right. She has been convicted and sentenced for her part as a Communist agent in the Government. I guess we can mention her

I guess we can mention Noel Field. He skipped the country as we were moving in on him.

I guess we can mention Gerhardt Eisler. We let him operate in this country for 14 years and caught him and let him get away in a Polish ship, and Gerhardt Eisler is now the propaganda minister in east Berlin for the Communists.

I guess we can mention the people who have gone to jail, who have confessed, who have been convicted, who have fled the country.

LIONS AGAINST COMMUNISM

I think it ought to be fair to quote the State Department figure that might or might not have appeared in the written remarks of the very illustrious scheduled speaker for your occasion, this morning had he come, but it is a statement that they gave to me, anyhow. As I concluded my work on the House Committee on Un-American Activities to become a United States Senator, I had a letter from Jack Puerifoy, a fine young South Carolina Democrat who is Assistant Secretary of State, recently appointed Ambassador to Greece. I had said, "Jack, what have we done?" It had been a tough job. A lot of indifferent Americans won't support you; all of the off-color Americans oppose you and scurrilously attack you, and just a few valiant forces like the American Legion and Knights of Columbus and a few others get behind you and try to actually do something organizationwise to fight communism.

And may I again interpolate here, lest I forget, that through the representations of that great American, your president of 11 years ago, Alex Wells, Lions International has joined a new all-American crusade against communism to do something except grumble about the forces of sedition that have attacked you. I salute you. I salute you as the first service club in America to join up. Since then, three others have followed suit. That is exemplifying the type of freedom that you enjoy as Lions and that you cannot enjoy in any totalitarian country of the world.

Well, I was talking about the letter I got from Jack Peurifoy. Let me quote from the letter that Jack Peurifoy sent back when he said, "We don't believe there is much cause for alarm any more because of communism in the State Department since we have been able since Yalta"—remember the location and the date of that nefarious conference—"we have been able since Yalta to get rid of 204 disloyal agents from the State Department."

Two hundred four. Their count, not mine.

Two hundred four from the Secretary of State's report, not mine.

Two hundred four, according to a letter written by the Department to me, not by me to them. Two hundred four disloyal agents have been fired since Yalta. Keep that fact in mind.

Well, the State Department thought that sounded kind of bad after they had dictated it, so they put in a second paragraph and they said, "Dear Senator: It is not as bad as it sounds, because about half of these people were not Communists; they were simply homosexuals or sex perverts, that is all."

So they put that cut as a sort of a recommendation for the kind of people that they had had in the Department.

ANY NUMBER A DANGER

Now, I don't know whether it is mental corruption or moral laxity of that kind if you are a disloyal suspect, but I am willing to take their word for it, because I am a fair-minded fellow. That leaves 100 Communist agents by their own count, that they have kicked out of the State Department since Yalta.

All I want to say to you is this, as one ordinary American to another, that if you don't think 100 Communists or even 10 Communists, or Alger and Julian and Noel and a few of the rest of them can cause any trouble in our State Department, then I would just like to have the chance to put 100 American GI's in Joe Stalin's office in the Kremlin for 90 days. I would guarantee in that time to have old Joe walking around singing Yankee Doodle Dandy.

Here is the Daily Worker, and here is my picture looking about like the way I feel after being up all last night, sitting there with my head in my hands, listening to the testimony, and it says, "The Target Is You," and the whole issue is devoted to an effort to raise $1,000,000 and get 100,000 influenced Americans motivated by Communist ideology and Communist charms to write their two United States Senators saying, "Defeat this bill." "Defeat MUNDT's efforts to pass a bill requiring Communists to register and denying them Federal jobs."

Now our bill does one other thing. It also provides, if you please, that no American Communist can get a passport to travel abroad. They can't go over and fill their dynamos with energy and come back for the purpose of better corrupting America. Mind you, we don't say, as the Russians say, "You cannot leave without exit privileges." We do nothing like that in our bill, I am positive about that; I wrote it very carefully in that connection; we do nothing which would deny an American Communist the right to leave. We just make it impossible for him to come back, because he can't get an American passport.

COMMUNISTS IN YOUR STATE

Take a look at it. And take a look at Look magazine that I read on the plane coming in this morning. I have forgotten whether it is the current issue or the one before that, because sometimes these magazines you get on an airplane or in a barber shop are not exactly up to date, but it is not too old, anyhow, and there you will see, in the current issue of Look or the one just preceding the current issue, a map of the United States in which J. Edgar Hoover tells you how many Communists you have in your State. He won't tell you who they are, because he hasn't any authority to do so in the law, because communism is not illegal. Consequently, we think we ought to have legislation so we can find out who they are. We have got 30 of them in South Dakota. They tell us that in the map. If we had 30 Communists in South Dakota who were known as Communists in South Dakota, you wouldn't need any FBI to take care of that problem out there. I'll tell you that. That could be taken care of at home, and the FBI could be figuring out who is trying to sabotage the railroads or the harbors, and who is trying to destroy the home front by preaching a doctrine of disunity, as they do, urging people to sign petitions to keep their hands off of Korea, urging our boys to come home. For what? So that the Communists can take Korea and Formosa and Japan and the Philippines, and, after a while, maybe Florida and the rest of the States. That is the Communist line.

Let me urge you, then, first, if you concur with me, that the hour is tragically past, with the fight nearing its fourth week in Korea, when we ought to do something on the home front to compel the Communists in our own midst at least to register and expose themselves and come out in the open. And if they won't do that, let's klink them into jail, where they belong!

This is not a project, it seems to me, about which the convention should resolve, but it is a project, it seems to me, on which good, red-corpuscled, callous-handed, hairy-chested Lions can do something today and tomorrow. You can wire your two Senators and write to them and say, "We want your public, active, aggressive, open, courageous support now in favor of a Communist control bill protecting the home front. And don't kid us along, Mr. Senator, with a lot of 'Yes-No's, and a lot of if's, but's, and anti-anti-Communist stuff.' Are you for the bill or against it? You can answer me in words of either three letters or two." Because it is important now that we stand up, I think, and divide the men from those who are occupying the seats where men ought to be in the United States Senate if we are going to continue to stay free.

LIONS FIRST TO AID

So much for the recommendation.

Now, just one thing more and then I'll conclude. I am proud of men like Everett Dirksen, my former colleague in the House of Representatives; I am proud of C. W. "Runt" Bishop, from some place down in Little Egypt in Illinois; I am proud of the fact that Lions International was the first rather than the second or third or the last American service club that said, "Show us a program to do something about communism, and we'll join up and be part of it." You made your place with one of the vice presidents of the All-American Conference against Communism, headed by a great American churchman, Reverend Dan Polling, of New York, and with the honorary chairman, a great American Hoosier by the name of George Craig, the great national commander of the American Legion, joining together the forces of what we hope are going to be 50,000,000 Americans. For what purpose? Simply to tell the Communists, "You can't take over here. We are going to defend freedom at home."

Oh, you probably will find in the local library and in the school this slick-paper Communist publication put out by the Soviet Embassy, because in most of our American communities today the Communists at this moment are doing a more aggressive job of promoting communism than you and I are doing of promoting freedom.

ORGANIZE TO FIGHT COMMUNISTS

May I say, and with this I stop, just as a parting request to those of you who are still awake, as I am about to leave and go to sleep in the plane going back to Washington, I wish you would just be honest with yourself. You men, tonight or tomorrow morning, when you try to erase the 5 o'clock shadow, or when you shave that ugly-looking physiognomy that in moments of great pride you call a face, you get some time to think, because the only time we have to think now is in the shave and in the bath, we are so busy doing nothing and getting nowhere, but we are awful busy at it—will you ask yourself this question: "What have I, as a Lion, actually done to help protect my fine family, my job, my church, my country, and my system of freedom from the attacks of Communists at home and abroad? What have I done except grumble and gripe?"

If you can't answer it, make a resolution to do something while you have time, because, as they learned in Czechoslovakia, if you don't do it while you still have time, it is too late.

And you ladies, as you sit on that spindly piece of furniture trying on that specimen of feminine haberdashery that you sometimes call a hat, and that we men wonder what it is, or as you spend the 15 customary minutes compelling your husband to wait for an appointment for which you are already late, while you put some little red and white come-hither all over your face, will you ask yourselves a question now, in front of the mirror in your boudoir, "What have I done, as a mother or as a housewife, actually now, except complain, to help promote the cause of freedom in an era when it finds itself outnumbered by Communist-controlled individuals?"

And if you can't answer that constructively, write a letter to your Senator or send him a wire before you go to bed, or form a little organization at home to explain to the people of your community that communism is not a political party, it is not an economic theory; it is an international godless conspiracy trying to take over the world.

And then all of you ask yourselves, "Since communism thrives because a small group of men in the capital city of each country have control of too many people and push too many people around, what can I do, as an American, to prevent a small group of people in my Capital City, in my country, from getting enough control and taking enough of the public resource and spending enough of the individual income and exercising enough of the decisions of the doctors and the farmers and the businessmen and the laborers so that ultimately here, too, too few people will control too many individuals for too long a time?"

The formula has some similarity there. If we are smart enough to analyze and understand; once we realize that it was the technique of getting the people's money away from them and taking the powers of decision away from them that enabled Hitler and Mussolini and Stalin to come into power, that there are no great differences between them, because nazism, fascism, communism, national socialism, and the planned economy all have much more similarity than they have differences among them, then we can start effectively defending freedom. They are all operated in the same way. Each is a politician's paradise—and becomes a people's poorhouse.

It has been good to be here. You are a great gang, good enough to be Kiwanians, good enough, all of you, to be sitting down there under the South Dakota banners with those fellow citizens of mine. I am happy to have had a chance to come and talk to you straight from the heart and off the cuff. I am sorry that I couldn't do it with a Harvard accent, so you would get at least something of the original, but I have done the best I could with the Midwestern accent that I have. And, anyhow, I am one of those fellows who thinks perhaps we have been paying pretty high taxes for a long time now in this country because we have been listening to a Harvard accent for far too long a time.

SENATOR WATKINS REPORTS—WHAT OUR BLUNDERING FOREIGN POLICY HAS DONE TO AMERICA

ANNOUNCER. Ladies and gentlemen, this is your Washington reporter bringing you a 15-minute program featuring your United States Senator, ARTHUR V. WATKINS. Senator WATKINS appears weekly on these programs entitled The Senator Reports which come to you transcribed from Washington as a public service by this radio station.

And now, Senator WATKINS.

Senator WATKINS. Hello, Utahans. An honest report from Washington these days cannot be entirely cheerful. There is small cause for immediate cheering, and that is true even though we do have the greatest country in the world, outstripping as it does every other country in production. The fight against godless tyranny must go on despite our present weakness in preparation.

But immediate problems have to do with taxes—with increased taxes, a complete reversal of what we thought earlier was going to be the news about taxes. Controls of all kinds are again in the Congressional mill. Rationing in the immediate future becomes a distinct possibility. Allocations of scarce materials and particularly those needed in the war effort are almost a certainty. A complete change in policy in other fields is also in the making.

A wave of public sentiment in favor of strict controls comes largely as a consequence of hysterical buying and hoarding by the public. As a result, stand-by powers for the President in all these fields are almost certain to be authorized by Congress. Laws providing for them may be on the books when this broadcast reaches you.

The men who have been overseas in the last war and who had reason to believe that they had won the great battle against dictatorships, now find that the job is not completed. A far more powerful dictatorship than those destroyed now challenges the existence of the free world.

In many respects we are right back where we were at the beginning of World War II except that we do not now have the resources and other strong nations as allies to help us win the present contest. Some of our former allies are now enemies and our allies have grown weaker. As a matter of comparative danger, we now face the most deadly peril that America has faced in its 174 years of history.

I would be only too glad to bring all good news in this report. To be sure, there are sound things in our economy. We do have a great people who have accomplished modern day miracles. But an analysis of our present perilous position convinces me that Americans as a rule have placed too much confidence and power in their leaders. They have taken too many things for granted. Things have come too easy. Inflation on the early upswing is easy to take. It is difficult to believe we have been living in a fool's paradise. The Korean episode with all its revelations has brought us to our senses with a rude shock.

There is now serious questioning of our leaders. It comes not only from men who are now facing a second long period away from home in the Armed Services, but from every nook and corner of the United States and from all classes of people.

Official Washington is in on it, not only asking questions but is being required to answer them. One Senator who spent a few days at home declared that in the Middle West the home folks have very little confidence in Washington officials.

Dorothy Thompson, famous columnist, declares that we are now on the road to total conscription and total control of everything—life, labor, capital and income, by the state. "Accompanying this development," says Miss Thompson, "will be the old demand for 'unity,' the protest 'don't rock the boat,' and the urge to 'trust our leaders.' To raise disagreeable questions will soon become tantamount to 'conspiring with the enemy.'

"Before this state of affairs is achieved, and we are reduced to the condition described in the late George Orwell's '1984,' let us then raise a few questions.

"Why should we trust our leaders?

"Have the policies they have hitherto pursued brought us peace, stability, and international security, or have they brought us war, inflation, and international chaos?

"We have had a continuing administration in office since 1933, or at least have one now, which has defended all the international acts of its predecessors backed up by some bipartisan Republicans. Many of the persons who advised these acts are still advising. It is now apparent that they did not know for what purpose they were leading us in the last war; that they were afflicted with an almost incredible blindness to geographical, political and social realities; that, for the sake of world peace they vested the security of the United States in an international organization incapable, because of its composition and structure, of framing, let alone enforcing, international law, and that now, via that body, we are again engaged in war for the purpose of 'enforcing peace.'"

One need not agree in whole with Miss Thompson in her conclusions. She, however, has put her finger on one of the real causes of our difficulties.

There isn't any doubt that the prime obstacle to peace in the world today is Soviet Russia and communism. But an additional reason, and without which Russia wouldn't have been the menace she is today, was the misguided, bungling, blundering foreign policy of the United States of recent times and specifically since the shooting ended and the cold war began.

In the recent book entitled "The Great Mistakes of the War," by Hanson W. Baldwin, of the New York Times staff, and perhaps this country's most penetrating military writer, the broad question of our mistakes in diplomacy and in military affairs are pointed up with embarrassing realism.

Baldwin's emphatic criticisms are full of meaning for the present and the future as well as the past; and these mistakes of diplomacy do have a tremendous influence upon the domestic affairs of this countr, and the lives of every man, woman, and child in it.

Mr. Baldwin pointed out that there are forces at work in international politics that are but the continuation of wars, and wars in turn are but the continuation of the peacetime forces of international politics. These forces are not frozen during a so-called peacetime era. Wise statesmen take account of all of these forces and so plan the permanent policy of their countries to the ultimate preservation of the interests and ideals of those countries.

Peace, of course, is the great desire of all peoples, and peace is planned for on the terms most favorable to the point of view in a nation. It is not enough to excuse our makers of foreign policy during the period in discussion, to say that there was no evidence of Communist purposes before the Second World War began; history has shown that that is not a fact. The Communist purposes were known before the advent of World War II. But our planners brushed aside the wise suggestions of Churchill, and our wartime President and his military high command staked all upon the military expediency of defeating the Japanese and German alliance and without looking beyond it to the ominous and already apparent dangers of communism.

One of their great mistakes that came largely as a result of mistaken foreign policy was the recognition of Russia. This gave Russia great power and influence in the world This move was made, notwithstanding Presidents Wilson, Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover had denied it.

Our policy made us unready in the Philippines when World War II was initiated.

We refused to adopt Churchill's "soft underbelly" strategy—that is, we refused to attack through the Balkans instead of over the west front. If we had followed Churchill, Russia would have been pinned largely within her own boundaries.

We demanded unconditional surrender of the Axis forces, thus signing the death knell of the underground forces or of any responsible governments with which we could sign treaties of peace.

We adopted the Morgenthau plan which meant the destruction of the industries upon which the peoples of the Axis countries must live. We are now in a weak way trying to restore some of those industries and as time goes on, the error of that policy is becoming more painfully apparent.

Then there was the pause in World War II before Berlin, Prague, and Vienna, when we should have been marching into those cities with Eisenhower's advance forces. Our holding back allowed Russia to take possession.

Another grave mistake was the agreement which permitted Russia to encircle Berlin and left us without a right-of-way into the west section of that city which was awarded us by the same agreement. The costly Berlin blockade and the airlift came as a result of this blunder.

And then there was the much disputed bombing of Japanese cities with the atomic bomb.

The crowning error of all was the capitulation to the Russians at Yalta. At that very moment we should have done everything possible within our power to keep Russia out of the Japanese war. By that act we set Russia up as the dominant power in Eastern Europe and in the Balkans, and made the Communist conquest of China almost inevitable. Events since that time have helped Russian efforts to consolidate the big victories won at Yalta.

We did have an opportunity, however, to rectify part of the damage done at Yalta. We could and should have supported the Nationalists in China in their fight against the Communists before it was too late. Acting under the policy of the State Department to appease Communists in Asia, in contrast to its policy of fighting it in Europe, we tried to force the Nationalist government to accept Communists in its councils, and then, in high dudgeon when it wouldn't do that, we pulled out of China and said "plague on both your houses."

One of the secondary errors was the wanton destruction of German and Japanese industry under the direction of theoretical social reformers and military people who knew not what they were doing. We have been paying large sums for the support of both the Germans and the Japanese largely because we left them with very little with which to earn their own living, and now that we are in great danger, it has become painfully apparent that sooner or later we shall have to rearm these same Germans and Japanese to help fight the teeming hordes of Communists. And to help them defend themselves as well as us we may soon be rebuilding their industries we have dismantled.

Then last of all has been the Acheson policy of Asia, which has permitted to a large extent the consolidation of Communist gains made at Yalta. It is generally conceded here in Washington and most of the allied capitals that our policy in Asia as revealed to the world through Acheson's speeches and his directions to State Department employees throughout Asia, was an invitation to the Communists to move into South Korea. It should be remembered that we announced that Korea was not defensible from a military point of view and that our line of defense was through Alaska, the Aleutians, Japan, Okinawa and the Philippines.

The record will show that pointing out all of these errors is not all second guessing. That record is too long to detail here, but the proof exists and I believe most of you will remember it.

Let me repeat our foreign policy concerns intimately and acutely every living person in this country. That should never be forgotten, but most Americans don't realize it.

Consider for a moment some of the following:

Our heavy expenditures under the Marshall program put the United States in direct competition with its own citizens for scarce goods. That raised high prices higher. It was inflation. Not only that, but we had to pay higher taxes to get the money to send to the Marshall-plan countries.

The recognition of Russia by this country made her strong. It gave her credit and standing in the world. We are now expending billions more in dollars to help offset that strength.

Our military appropriations are all affected by that recognition. We refused to attack Germany through the Balkans as Churchill argued. We are confronted with strong Russian forces in east Germany and in Austria. We are paying immense sums to offset that strength. We have had to keep a larger defense force in Germany and Austria to meet it.

We demanded unconditional surrender. As a result we have had to set up our own military government in Germany and Austria and in Japan. Our occupation costs have been running at $2,000,000,000 a year since the war ended.

Our errors at Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam contributed heavily to the present strength of Russia. Every dollar we are required to expend in preparing to defend against that great power was made necessary to some extent by these errors.

And from a practical every-day point of view, it may be worth while to remember that because of their blunders we have been paying higher prices for everything. You will be required to pay higher taxes. Many needed public works projects in the United States will have to be cancelled or postponed indefinitely. Great reclamation projects in the West which could easily have been built out of the money given Europe—some $35,000,000,000 since the war ended—this money could have built nearly all these projects. Many desirable reforms in this country will have to be postponed because of the foreign situation.

In this land of ours we have relied on the two-party system throughout history to help us correct our mistakes. But the effort is now being made to shut the mouths of critics on the plea that there must be unity—there must be 100-percent support of the Commander in Chief. Even the Constitution is waived to one side. Let me remind you that if the Constitution had been followed—if the Senate had been given the right to consider the executive agreements at Tehran, Yalta, Potsdam, and elsewhere, these agreements—in effect, treaties—might never have been ratified—might never have gone into effect.

Foreign policies do affect the lives of every American, and those who have made the monumental blunders which have contributed so heavily to our present perils should be called to account. Not only that, but they must not be continued in places of high responsibility where they can get us into more trouble.

[A weekly radio feature over Utah stations, week of August 20, 1950]

SENATOR WATKINS REPORTS—HAS THERE REALLY BEEN A BIPARTISAN FOREIGN POLICY?

ANNOUNCER. Ladies and gentlemen, this is your Washington reporter bringing you transcribed the Senate Reports, a 15-minute program featuring your United States Senator ARTHUR V. WATKINS. Senator WATKINS' weekly program is brought to listeners as a public service by this radio station. And now, Senator WATKINS.

Senator WATKINS. Hello, Utah. In this week's report I want to talk to you frankly and straight from the shoulder on a number of questions that are being repeatedly put to me as well as to other Members of the Congress.

First and foremost in everyone's mind these days is the war in Korea and the possibility of World War III. People are justly apprehensive; young people who are just starting out in life, establishing homes, are having their plans completely upset; young men in college are wondering if they will ever be able to finish their course; boys in high school face the prospect, if the universal military training bill passes, of immediately being called to take at least 6 months training, and I could go on at length on this topic.

I am sure, Mr. Reporter, that we have had a number of questions on the Korean war sent in by mail and otherwise which require answers. Let's proceed with some of these questions.

ANNOUNCER. Senator WATKINS, judging from our correspondence and discussion in the public press, it appears many Americans do not understand just what is meant by the so-called bipartisan foreign policy. This question has been brought to the front again through public statements issued by Senator LODGE and other Republican members of the Foreign Relations Committee in which they attack the foreign policy record of the administration.

Will you explain how this so-called bipartisan policy has worked in the past?

Senator WATKINS. There has been a great deal of misunderstanding on the meaning of the bipartisan foreign policy. The public has been sold on the idea that this policy is worked out in complete agreement between Republicans and Democrats, and as a result, all Members of Congress are bound to follow it. Anyone who disagrees is a dissenter, or to use a real smear word, he is an isolationist. Here is how it has actually worked as far as the Senate is concerned in the past.

The President and his Secretary of State are, under the Constitution, charged with the initiation of foreign policy and determining what it shall finally be. The Secretary of State discusses the proposed policy with the Foreign Relations Committee in secret sessions. Republican members of the committee hear these discussions. If the discussions in the committee are not sufficient, he has in the past discussed the proposals individually with Republican members. But the Republican members, even though they may have taken part in the formation of the policy, have not discussed the proposals with all other members of the Republican Party in the Senate. Those of us not on the Foreign Relations Committee have been to a large extent left in the dark. We do not know what the policy agreed upon is to be until we read about it in the newspapers or until the President sends a message to Congress.

ANNOUNCER. Senator WATKINS, has there ever really been a bipartisan action in the formation of foreign policy as a matter of practical operation?

Senator WATKINS. No; there hasn't been, except in a limited way. Senator VANDENBERG, who has been given credit for initiating such a policy, has said very emphatically that he never had claimed that it was bipartisan; that he personally never had the right to speak for the rest of the Republicans.

Last December, when I returned to Washington, there was some discussion in the public press whether there would be a continuation of the bipartisan foreign policy. I, and other Senators who had never been consulted about any of these matters in advance of being made public, said in press interviews that there hadn't been any real bipartisan policy and that we were very much opposed to having it called a bipartisan policy or having Republicans bound by what was done.

Senator VANDENBERG, noting the press statements, wrote me a letter under date of December 28, 1949, on this subject. I quote from this letter:

"DEAR ARTHUR: Since the 'pangs' of my convalescence still keeps me 'under wraps' a good deal of the time, this is my first chance to tell you that I liked your interview in the Washington Post following my press conference upon my return to the Capitol. I am writing because I enjoy emphasizing our agreements instead of our occasional disagreements.

"I totally agree with you—as you yourself were kind enough to indicate—that I have no warrant to speak for the Republican Party in determining foreign policy, and I think I have categorically disclaimed any such mandate in every speech I have ever made on the subject. Any pretense to the contrary—as too often implied in the press—has always been a source of embarrassment to me and, I would think, to my Republican colleagues. You cannot say it too often to suit me. I should like to have total acquittal from any such presumption. I have no authority—and never have had or never will claim it—to commit my Republican colleagues in the Senate to anything.

"What I do have is the responsibility of leading the discussions and the explorations in respect to foreign policy, and this responsibility comes to me on the direct orders of my colleagues when they approve my designation as ranking Republican on the Foreign Relations Committee.

"Again, I totally agree with you when you say that the two-party system (which I consider indispensable) cannot function 'unless we of the opposition party debate the (foreign policy) issues thoroughly upon the floor'; and when you say that 'the time for a waters' edge unity is after the decision has been reached.' There can be no effective, ultimate unity except as free minds meet in free debate. I also mean that from the bottom of my heart."

Senator VANDENBERG's position, in my opinion, is absolutely sound. I believe his letter clears up a basic misunderstanding of just what is meant by our bipartisan foreign policy.

ANNOUNCER. Senator WATKINS, you mentioned a moment ago that if we had any bipartisan foreign policy at all that it was a limited one. Just what did you mean by that?

Senator WATKINS. In the first place, I meant that what has been described by the press as a bipartisan foreign policy is in effect limited to a few Republican Senators on the Foreign Relations Committee and not to the entire party. As a matter of fact, there has never been more than a mention of foreign policy in our Senate Republican conferences where matters of policy are usually discussed. I have been present at all of them, and I know there has been a studied effort to keep away from consideration of this subject.

In the second place, the so-called bipartisan policy has been limited to matters of policy with respect to our relations in Europe and defense of the Atlantic community countries. In this field, Senator VANDENBERG has been consulted. In fact, he has initiated some of the policies, such as the Atlantic Pact and the so-called Vandenberg resolution. He also initiated the Rio Pact wherein the United States and other American Republics join forces.

When its comes to our Asiatic and Pacific policies, Senator VANDENBERG declares that he has never been consulted. He is corroborated in this by other Republican members of the Foreign Relations Committee. The first the Republican members of this committee would hear about Asiatic or Pacific policies would be when they were announced in the press or when the President sent a message to the Congress. Certainly no Republican, even in a limited way, could be bound by such conduct of foreign affairs with respect to Asia and the Pacific.

That is why even Senator VANDENBERG was willing to join in approving the substance of the Lodge-Smith-Wiley-Hickenlooper statement which the Democrats have been denouncing so bitterly for the last 10 days.

ANNOUNCER. Why do you think the Republicans were not consulted in initiating our policies for Asia and the Pacific, Senator WATKINS?

Senator WATKINS. I can't read the minds of the President and his advisers, but as you know, the President usually takes the advice of the State Department on matters of this kind. For some reason, Secretary Acheson particularly did not want to consult the Republicans in the formation of our Asiatic policy. Our policy for Asia and the Pacific has, until the Korean incident, been largely an appeasement of Russia. We practically sold China out at Yalta. China fell because of our lack of support of the Nationalists, and the Russians, no doubt, felt Korea would be easy picking because the State Department announced we didn't intend to defend that country.

ANNOUNCER. Senator WATKINS, what is likely to be the practical effect of the division in the Foreign Relations Committee on the question of our foreign policy? Do you think this break will seriously affect the security of the United States?

Senator WATKINS. I don't think it will. In fact, I believe that had the Republicans been more critical at an earlier stage in the development of our Asiatic and Pacific policies, there might have been a reversal by the President a long time before the Korean episode happened; had such a reversal come earlier, the free nations would not have lost China and we would not now be fighting in Korea.

Also, I believe it is a good thing to have an opposition party which would subject the various proposals made on foreign policy to a critical analysis. In fact, I think it is the duty of the opposition party to do just that, because that is our only protection.

ANNOUNCER. Senator WATKINS, there has been considerable discussion in the press on this very question, hasn't there? Could you give us an example?

Senator WATKINS. Let me call your attention to an editorial in the New York Herald Tribune which is a strong internationalist paper. Let me quote from this editorial, published August 15:

"In bringing Korea into current political discussion the Republicans have raised anew the old question of the proper role of an opposition party under the American constitutional system. It has been easy for the Democrats to act shocked and grieved, as if it were a crime to focus attention upon past errors of the administration. Less politically minded citizens have questioned whether raising issues of foreign policy may not create dangerous divisions among us. Yet the fact remains that constitutional government, as the free peoples understand it, requires criticism and dissent—in short, an organized opposition. We are a two-party Nation, and if the Republicans do not act as the opposition, no other group can. As for eliminating from the political forum all questions of defense and foreign policy, that would be tantamount to saying that a free people can discuss secondary matters, but that it must fall silent and acquiescent where the great issues are involved that affect its liberty and its very life."

ANNOUNCER. That sounds like a sensible statement, Senator WATKINS. Have you been able to apply it in your activities with respect to the foreign policy?

Senator WATKINS. I am in full accord with the Herald Tribune editorial. I have asked many questions about our foreign relations and I have been critical at times of policies proposed. As soon as they have been adopted by Congress, in a few instances over my opposition, I have proceeded to support these policies because they have been established by both the President and the Congress. I will continue to support them unless I am convinced that they are utterly dangerous for the country. In that event, of course, I will follow my conscience and call them to the attention of the proper officials and to the people of the country if necessary.

ANNOUNCER. Thank you, Senator WATKINS.

Curtailment of Mail Service

OF

HON. WILLIAM LANGER

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 24 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial entitled "A Proper Mail Service," published in the Cincinnati Times-Star on August 18, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A PROPER MAIL SERVICE

By a margin big enough to override a threatened Presidential veto, the House has passed and sent to the Senate a bill to restore the cuts in mail service ordered last April by Postmaster General Donaldson.

This was a proper move and a deserved rebuke to the Postmaster General and to the President who backed him up in a picayunish but costly gesture of economy. The cut in mail deliveries, it is said, will save the taxpayers $70,000,000 a year. Maybe it will. But it has caused a serious inconvenience, especially in suburban areas, to taxpayers who will continue to shell out not millions but billions for administration ventures that benefit only specially favored groups.

If the administration had tried, and failed, to carry out the recommendations of the Hoover Commission for real economies in the postal service, it might have been morally justified in backing the Donaldson order as a second-best economy move. But it has given only lip service, and not much of that, to the Hoover proposals. And it has effectively opposed all efforts by Senator DOUGLAS and others for cutting down the swollen nonmilitary budget. In the circumstances, the cry for economy from the White House has a hollow ring.

If the Senate gets a chance to vote on this bill it will undoubtedly back up the House, and probably with a safe margin to overcome a veto. The danger is that the Senate won't be allowed to vote on it. Administration lieutenants threaten to hold up the measure in the crowded session.

Congress has many things to do before the planned recess in early September. National defense is, of course, the paramount concern. But in view of all the weeks that were wasted in opposition to efforts for real economy, and remembering our prospective $3,000,000,000 deficit before Korea, the public should demand as of right a proper mail service.

The Role of the Opposition

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR V. WATKINS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 24 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "The Role of the Opposition," published in the New York Herald Tribune on August 16, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ROLE OF THE OPPOSITION

In bringing Korea into current political discussion the Republicans have raised anew the old question of the proper role of an opposition party under the American constitutional system. It has been easy for the Democrats to act shocked and grieved, as if it were a crime of lese-majesty to focus attention upon past errors of the administration. Less politically minded citizens have questioned whether raising issues of foreign policy may not create dangerous divisions among us. Yet the fact remains that constitutional government, as the free peoples understand it, requires criticism and dissent—in short, an organized opposition. We are a two-party Nation, and if the Republicans do not act as the opposition, no other group can. As for eliminating from the political forum all questions of defense and foreign policy, that would be tantamount to saying that a free people can discuss secondary matters, but that it must fall silent and acquiescent where the great issues are involved that affect its liberty and its very life.

In the present situation, it is suggested that the Republicans do not have the right to criticize the Democrats for past mistakes except insofar as they were invariably right and farsighted themselves. It would be agreeable to be able to maintain that the Republicans always had been right, but this is neither necessary nor, in the circumstances, possible. By the nature of the constitutional system, the opposition in the United States is lacking in leadership as well as in defined responsibility. It inevitably gives rise to diverse and conflicting views. To the extent that Republicans in the Congress and elsewhere have, during these years out of power, failed to avert errors or have proposed false views of their own, they make their role as the opposition party the more hazardous and difficult. But they are not relieved thereby of their duty to oppose. The Democrats have possessed day-to-day control of our affairs, with the enormous power, both direct and indirect, with which the Constitution endows the Presidential office. The responsibility has been theirs, and in the end they must be called to account.

The fact that the Republicans must play, and are beginning to play very effectively, the part of the opposition does not mean that there are no limits upon their conduct. It is inconceivable that they should jeopardize the national interest for the sake of the partisan advantage. The major statements which have been made on foreign affairs thus far—the manifesto of the four Republican Senators on the Foreign Relations Committee and the speech last evening by Mr. Stassen—have both been distinguished by an awareness that frank criticism does not make cooperation impossible or forestall the re-creation of a sounder and more firmly based bipartisanship. It is this search for an ultimate agreement which lifts these criticisms above what Senator CONNALLY called quarrelsome and pettifogging attacks, placing them on the high level where our historic controversies have been fought out and settled.

Rearming Germany

OF

HON. LEVERETT SALTONSTALL

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 24 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an article entitled "Rearming the Germans," written by Mr. Walter Lippmann, and published in this morning's Washington Post. The article is particularly descriptive of the situation in Germany.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TODAY AND TOMORROW—REARMING THE GERMANS

(By Walter Lippmann)

Enough has already been said in public about rearming the western Germans to enable us to define the first big issue which has to be decided. We have to choose between two very different conceptions. One is that the west Germans should be armed specifically in order to deal with the east German forces. The other and very different view is that they should be armed in order to become the hard core of the ground forces alined against the armies of the Soviet orbit.

The discussion has shown, it seems to me, that it is necessary and that it is feasible to proceed at once to prepare west German forces capable of defeating aggression, in the North Korean style, by the east Germans. The discussions have also shown, it seems to me, that the idea of recruiting the Germans as the shock troops of a European or an Atlantic army raises problems which, even if they are not insoluble, are certainly not soluble soon.

It seems to me reasonably clear that unless we deal first with the question of German internal security against civil war, we shall create only confusion. To authorize and help equip a west German militia strong enough not to be overcome by the east Germans is a limited but an attainable objective. To treat west Germany as a reserve of military manpower which can be drawn upon by the Atlantic nations is an unlimited objective. Under no conceivable circumstances could even 20 west German divisions be recalled, retrained, and reequipped quickly for international war.

The prudent and practical thing to do is not to bite off more than anyone can chew, and to approach the momentous question of German rearmament as statesmen concerned with the future of the German Nation and state, not in the manner of recruiting sergeants drumming up enlistments.

Dr. Adenauer told us the other day that before western Germany could safely rearm the United States would have to establish a "protective curtain" of at least 10 United States armored divisions. The Germans say that they must be defended while they are preparing to defend themselves. If we analyze this German argument, what we find is that they want us to be near a total mobilization with—for us—a large army already in Europe, before they mobilize.

This is very different from the fantasy of the wishful thinkers in Whitehall and in the Pentagon that the Germans have just what we lack—namely lots of infantry aching and itching to put on a uniform and to start marching again. Dr. Adenauer's comment on this mirage is that first we should mobilize our own infantry and place it between the Elbe and the Rhine.

Dr. Adenauer has not yet spoken publicly, unless I have missed it, on the other German objections. It is that a German army of any size worth talking about can be recruited only by conscription. Not even the Germans, the most martial of the civilized nations, ever recruited their infantry by volunteering. What is more, no large German army can be raised, can be trained, and can be commanded except by German officers and a German general staff.

To raise an army by conscription is very near to being the ultimate exercise of sovereignty. We must not deceive ourselves into thinking that the government in Bonn, which lacks almost all the attributes of sovereignty, can or will recreate the German army before it has recovered full and equal sovereignty, including the recognition that Germany is a great European power with a foreign policy which is made in Germany.

My own view is that all this is going to happen. But it is going to happen, not in order to provide troops for a hypothetical war in 1952–54, but in the course of the natural revival of the German nation and its return as a principal power in Europe.

We should encourage the revival of Germany particularly in close alliance with France. But we should not look upon the Germans, whom we have defeated and disarmed, as a reserve of military manpower upon which we can now draw.

The self-respecting and the practical thing to do is to arm the Germans for their own internal security. Until they have recovered full sovereignty, a greater military effort than that should not be asked of them nor can it be expected. For the time being we can leave it at that. Yet if only we could do that much, and do it effectively, it would add immeasurably, perhaps decisively, to the security of all of western Europe. For the greatest danger of a general war is the outbreak of a German civil war. All of us would quickly be sucked into a German civil war.

If the western allies could agree clearly and firmly on this limited objective, they could then, I think, take a salutary and constructive action. They could reconvene the Council of Foreign Ministers and they could tell Mr. Vishinsky that they have decided to authorize and to equip forces in western Germany similar to those in eastern Germany though, of course, three times as large since western German has about three times as many people who need to be policed and protected. Since this would be following the precedent established by the U. S. S. R. in its zone, the western allies could say to Mr. Vishinsky that they know he will regard their decision as conforming to the Potsdam agreement.

They should, however, add that since the existence of two German military forces is a danger to the peace of Germany and of the world, they would be glad to consider proposals for German internal security which recognized the principle that the German police and militia in all parts of Germany should be in proportion to the population.

Governmental Mistakes Leading to Hostilities in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BOURKE B. HICKENLOOPER
OF IOWA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 24 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial entitled "Mistakes of the Future," published in the September 1950 issue of the Farm Journal.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MISTAKES OF THE FUTURE

The mess in Korea high-lights grievous mistakes in recent American statesmanship. That this Asiatic peninsula, with no strategic military importance to the United States, must be the scene of a bloody struggle, proves once again that all mistakes must be paid for. The price for governmental errors always comes high.

In order that future mistakes may be fewer, those of the past should not be dismissed. They should be studied.

The route to Korean bloodshed began back in 1933, when our Government recognized Soviet Russia. Much has been lost by the appeasement policies which the administrations since then have followed. We gave the Soviets generously of lend-lease materials, with little in return. We yielded to Stalin by making the second front in Normandy. Had that attack been made from the Mediterranean, Russia would not today be solidly installed in half of Europe. We stopped our advancing armies so that Russians could be first to enter Berlin—an error that cost millions for the airlift later, and that may yet cost far more to protect western Europe.

We suspended the war with no plans for winning the peace. At Cairo, Tehran, and Yalta concessions were made to Stalin which set the Communists up in business in China, Korea, and elsewhere in the Orient.

Then our confused and infested State Department faltered year after year over China. Bemused by attempting to mix into the economic affairs of half the world, it failed miserably to head off the Communist control which now holds China in iron grip.

Meanwhile, a 1948 campaign money raiser was made Secretary of Defense. Recommendations for defense expenditures were whittled, while nondefense spending mounted to unprecedented figures. The Navy was weakened, the Air Forces throttled down, and the Army limited, while the illusion of adequate preparedness was fostered in the public mind.

The Voice of America was held to an illmanaged whisper, while Russian propaganda against the United States blanketed the earth.

Soft methods have enabled Communists and their helpers to penetrate deeply into American industry. Should world war be resumed, American action could be crippled in countless ways by Communist sabotage from within.

The Nation has been weakened internally by governmental borrowing, which has cut down the value of savings.

Bad examples in high places have impaired moral standards and have weakened another great source of strength.

This is a gloomy record. We regret that it can be recited. America deserves more glorious history than this.

The mistakes which have been made cannot be reversed. They can only be paid for in the high currency of blood and treasure. We are the people and cannot escape the cost.

If the courage, character, and good sense of the people will rise this autumn to choose patriotic, Nation-minded representatives for Congress, the United States may begin again to make history with more triumphs and fewer errors.

Speculation in Rubber Trading

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GUY M. GILLETTE
OF IOWA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 24 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, an article entitled "Large Possible Profits in Trading in Rubber Bring New Margin," written by Thomas P. Swift and published in the New York Times of August 6, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LARGE POSSIBLE PROFITS IN TRADING IN RUBBER BRING NEW MARGIN—COMMODITY EXCHANGE HERE, SEEKING TO CURB RUN-AWAY SPECULATION, SETS $5,000 FIGURE—940 PERCENT RETURN IN FEW MONTHS CITED

(By Thomas P. Swift)

Washington officials complained vehemently last week about the unwarranted speculation in commodities since the Communist attack on South Korea and decried the high profits—ranging from 100 to 400 percent—which speculators had extracted as a result of booming prices in such items as lard, cottonseed oil, soybeans, cotton, and wheat.

They overlooked the prize commodity of them all—natural crude rubber.

Run-away markets in this important war item have created a situation where profits have run as high as 940 percent. A speculator who put up the required margin of $800 to purchase one contract of rubber on the commodity exchange in the early part of this year would show a profit of some $7,500 at the closing price on Friday, assuming he had the financial acumen to stay with his original purchase contract.

As the exchange closed on Friday, the nearby September delivery of a rubber futures contract sold at 54.30 cents a pound bid, with few offerings in sight. The low price for the September contract was 17.20 cents a pound—providing a differential of 37.10 cents a pound or, as measured by exchange dealings, 3,710 points. Each point in a rubber futures contract (22,400 pounds) is equivalent to $2.24. To be exact, a September contract is now worth $8,310.40.

However, whether Washington can do anything about the situation—other than to accelerate the reactivation of this Nation's synthetic rubber plants—remains to be seen. Several of our synthetic rubber plants—which proved a salvation in World War II are being pushed into production once again, but time is of the essence in the stockpiling of such a strategic commodity. Meanwhile, prices are skyrocketing as Russia is actively buying rubber by the shipload and speculators are reaping a harvest in the primary markets at Singapore and London.

Realizing the gravity of the situation, the board of governors of the Commodity Exchange at a special meeting late on Friday took drastic action to preserve the exchange's normal economic function as a meeting place for buyers and sellers. Margins were jumped to $5,000 a contract, effective at the opening of business tomorrow. This margin boost, the third within a month, lifted the level of funds required to buy one rubber contract to nearly 50 percent of the contract's current value. One short month ago $800 would have been sufficient to turn such a deal.

Until World War I, rubber was solely a natural vegetable product produced principally from a tree known as hevea braziliensis. The dense jungles of the Amazon, careless marketing, and production difficulties greatly restricted the supply of rubber until the hevea tree was successfully transplanted to the Far East. The unique properties of rubber were first recognized by the English who succeeded in germinating the seeds of the hevea tree which had been taken from Brazil to London.

Successful plantings of these seedlings were made in the far-eastern colonies of Great Britain at the end of the nineteenth century. From there the cultivation of rubber trees spread successively throughout Ceylon, India, British Malaya, the Netherlands East Indies, British Borneo, Sarawak, Siam, Burma, and French Indochina. Until the beginning of the twentieth century, world production of rubber did not exceed 40,000 tons a year. By the time World War II got under way, world production totaled some 1,600,000 tons, virtually all of which was accounted for by plantations established in the Far East. The Japanese soon ended that supply.

During the First World War, Germany developed and produced in limited quantities a synthetic product having rubber-like qualities. As World War II loomed, Germany had improved the quality and increased its capacity for this substitute for natural rubber with the result that she was entirely independent of sources of the natural product.

In the United States, prior to World War II, special-purpose synthetic rubber had been produced only in small quantities, principally for its oil-resistant features. Shortly after Pearl Harbor this country was cut off from the source of 97 percent of the supply of natural rubber.

Within a span of 2 years, the United States Government, in collaboration with the rubber manufacturing industry and the petroleum industry, designed and constructed plants capable of producing over 1,000,000 tons of synthetic rubber a year. This capacity, which currently is undergoing hurried reactivation, relieves us of the sole dependency on the natural product.

Universal Military Training

HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 24 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Act Now To Pass Stand-by UMT Law," published in the Philadelphia Inquirer of August 24, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ACT NOW TO PASS STAND-BY UMT LAW

Demand by nine members of the Senate Armed Services Committee that Congress stay in session until it passes a universal military training bill is based, not on the requirements of the Korean war, but on the lessons we should learn from it.

Establishment of an orderly system of training the young men who would be called upon to fight in another major war would not relieve the shortage of manpower which has been one of the biggest handicaps in the drive to turn back Communist aggression in Korea.

That shortage must be relieved by other means—calling up reserves, transfer of forces now on active duty, and the draft. Great strides have been taken to build up the American forces in Korea to the point where they have been able to stall the Red offensive. Greater ones may be required to get to the front forces strong enough to smash the North Korean Communists.

But it is vitally important that the public—and Congress—understand that the inability of UMT to solve the manpower problems of the Korean war is no reason why the training program should not be put on the books. The Korean war furnishes ample proof that systematic training, to furnish combat forces if they are needed, is imperative.

It is beyond argument that the United States would have been in much better position to stop aggression in Korea if a universal military training program had been put into effect in 1945 or 1946, as many military and civilian leaders urged. It is likely that our losses would have been considerably less, if we had been able to send large numbers of trained men the minute the Korean Reds started their attack.

That lesson ought to be applied to the future. If we can't start a genuine training program in time to help out in the Korean war, we should be all the more eager to start one in time to prevent another costly series of setbacks if another emergency should arise.

That seems to be the attitude of the nine Senators who endorsed Defense Secretary Louis Johnson's request for UMT legislation. But it is not yet the attitude of all Congressmen, and particularly of the administration's legislative leaders.

While the nine Senators and others who subscribe to their views urge Congress to stay on the job until a training measure is passed, Speaker SAM RAYBURN apparently voices the administration view when he urges that Congress finish up quickly and go home. This, he says, would show the world that the Korean war "is not a major operation."

The Korean war may not be a major operation, although it is a bigger, tougher fight than some Government officials will admit. But it is a clear warning that major operations could develop with paralyzing suddenness, and that this Nation ought to do everything it can now to prevent them.

Realistic facing of facts demands that we admit, as Gen. Omar Bradley told the Senators, that the world faces a long period of international tensions. It demands that our leaders stop trying to sweep the implications of the Korean crisis under the rug, out of fear of alarming the people, or out of a desire to postpone vital decisions until after election.

The best way to keep those tensions from erupting into something far worse is to let the world know that we're not going to be caught short on military manpower again, as we were in Korea. It is a costly process t train our youth, and a disruptive one, but it is less costly and disruptive than entering another war unprepared.

A universal military training system could not be started at this time without interfering with efforts to defeat the Communist aggressors in Korea. But plans could be made now to be put into operation later when the Korean crisis is resolved, leaving in its wake future crises to be dealth with.

This Nation and its Congress have a habit of forgetting the lessons of the past. Now, while the lessons of manpower shortage in Korea are fresh in our minds, Congress should show that it recognizes the kind of world we're living in by enacting a stand-by universal military training law.

Appointments to the Federal Judiciary

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 24 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I am grateful for the splendid response of the Nation's press to my appeal for a greater balance in appointments to the Federal Judiciary. Some of the Nation's outstanding newspapers have commented on the appalling unbalance now existing—the terrible overloading of members of one political party on the bench.

As an indication of the sentiment in my own State, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the text of three editorials. The first was published in the Janesville Gazette of Friday, August 18, and is entitled "Truman Response Was a Grim Joke." The second was printed in the Stevens Point Journal of August 15 and is entitled "Unbalanced Bench." The third was printed in the Oshkosh Northwestern of August 16 and is entitled "Need Nonpartisan Judiciary."

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Janesville Daily Gazette of August 18, 1950]

TRUMAN RESPONSE WAS A GRIM JOKE

In a recent letter to the President, Senator ALEXANDER WILEY asked him to correct "the terrible overloading of Democratic judges on the Federal court of the United States." He was renewing a fight of several years in an attempt to secure a balance on the Federal judiciary.

In 17 years of the New Deal, 192 Presidential appointments to the bench included 184 Democrats and only 8 Republicans. As Senator WILEY declares, "such lopsided unbalance makes a farce of our judicial system."

Both President Roosevelt and President Truman have followed the old Jackson philosophy, "to the victor belongs the spoils." Senator WILEY was fair enough to declare that "if a series of Republican Presidents were guilty of the same poor judgment," he would say the same thing.

President Truman's response might be funny if it were not that the lives of all Americans are directly affected by the appointment of judges to Federal courts. He tossed off the Senator's complaint with gaiety and nonchalance that has been typical of Truman strategy.

"It has always been my policy," the President wrote, "to be very careful in the selection of men who sit on the Federal bench and I am very glad to have your endorsement of that policy."

If the Chief Executive considers appointments to the Federal bench in that vein, the American people can expect little more than party patronage as usual even during a war.

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 8, Senator WILEY quotes his second letter to the President on this subject:

"1. Never before have the courts been so important. They are taking up today more momentous issues affecting more people than ever before in American history.

"2. Never before have there been so many court positions and such disproportionate overloading of these positions by members of one political party."

[From the Stevens Point Journal of August 15, 1950]

UNBALANCED BENCH

Senator WILEY points out that of 192 Federal judicial appointments since 1933, all but eight have gone to Democrats. When Mr. Roosevelt became President there were six Republicans and three Democrats on the Supreme Court. Now there is only one Republican. Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Truman have shown equal partisanship in making appointments to the circuit and district courts.

Senator WILEY, in a letter to President Truman, urges him to correct the terrible overloading of Democrats as Federal judges. Mr. WILEY's demand for a balanced Federal judiciary is reasonable. An overwhelming preponderance of judges representing, theoretically at least, one political philosophy is not wholesome in a country where national unity must be forged from diverse viewpoints.

Perhaps the element of reward for political service can never be wholly divorced from these appointments, but it could be lessened by a more equitable distribution among the two major parties.

[From the Oshkosh Northwestern of August 16, 1950]

NEED NONPARTISAN JUDICIARY

Reports from Washington are that Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, Republican, of Wisconsin, has received some hearty support among Members of Congress for his suggestion to President Truman to the effect that the President appoint some outstanding Republican judges or lawyers to the vacancies existing on the Federal bench.

The proposal by the Wisconsin Senator, who is up for renomination in the September primary for the November election, is based on the practical and fair contention that this plan would strongly reinforce the nonpartisan character that the Federal judiciary ought to have. Unfortunately, there was little of that nonpartisan and nonpolitical characteristic to be seen in Federal bench selections in the past.

During the recent hearings on the appointment of Sherman Minton to the Supreme Court, it was brought out that of 192 Federal judges appointed from 1933 onward, all but 8 have been Democrats.

The Chicago Daily News is so firmly in favor of the Wiley suggestion for the judiciary that it declares the recommendation is "so sensible that it is almost sure to be rejected" by the President. And that newspaper adds:

"In the months ahead, President Truman is going to make many appeals for bipartisan support. He could earn some by a more nonpartisan treatment of the judiciary."

Broadcast by Hon. Francis J. Myers, of Pennsylvania, to the People of Pennsylvania

OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 24 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a broadcast by me, No. 33 in my biweekly series, carried over the Pennsylvania radio stations on the week end of August 18–20, inclusive.

There being no objection, the broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The word "propaganda" is often lightly or loosely used here in America. This is readily understandable because it is impossible for us to imagine our kind of America existing without the freedoms of speech and press.

Yet these two essential freedoms are relatively newcomers to history, so far as whole nations of people are concerned. It was the young United States which took the lead among nations in demonstrating the importance of freedom of speech and press to the operation of democracy and it was our own Bill of Rights which, for the first time in history, spelled these freedoms out as unqualified guaranties to our whole Nation.

Since the late 1700's, other nations, though few in number, have followed our lead. Nonetheless, we are confronted with the unavoidable fact that freedom of speech and press is virtually meaningless for at least two-thirds of the people in the world.

Hundreds of millions of people in the world — illiterate and unlearned — have neither newspapers to read nor radios to hear. They know nothing of democratic processes because they have never lived under them; nor have they been presented with any chance to read or hear about democracy.

Other hundreds of millions have access to newspapers and do have radios to listen to, but they, too, are as deaf to the voice of democracy as are those who lack both radio and newspaper. These millions hear nothing of democracy because their own despotic governments have throttled the air waves and harnessed the press.

In Russia itself the people are fed a steady diet of propaganda handed down from the Kremlin through such organs as Pravda, Izvestia, and a completely censored radio network. But the people of Russia are not the only victims of this continuing lie. It is precisely this diet which is prepared and handed out to the satellites within the Communist orbit. Behind the iron curtain truth is treason.

Terrible as it is that the people who dwell behind the curtain are without any chance to learn the truth, the poison of Communist propaganda is being spread in tremendous volume into the countries which lie outside the curtain.

It is obvious that the Communists regard propaganda as a goal of world conquest which ranks equally with divisions of armed men. Korea itself affords us with a heart-breaking example of what Communist lies can do to an entire nation of people. In that country the Communist forces are overwhelmingly composed of Korean people. We do have, of course, conclusive proof that there are some Russians fighting with the Korean Reds, but the fact nonetheless remains that Communist propaganda has, in the period of 5 years, managed to whip up the feelings of millions of the Korean people to the point that they believe they are fighting for a just cause in making their ruthless attack upon South Korea. The facts will permit us to draw no other conclusion.

Let me give you some illustrations of the kind of propaganda which the Communists have spread through Korea. Many Koreans are, as you know, unable to read, and the Russians have relied heavily on cartoons and comic books to spread their evil gossip. Samples of this Red propaganda show Uncle Sam with a belt composed of dollar signs standing as a giant figure in the background egging the South Koreans forward to shoot at their innocent North Korean neighbors. Other messages have been addressed to the farmers of South Korea that depict Uncle Sam stealing the food which the farmers have raised—and one of these cartoons is labeled "Farmers, don't be robbed of even one grain which you have harvested with your bloody perspiration."

Russian propaganda has taught the Koreans to believe that America is a warmonger that is blocking unification of the country in order that the United States may bleed the people of their wealth.

One might wonder how the Russians have explained away the fact that the United States has spent nearly half a billion dollars in South Korea to assist in the economic recovery of the country. The Communist simply says that this aid is a form of capitalistic imperialism which intends to make slaves of the people.

But the Communists have not been content to confine their propaganda to comic books and cartoons. Captured documents include handbooks to be used by Communist agents, instructing them on the fine points of falsehood. One of these handbooks is entitled "Propaganda Material for the Compulsory Education of Primary School Children."

In the field of radio, a giant 50,000-watt station located in the North Korean capital city of Pyongyang is on the air 24 hours a day, filling the air waves of North Korea and South Korea alike with hatred and lies. And that station has been on the air for a long time.

The effectiveness of the Communist-controlled press and radio is amply borne out by the mighty machine of war which has been fashioned with the support of the North Korean people.

But the falsehoods about democracy and the hatred stirred up against America have not been confined to Korea. The Russians have used this technique in virtually every language on the globe.

I would like to digress for a moment here to observe that in recent weeks, most Americans have directed careful attention to comparisons between the armed might of the free world and that of Russia and her satellites. Those comparisons demonstrate beyond doubt that the mobilization steps that are being taken by America and by the other free nations are imperative if we are to halt the march of Red aggression.

What, as a Nation, I believe we have failed to do is to make similar comparisons between the Voice of America and the Communist propaganda machine. Those of us who, over the years, have urged that the message of democracy be carried with much greater force as a counteroffensive to Red lies have been shouted down by economy-minded Members of Congress who believed the Voice of America was already spending too much money.

Yet here are the facts: In a week's time, Russia and her satellites broadcast a total of more than 800 hours of propaganda in countless languages. The Voice of America is on the air less than 200 hours a week in some 25 languages and dialects. In other words, the Red lie is uttered more than four times for each utterance of the democratic truth.

When the Red radio in North Korea announced that students were being taken to Moscow for training in groups of 200 at one time, we could only counter this with the observation that perhaps 20 South Korean students had come to the United States to attend our universities.

The world-wide struggle in which we are engaged boils down to deciding whether the minds of men will be free or captive. The ultimate answer will simply determine whether men will be permitted to get all the facts and decide their destiny by exercise of their own conscience—or whether men will sell their freedom to tyrants who will dictate their thinking, their beliefs, and their conduct. It is as simple as this.

Where the press is censored—and when the radio merely echoes the demands of a dictator—the people have no opportunity to hear the truth. Where men are unable to learn otherwise, there can be no other answer as to the outcome: dictatorship will prevail over democracy in such a fashion that only untold force can dislodge tyranny and replace it with freedom.

The Voice of America program was established by Congress in 1945, and since that time has done an unbelievably effective job when you consider the small funds it has had on which to operate against the unlimited resources which the Communists have poured into their propaganda campaign.

You may recall having noticed in the papers some months ago that the Russians were jamming the radio programs beamed into the Soviet Union by the Voice of America. The fact that the Communists were sufficiently worried to spend the millions of dollars they did in order to drown out the message of democracy is a good indication that the Voice was shaking the faith of those forced to subsist on a diet of lies.

The jamming technique consists of broadcasting a powerful noise signal on the same frequency used for the Voice stations, with the result that the broadcast cannot be heard. Jamming can be overcome, but it is expensive to do because it requires many more stations on different frequencies.

It is, of course, evident that the Voice of America cannot be confined to radio. If we are to put across the truth about democracy, we must rely upon every information method conceivable.

So, in addition to radio, we must include books, magazines, pamphlets, and even television is not too young a medium to be neglected. We must also widen greatly our programs which bring foreign students and visitors to see America and to learn how democracy works in action.

You know—and I know—that Americans are warmongers. You know—and I know—that we do not have imperialistic designs on anyone. We know what is in our hearts, and we know that the democracy which means so much to us must be allowed to grow in the world if our own way of life is to survive.

But there are hundreds of millions of others who do not know what is in the American heart, and who, instead of learning the truth about us, are being fed the big lie of communism.

For what it would cost us to build two battleships, the voice of democracy can be raised above its present whisper, and turned into a roar of truth that will be heard above the barrage of falsehoods that the Soviets are maintaining.

Up to this time, a majority of Congress has failed to recognize the importance of this job. Some of us have fought against this blind stinginess, and have found fighting with us such men as President Truman, Gen. George Marshall, Ambassador John Foster Dulles, Bernard M. Baruch, and Gen. Bedell Smith who until recently was our Ambassador to Russia. I am forced to admit, however, that it has taken the Korean invasion to open the eyes of enough others to the need for an expanded Voice of America program. It was only when we were confronted with the unalterable fact that 15 or more divisions of native Koreans, well trained and bent on victory, had been the fruit of Soviet propaganda that the need for a greatly enlarged Voice of America program became clear to many people.

As is so often the case, the prophets who warned us that the truth about the free world must be spread to offset the Communist lie will not in all likelihood be honored in their own day. But we have been warned of this all along by such men as Elmer Davis, who served as Director of the Office of War Information during World War II, and there were other prophets such as Gen. David Sarnoff, board chairman of RCA and the great radio pioneer, who for a dozen years has relentlessly sought to encourage a vast program of truth for the darkened areas of the world. Great credit is also due men like Senator WILLIAM BENTON, of Connecticut, who was the first director of the Voice of America program. And there were many, many others from public and private life, who, drawing from their own experience in the dark lands where falsehood reigns, saw that only through a vigorous campaign could the truth be brought to suffering people.

I earnestly hope that within a short time, the Congress will vote funds necessary to counter the Communist lie. These funds must be adequate not only for Korea, but they should permit us to reach out to two-thirds or more of the people in the world with the story of democracy. It is obvious that money alone will not accomplish this. The combined efforts of private individuals and groups have done much to spread the message through programs which have sponsored foreign students in our educational institutions. Other private accomplishments have been made by Americans themselves in their visits abroad, where each has gone as an ambassador, presenting to others through himself, an insight into America and the American people.

Our goal is understanding among men—the kind of understanding so necessary if peace and freedom are to survive and grow in the world. Military might—imperative though it is—cannot do the job alone. Nor can economic aid to tottering nations—important though it is—accomplish the miracle of democracy all by itself. As I have already mentioned, the Reds have managed to explain away our military and economic aid to free nations by attacking us as warmongers and imperialists. There is an answer to that charge which is found in telling the truth. And we must give the world that answer so that all may hear.

This is your United States Senator FRANCIS J. MYERS. I hope you will listen in again on this station in 2 weeks.

The Saturday Sermon: This Nation Under God

OF
HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS
OF UTAH
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 24 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, our Chaplain, Dr. Frederick Brown Harris, following the wake of eminent predecessors, is taking over the Saturday Sermon section of the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin. The Bulletin's selection of Dr. Harris for this column is a recognition, not only of the worth and the ability of our Chaplain, but is a recognition of the position he holds and the duty he performs for the United States. The Bulletin selected for one of Dr. Harris' first columns a review concerning a book of the Senator now speaking. I ask unanimous consent that the reprint from the Philadelphia Bulletin of July 29, 1950, be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SATURDAY SERMON: THIS NATION UNDER GOD

(By Frederick Brown Harris)

This Nation is today the most significant factor in all the tangled and tragic skein of human affairs. This Nation holds in its hands the power to determine the destiny of this planet for generations to come—perhaps, forever—whether it shall be the blessing or the curse, life or death.

This Nation is today the greatest reservoir of material resources and spiritual idealism on the face of the earth. This Nation is the only serious challenge to the bid for world domination by a sinister slave system which already holds untold millions in the despotism of its iron grasp. This Nation in the providence of God has come to the kingdom for such a time as this.

All this means that to be true to America at its best is to share an awe-inspiring role in the unfolding of the divine purpose. Rather than any American should sap his Nation's strength by his own moral treason, betray her by his treachery or exploit her by his greed, it were better for him that a millstone be hanged about his neck and that he be drowned in the depths of the sea. No one can be a worthy partner in a democracy unless he helps sustain the moral and spiritual roots. If democracy withers, it will never be destroyed by suspected Reds, but by neglected roots.

The surest way to cause the fair flowers of freedom to fade is to cut the roots reaching into rich, ancestral soil in which they have been nourished, and from which, fed by springs of living water, has come their help and health. A cut flower is a doomed flower. Its beauty cannot endure because its roots have been severed. For a democracy which has fruits without roots, the undertaker called Time is already at the door.

In this frightening day it is dawning upon America as with a fresh and startling revelation that only religious faith can undergird democracy, and that when this is withdrawn some form of coercive totalitarianism, lifting an almighty state into God's throne, comes in like a flood.

PROPHETIC INSIGHT

An honored Member of the United States Senate, a national leader with a rich working background in religious, labor, educational, and international affairs, Senator ELBERT D. THOMAS, of Utah, has recently published a volume tingling with intense conviction and shot through with prophetic insight. In scintillating chapters he writes the title "This Nation Under God" in letters of fire across our national sky. To this perplexed day the distinguished Senator declares: "Everything for which democracy stands is based on religious faith. Neither enlightened self-interest nor practical ethics can make an effective substitute."

The Senator's credo is set down simply, but profoundly, as he bears witness: "To me the basic fact about our faith in God's power and our destiny is that He has blessed us with the opportunity to provide abundance for ourselves, all of us, and to share the abundance with the world—that our destiny is to hold high the flaming torch of liberty for all, and to rule over none."

WILSON'S WARNING

In this volume there is impressively pictured the unanimous procession of the American Presidents as each in his own words witnesses to the spiritual roots of America. The ultimate truth about this Nation under God has never been put more succinctly than by Woodrow Wilson, to whose world Senator THOMAS devotes a chapter. Significantly Wilson's warning sentence is from his The Road Away From Revolution. Hear it, O America.

"The sum of the whole matter is this: Our civilization cannot survive materially unless it is redeemed spiritually. Only thus can discontent be driven out and all the shadows lifted from the road ahead."

A fable tells of a spider that once slid down a single silky thread from the lofty rafter of a barn and set up an elaborate domain on a lower level. There he spread his acquisitive net, caught flies, grew slick, and prospered. One day, wandering proudly about his opulent premises, he saw the thread that stretched up into the unseen above him. What is the use of that? he cynically blurted, and snapped at it. And his filmy palace collapsed.

God forbid that a collapsed silken web should be a portent of the fate of this Nation.

Speculation in Rubber Trading

OF

HON. GUY M. GILLETTE

OF IOWA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 24 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Booming Rubber Price Trend Halted," published in the New York Journal of Commerce of August 14, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOOMING RUBBER PRICE TREND HALTED—FUTURES SKID 600 POINTS AS TRADE SEES BETTER SUPPLY, LIGHTER DEMAND

Liquidation in the nearby contracts and speculative selling in the more distant positions plunged rubber futures 600 to 560 points lower for the week's trading on the commodity exchange.

The sharp reversal in the rubber price trend followed several reports during the week of stepped-up synthetic and natural rubber production and rumors of possible restrictions on crude consumption.

BUYERS WITHDRAW

Few participants on the exchange would buy contracts during the week, although offers to sell were numerous. Limit declines were registered during the last four trading sessions after the recent boom in prices stalled at 58.30 cents for September in early trading Tuesday. September closed at 48.30 cents Friday.

Trade sources said that the market's backbone was broken Tuesday when several groups of short interests were able to cover their commitments. From that point onward, buyers were as rare as "hen's teeth," according to one dealer, and sales volume fell off sharply.

SUPPLY IMPROVEMENT SEEN

Estimates that Malayan natural rubber production this year will exceed the 685,000 long-ton figure predicted by the International Rubber Study Group in May, and expectation that the Indonesian output will total about 650,000 long tons, created a great deal of bearish sentiment in trade circles.

Furthermore, John L. Collyer, president and chairman of the board, B. F. Goodrich Co., declared Friday, that "the rate of rubber production in the United States will probably approximate 740,000 tons by the end of the year and should increase steadily during the early months of 1951 when additional facilities recently ordered by the Government to be reactivated are in operation."

Factory buying of natural rubber was withdrawn to a great extent both here and in the primary markets last week.

Meanwhile, liquidation and covering has been reducing the open interest on rubber futures dratically. Open contracts totaled 742 lots as of August 10, while on July 6 they stood at 1,079.

HIGH MARGINS CUT SPECULATION

The high margin requirements that the Commodity Exchange board of governors has placed on rubber futures contracts has effectively reduced speculative action in the market, trade sources pointed out. Rubber futures margins had been raised on three occasions during the recent run-away rubber price trend.

Futures declined the limit of 200 points again Friday as sales volume was limited to 66 contracts. There were 18 sales in September, 40 in December, 7 in March, and 1 in May delivery month.

Washington News Letter by Hon. Francis J. Myers, of Pennsylvania

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 24 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD my Washington News Letter of August 17, 1950, a personal report to the people of Pennsylvania.

There being no objection, the news letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"Bad public officials are not elected by bad citizens, but by good citizens who fail to vote" is a wise analysis of democratic government. Yet 1 out of every 4 eligible Pennsylvanians aren't registered and won't be able to vote in the general elections November 7 unless they register before September 16. So even if you're properly registered—and fully intend to vote—you can help democracy work better by urging your family and friends to do the same.

Many who have voted in the past need to register again—either because they haven't voted in the past 2 years, or because they've moved to a new voting district since last registering. Remember: If you didn't vote November 2, 1948—and haven't voted since—your registration has lapsed, even though you were properly registered before.

Too few Americans vote, despite the vital importance of citizen participation in our representative, democratic form of government. Here are some eye-opening examples:

Two out of every five eligible Pennsylvanians failed to participate in the 1948 Presidential election.

Only half of the voters turn out for non-Presidential general elections such as the one coming up this fall—yet on November 7, we choose a United States Senator, a governor, lieutenant governor, secretary of internal affairs, justice of the supreme court, a judge of the superior court, and Representatives to Congress and the State legislature.

Primary elections, where party candidates are selected, usually produce about half as many votes as are cast in general elections, so party candidates are chosen by a quarter to one-third of the total eligible to vote.

Men outnumber women as registered voters by almost 300,000 in Pennsylvania, although populationwise their numbers are about equal and women have had voting rights for about 30 years.

Getting registered isn't difficult, and it assures you the right to exercise the highest privilege of citizenship. It will take only a few moments at your county courthouse on any day up to Sepembter 16, or if you haven't time for that, inquire about the special booths for registration that will be open in your neighborhood for an evening or two before registration closes.

If you're doubtful about your eligibility to vote, check yourself off on the list below:

You must be 21 years of age on or before November 8, 1950.

A citizen of the United States for at least 1 month.

A resident of Pennsylvania for at least 1 year. However, former Pennsylvanians who have moved away and come back need only 6 months of residence, provided they were previously registered, or were born in the State.

A resident for 2 months in your voting district—election district, precinct, or division. In other words, if you move on or before September 7, you are eligible to vote in your new district.

And if you meet those requirements, you must be properly registered to vote.

You may register as a partisan or a nonpartisan voter. The advantage in partisan registration is found in the fact that you may vote in the primaries to select candidates for the party you have named. But partisan registration is meaningless in general elections: You may vote for Democratic candidates as a registered Republican, or vice versa, in general elections.

So I urge you once more to vote this fall, and to encourage members of your family and friends to do so as well. In the present critical times there is a duty on all of us to be as fully informed as possible, and to determine, with the best judgment we can muster, our choice of elected representatives in terms of their stands on the important issues of the day. Throughout the world democracy is on trial, and we measure the strength of our democracy in terms of interest, understanding, and participation of all our people in helping to shape the course of our future destiny.

FRANCIS J. MYERS.

Louis Johnson

OF
HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 24 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an address delivered by Hon. Howard Starling, of Parkersburg, W. Va., and Washington, D. C., former president of the West Virginia Society, at the society's picnic at Glen Echo on August 22.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This occasion is ideal, fellow West Virginians, to discuss the career of West Virginia's greatest native son in the public life of our United States Government, namely, Louis Johnson, of Clarksburg, Secretary of Defense, the man who really and finally unified our Armed Forces.

You know and I know that Louis Johnson has been under fire recently on account of the war in Korea. Louis Johnson has faced all his critics unflinchingly, because all through life he has been a man of rare courage and forthrightness.

I say here tonight, and I shall continue to say, that the record of our own Louis Johnson as Secretary of Defense needs no defense. That being the case, why am I talking about it? I bring up his record at this time because we as West Virginians, as fellow citizens and friends of Louis Johnson, are not going to sit idly and supinely by and let critics crucify a great leader for the sake of political expediency and for the sake of creating disunity among the American people at the most crucial moment in their history.

The critics of Louis Johnson have no foundation for their case and therefore there it rests upon sands that will rapidly shift from under them.

The people of the United States have an everlasting debt to Louis Johnson, one that can never be paid. Let us go back to those trying and dangerous days before Pearl Harbor when Louis was Assistant Secretary of War. It was in that capacity that he fathered and fought through the industrial plant mobilization that saved us from defeat in the Second World War. The debt of America to Louis Johnson for that service is a matter of record, something that no critic, no matter how untruthful, no matter how venomous, can take away from him.

Now let's come to the postwar period in which our distinguished West Virginia friend has become Secretary of Defense. This is the period since VJ-day when the American people in rising crescendo demanded that our fighting men be brought back home and that we return quickly, almost immediately, to a peacetime economy.

We all know what happened as a result of that demand of the people—a demand transmitted so strongly to Congress that our national lawmakers went down the line for demobilization, for economy, for stripping our Armed Forces to a mere shadow of their former selves, for abandoning ammunition and weapons wherever they were or dumping them into the Pacific Ocean.

Undoubtedly some of you have been reading the writings of that great war correspondent of World War II, Jim Lucas of the Scripps-Howard newspapers, who was a marine in the last war, and who after VJ-day wrote a stirring article in which he put the finger on the decline of our defense forces. Jim Lucas said that the little people of the United States always had the idea that it was the high brass and the diplomats who got us into wars as a result of military ambition and as a result of failure at the round tables of diplomacy. Jim Lucas debunked that whole business and put the finger on the little people and said it was they who were responsible to the United States for keeping us so weak defensively that a predatory enemy chooses to attack us and make us fight. Jim Lucas has no use for pacifists. And Jim wrote that it was mother and the preacher and the teacher who by demanding peace at any price—the return of our boys from the war zones, the return to peacetime economy, and by the preaching of pacifism—had so weakened the United States that attack has come. The Scripps-Howard newspapers recently reprinted that famous article by Jim Lucas, and I cannot help but refer to it here tonight. Jim Lucas is right. We know he is right, and that proves all the more that lack of justice in the attacks upon our friend Louis Johnson.

Much has been said—entirely too much—about the economizing of Louis Johnson in the budget of the Defense Department. What Secretary Johnson has done is to cut away the fat from the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force, his chief cuts having been made in the top heavy civilian establishment. We know, at least those of us who studied the situation in the past, that the Armed Forces had entirely too many civilians doing too little to justify their being on the payroll at the expense of the United States taxpayers.

To show you the progress that has been made in the spending of defense dollars for more defense, I cite you these official figures. For the 1947 fiscal year, only 6 cents—and I repeat that—only 6 cents of the military budget dollar went for weapons of all kinds, for guns and ammunition, for tanks and ships and planes. There was reason for that, namely the cost of liquidating the defense establishment after the last year and the unnecessarily heavy civilian overhead.

It will interest you to know that in the fiscal year that ended June 30 this year, a total of 19½ cents out of every defense dollar went for weapons and ammunition, tanks and ships and planes, and that out of the new money asked for by President Truman, 59 cents out of every dollar will go for hardware that will be thrown at the enemy.

The new defense money coming up also will go heavily for fighting men. It will give the United States 2,100,000 men in the Army, the Navy and the Air Forces. There will be an increase of 90 percent in the personnel of the Marine Corps. The money will be used to activate more Reserve and National Guard units.

The people and Congress called for the drastic cuts of the past in the budgets of the Armed Forces, and it was Louis Johnson who had to do the best with the money that was left. He has done his best with it, and the Nation has been maintained in as high a state of preparedness as possible under the financial circumstances.

And while Louis Johnson has been doing his best with the defense budget, he has made unification work—the unification of the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force under a single command. I firmly believe that Louis Johnson was the ideal man for this assignment, that it required a man of rare courage and fortitude—just plain guts, if you please, to go into the high ranks of the Armed Forces and bang heads together until the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force were willing to be unified and unified peacefully for the good of the common cause.

That, my friends, is another great debt that this Nation owes Louis Johnson.

At this time, I cannot help but refer to a great friend of Secretary Johnson, Representative FRANK W. BOYKIN, of Alabama, who on several recent occasions has taken the floor of the House to speak well of our great West Virginian. I am going to quote here from a speech of Mr. BOYKIN. He said:

"There is no one within or without the sound of my voice that would dare deny the fact that Louis Johnson, immediately upon assuming the job as Secretary of Defense, instituted action programs that have saved upward of $1,000,000,000 in these last 14 months to the taxpayers of the United States.

"These savings were through reductions in waste, elimination of unnecessary duplications and extravagant overheads, the money so saved was not transferred as cash back to the United States Treasury but it was used to increase the combat effectiveness of our forces in being.

"Savings effected by the closing of establishments—which were nothing but 'fat'—were transferred in such a way as to more completely bring combat units up to fighting strength. The technique was used by the Secretary of Defense equally throughout the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force to improve combat effectiveness.

"As an example, on January 1, 1950, the Army had 4,000 more men in combat units than it had in such units 6 months earlier. This was achieved by the discharge of civilians, closing of facilities, and the use of funds thus saved to pay for troops in the field. Similarly, the Navy combat effectiveness improved during that same selected period."

That ends part of Mr. BOYKIN'S quotes about Louis Johnson. The Congressman had much more to say; here are some more quotes:

"Fourteen months ago when Louis Johnson assumed office, in addition to the cries that we heard about waste and extravagance in the armed services, the membership of this House was loudly bewailing the fact that no real unification of the Armed Forces in these United States had been accomplished—despite the passage of the National Security Act in 1947.

"The criticism was then as loud against the failure of the late James Forrestal to effect unification of the services as it has been in the last 48 hours against Louis Johnson.

"Fourteen months have now passed since Louis Johnson took office. Who is there in this House that now argues that the unification of the armed services, so long desired by this House, is not now a reality?"

Congressman BOYKIN went on to ask this question:

"Who in this House now has occasion to raise his voice to find fault either with Louis Johnson or with President Truman with respect to lack of unification in the Armed Forces?"

Let's listen to Mr. BOYKIN just a little bit more. He also said:

"The breath of life has been breathed into the United Nations. The Atlantic Defense Pact binding all nations which border on the North Atlantic Ocean to our military aid and assistance is now an accomplished fact.

"Here again, Secretary Johnson exhibited his foresight in developing international unification of military strength and he did so against the bitter opposition of most of his avowed critics who long stood in the way of national military unification. Military assistance is strengthening the fighting force of the European nations. The flag of the United Nations is flying beside the Stars and Stripes in far-off Korea."

That is all that I shall quote from Congressman BOYKIN who has been doing a fine job of plain speaking on national defense and our friend Louis Johnson on the floor of the House. I do think it appropriate here, however, to quote Gen. Douglas MacArthur, who, in a message to President Truman on July 20, said:

"I do not believe that history records a comparable operation which excelled the speed and precision with which the Eighth Army, the Far East Air Force, and the Seventh Fleet have been deployed to a distant land for immediate commitment to major operations. It merits the highest commendation for the commanders, staffs, and units concerned and attests to their superior training and high state of readiness to meet any eventuality. This finds added emphasis in the fact that the Far East Command, until the President's great pronouncement to support the epochal action of the United Nations, had no slightest responsibility for the defense of the free Republic of Korea. With the President's decision, it assumed a completely new and added mission."

That is what General MacArthur had to say about our state of preparedness for Korea.

My friends, in conclusion, I shall make a prediction; and that is, that this unfair and unwarranted criticism of a great man and a great American—a great West Virginian, Louis Johnson—will soon be forgotten and that time will prove again that the people of the United States owe him a great debt for public service; and, when all is said and done, he will have a great place and a secure place in American history.

We of West Virginia back Louis Johnson to the hilt. We are with him come what may, and we are going to continue to speak out as need be to stop this crucifixion of a great man. In unity there is strength, and in strength there is security and peace. That is the way Louis Johnson is pointing us.

Protection of the American Economy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, August 24 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter from Mr. Philip S. Ehrlich on the question of protecting our free-enterprise system, and a suggestion that the President appoint a special commission to study the whole question of the American economy, and ways and means of protecting it from various influences that seek to destroy or weaken our capitalistic system.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., June 12, 1950.
In re proposal for revision of antitrust laws.
Hon. CHARLES SAWYER,
Secretary of Commerce,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have acquired, as a result of many years of experience in litigation involving antitrust laws, the profound conviction that if the American system of free enterprise is to survive, there must be a complete revision of these laws.

The Sherman and Clayton Acts were sound pieces of legislation but their original meaning, purpose, and intent have disappeared as a result of misinterpretation. The Robinson-Patman amendment to the Clayton Act is, as objective lawyers and economists will admit, a hodgepodge, and has been so interpreted and applied by the agency in charge of its enforcement as to eliminate the healthy competition which is the basis of our economy. The Federal Trade Commission Act is a vague and ambiguous statute and if not administered with self discipline by the agency in charge of its enforcement, it can be used for oppressive ends, and by and large it has not been applied to safeguard the public interest but only to eliminate true competition.

The revision which I propose be made of the antitrust laws would have as its goal two objectives. One of the objectives would be to protect the American people from abuses of economic power which some segments of American industry have engaged in continuously during the past 60 years. The other objective would be to protect from bureaucratic interference and nationalization by administrative fiat the greatest industrial machine ever created and to permit it to survive in order that our present standard of living cannot only be maintained at the highest level the world has ever experienced, but continuously increased. To some, these would seem conflicting objectives. I do not believe that they are. I do believe, however, that it is essential and of critical importance that it be demonstrated by a proper revision of the antitrust laws that this conflict does not exist.

American business is today confronted by a continuous attack by the Federal Trade Commission, the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice, Congress, and the Government generally. This may ultimately lead to nationalization of industry, that is to say, socialism to a greater or lesser extent. This menace to our economic system results from misinterpretations of our sound statutes and amendments made and proposed to these statutes which would perpetuate and enlarge the scope of these misinterpretations.

The attack on the free-enterprise system can be said to have begun in 1934 with the National Industrial Recovery Act which sanctioned price fixing in direct violation of the Sherman Act. The next step in this attack was the enactment of the Robinson-Patman Act which was used to preserve some of the worst features of NIRA. This has been followed by the activities of the TNEC and the investigations of the Celler committee. Throughout this period, however, the most disturbing and sinister feature of the attack on business has been the campaign against bigness conducted by the agencies in charge of enforcing the antitrust laws, and the victories achieved by these agencies in persuading the courts to accept the doctrine of implied conspiracy and the outlawing of the basing-point system of prices, and, last but most important, the erosion of procedural due process by these agencies and the courts.

As a lawyer, I am deeply concerned by the constant denial to businessmen and business enterprises of that open, fair, and impartial hearing which is the heart and soul of the procedural due process guaranteed by the fifth amendment to the Constitution. This has been achieved principally by attributing to courts and administrative tribunals an expertness in the field of economics which in fact they do not possess.

I do not believe that the socialistic system which is being imposed upon us, not by the will of the people but by bureaucratic intrigue, is compatible with the guaranties embodied in the first 10 amendments to the Constitution. For this reason, it is my opinion that a clear-cut, constructive, and fair antitrust program designed to preserve our capitalistic system must be evolved at the earliest possible moment in order to protect our American society and free enterprise. The basic objectives of this program should be defined clearly and adhered to strictly.

I respectfully suggest for the purpose of this program that you recommend to the President and to Congress that Congress create a commission, the members of which should be appointed by the President. This commission should represent every essential element of the American economy, and its members should not be chosen along partisan lines. It should have full investigatory powers with the right to subpena witnesses and employ counsel and experts. It should be adequately financed by congressional appropriations. It should be required to report its findings and recommendations at the end of a reasonable period to the President and to Congress.

Congress has passed legislation creating similar commissions in the past, and the President has appointed its members.

It is my feeling that such a commission, adequately financed and staffed, could present the facts and a constructive solution to these problems confronting the economy of America. It would be necessary for this commission to take into consideration not only our immediate economic needs but what is to be the economic destiny of our democratic form of government over the next 50 or 100 years.

It is my further belief that unless the problems are given proper consideration and study, and a constructive program enacted into legislation, there is grave and acute danger that legislation, and court and administrative misinterpretations may ultimately result in the nationalization of industry and a socialistic state.

Respectfully submitted.

PHILIP S. EHRLICH.

Hon. Frances P. Bolton's Recollections of Moscow on VJ-Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, on August 14, 1950, the fifth anniversary of the Japanese surrender following World War II, our distinguished colleague from Ohio, the Honorable FRANCES P. BOLTON, made a statement here which some of the Members may have missed. She described what she saw in Moscow 5 years ago today, a portent of the Communist gains in Asia to come in the intervening years.

As you all know, Mrs. BOLTON has for many years served on the all-important Committee on Foreign Affairs. We have indeed been fortunate to have the benefit of her first-hand experience and wide knowledge, especially of that problem which is the most important of our times—the nature of the world Communist conspiracy and how to deal with it.

Among other trips to Europe and the Near East made by Mrs. BOLTON in connection with committee activities, she is the first women Member of the Congress ever to be selected to head an offistudy of conditions bearing on the foreign assistance programs of our country.

It is most significant that Mrs. BOLTON should have been in Moscow on the date of the Japanese capitulation, and in her remarks she vividly recalls events of that historic day, relating the marked contrast between the Soviet standard of living and our own American way of life, and tying in those events of 5 years ago with what is happening today in Korea.

The remarks of Mrs. BOLTON, to which I refer, appear on page 12468 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for August 14, 1950. They deserve careful reading by everyone.

Employ the Physically Handicapped

OF
HON. WAYNE L. HAYS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I herewith present a resolution passed by the Disabled American Veterans, Bellaire Chapter, No. 117, Bellaire, Ohio, which I think is worthy of the consideration of the Congress. The resolution follows:

Whereas the President of the United States and the Federal Government have served notice on industry that in the event of a general draft for the Armed Forces, deferments will be kept at a minimum; and

Whereas the United States Government must assist in this procedure by abiding by the limited deferments in its selection or retention of Government employees; and

Whereas there is is a sufficiently large manpower pool among disabled war veterans of both great conflicts to fill adequately the employment gap of both industry and Government caused by the drafting of physically fit employees; and

Whereas the record of the physically handicapped in industry during World War II is one of highest standard of production, lowest in absenteeism, and most faithful in attention to duty; and

Whereas members of the Armed Forces who have been rendered physically handicapped by virtue of their sacrifices in the two great wars by this sacrifice already have shown their readiness to contribute in the extreme to the welfare of their Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Bellaire Chapter, No. 117, Disabled American Veterans, urge the Federal Government adopt a rigid policy, in the event of a general draft, of replacing physically fit and eligible employees in Government with disabled veterans and other physically handicapped persons, and that this same procedure be presented by the Government to industry as a pattern for employment in order that the needs of the Armed Forces be adequately served without inflicting disadvantages on industrial production.

The Bellaire Chapter, No. 117, Disabled American Veterans, located in Bellaire, Ohio, at their regular meeting held in the council chamber of the City Building, Bellaire, Ohio, August 8, 1950, passed the foregoing resolution.

How Wars Are Lost

OF
HON. OLIN E. TEAGUE
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. TEAGUE. Mr. Speaker, all Americans should be vitally concerned about the question of obtaining a dollar's worth of defense for every dollar appropriated and spent to support an adequate Armed Force. Congressman JACK Z. ANDERSON, of California, has attempted to bring same semblance of order and efficiency to the supply system for the Department of the Defense and last year had introduced H. R. 321 which is "A bill to promote more economical and efficient use of the Nation's resources by providing for a single supply catalogue system for the National Military Establishment."

Mr. Speaker, with the increased budget request for the armed services, we need more than ever before, a single supply catalogue system which Congressman ANDERSON of California has proposed. Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an editorial which appeared recently in the Washington Times-Herald entitled "How Wars Are Lost." It follows:

HOW WARS ARE LOST

Here is a little Associated Press item from the war front that should interest families of United States citizens now being killed in Korea. It also has a meaning to citizens whose money is being wasted there and elsewhere.

LOST WITHOUT A STRUGGLE

Three American tanks, manufactured at great cost, were shipped to Korea at further panic rates of expense.

But they never fired a shot, and it is the best hope of our commanders in the field that they were blown to bits by United States forces to keep them out of Communist hands. It appears that the tanks were shipped without fan belts and so were useless. Two emergency air shipments followed, as the Army's quartermaster department tried to overtake its own errors.

The first box opened at the front contained fan belts, all right, but wrong size. Second box, flown in peril of the plane crew's lives to Chinju, contained—pistols.

Last Friday the Times-Herald had an editorial which explained in advance how such things happen. The title of the editorial was How to Save Another $5,000,000,000, and it reported on the failure of the Defense Department to carry out a plain and pressing mission of duty.

FAILURE OF A MISSION

This mission, made obvious by World War II and spelled out in detail by the Hoover report on reorganization of the executive bureaucracy, calls for a single catalog of Government supplies.

The idea, the commission properly declared, is by no means new. It has been kicking around the Government since World War I. Presidents and Cabinet officers have repeatedly and consistently come out for it. But the results have not followed. The Hoover Commission said it could think of but three possible reasons for the failure:

1. "Stubborn resistance" from officials in the various supply organizations, simply because change would upset their preconceived work formulas.

2. "The absence of glamor and front-page news qualities" in such prosaic but vital business as property inventory, so that the high brass falls to stick to its own job of pushing reform to a finish.

3. "Inability or unwillingness of the several interested agencies and their technical staffs to reach decisions and to agree on the basic elements."

These observations are so eloquent as to need no further elaboration.

A single catalog system of handling supplies throughout the civil and military agencies of the Federal Government would save, according to educated judgment, some $5,000,000,000 a year. That's exactly the amount Mr. Truman wants in fresh taxes.

COURTS MARTIAL ARE IN ORDER

Last year, Representative JACK ANDERSON (Republican, of California) introduced a House Resolution 321, to make the single catalog the law of the land. The bureaucrats went up to Capitol Hill and persuaded Representative CARL VINSON, Chairman of the House Committee on Armed Services, that the law is unnecessary "because we are making great progress."

That is the same old song and dance they have been using for a generation and a half, to smother the system that would end their useless and wasteful duplication and misplacement of supply work.

Now the story of the three tanks in Korea give a dramatic example of the consequences.

We are entering a new war, and without an efficient supply system. Courts martial are in order. So is a law that will force the Hoover Commission's single-catalog system, designated officially as "of crucial importance to national defense."

The Access Road Bill

OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, August 24 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "The Access Road Bill," published in the International Woodworker, of Portland, Oreg., to which I say "Amen."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Portland (Oreg.) International Woodworker of July 12, 1950]

THE ACCESS ROAD BILL

It becomes increasingly more difficult to stand by and impotently watch while the little that is left of one of the world's finest natural resources is shamelessly and ruthlessly depleted. The west coast's incomparable and irreplaceable forests are face to face with destruction.

It is doubly hard when one stops to think—there goes our jobs—there goes our living—and there goes this entire region's God-given protection against the ravages of erosion and flood.

Already we have many millions of acres of wasteland cluttering up our tax rolls. It's useless for farming. It's useless for grazing. It's priceless for the growing of timber. You see it's timberland. It was forest until the timber barons began their old cry of inexhaustible forests and with the greediness of irresponsible children ripped the most valuable trees out of the forests so violently that nothing was left standing and far more timber was left to rot on the ground than was ever taken out.

In their eagerness to grasp all within sight they took no heed of fire and millions upon millions of acres of virgin timber, more precious than gold, went up in flames. These acres today are wastelands. They afford no watershed. They afford the soil no protection from erosion. Only here and there in the older burns is life beginning to stir once more.

And so now we can see the end of our virgin timber. Almost in desperation we are fighting to protect the little we have left, only to find that we are more or less fighting windmills. Everyone agrees that we must stop these wasteful ways. Everyone agrees that we must have scientific forest management, but somehow nothing ever quite seems to be done about it.

For instance—access roads. There is every reason under the sun to build access roads into our Federal timber, which is about all the standing timber we have left these days that isn't owned outright by a few of the bigger timber barons.

Without access roads we can't fight fires and we cannot have proper logging methods for the development and harvesting of these forests. Why don't we get them?

Well, don't look now, but there is a nasty rumor that some of our more powerful timber barons don't want access roads built—because if there were access roads into the forests any lumberman, not just a baron with the capital to build miles of private road, could buy and log patches of Federal timber as it ripens and is ready to harvest.

But these big shots in the lumber industry want that timber left right where it is and just as inaccessible as it is, so that when they get their private holdings logged off (and the land back on the counties for nonpayment of taxes) that Federal timber will be waiting for them.

However, on the surface almost everyone is for these access roads. A bill providing for them even passed the Senate—Senate bill No. 24. The bill is at present peacefully sleeping in the House Committee on Agriculture, and unless we can succeed in building a fire under it, the Congress is apt to adjourn without passing the bill.

So once again we urge all of you who depend upon the lumber industry for a living to write your Congressman urging that he do all he can to get WAYNE MORSE'S Senate bill No. 24, the access-roads bill, out of committee and passed by the House.

Why Not an Excess-Profits Tax Now?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following article from the Philadelphia Inquirer of August 16, 1950:

WHY NOT AN EXCESS-PROFITS TAX NOW?

One major justification for the economic-control legislation—including authority to put ceilings on prices and wages—now on its way through Congress is the indisputable need to hold the line against the soaring cost of living in a manner equitable to everyone.

In view of that need, the refusal of the Senate Finance Committee to consider immediate imposition of an excess-profits tax is a breach of faith with the American people.

The whole country is in the fight to prevent Korean war costs and the huge spending involved in a rearmament program from driving the cost of living up to a point where the entire economy is endangered. We don't know what the final costs will be, but we do know that they can climb out of sight unless firm efforts are made to control them.

Congress already is preparing to pass severe economic controls. It is ready to boost the income taxes paid by individuals, and the normal taxes paid by corporations. But the Senate Committee has put off until next year—or perhaps later—a tax on excess profits directly attributable to the Nation's efforts to rearm itself against the Communist menace.

It's time all Congressmen realized that the country is willing to make sacrifices in order to keep the cost of living—and the cost of rearmament—within bounds. Americans will accept cheerfully the restrictions and the additional tax load, if the principle of equity is preserved.

But it isn't fair and equitable to slap taxes on some, and let others, who make quick extra profits because of defense demands, slide by. It isn't reasonable to continue to provide loopholes from just taxation for a few favored groups, and at the same time ask all others to shoulder a bigger burden.

Congress has been curiously reluctant to close up one big loophole by which some oil producers have been able to pile up millions while paying little or no taxes. A move to cut down the depletion allowances these producers charge against taxes was smothered under a blanket of sectional politics last spring.

It sounds fine for Senator TOM CONNALLY, of Texas, to vote now for an excess-profits tax—one of the two committee members who did. But it would sound a lot better to hear CONNALLY come out and demand that some of these get-rich-quick oil millionaires from his own and neighboring States hand over part of their profits to the Federal Government, especially now that oil has become a defense necessity.

Aren't these people rich enough, without having others continue to bear their share of the load? If Connally is against one kind of excess profits, why not all kinds?

The Senate committee decision indicates once more that Congress is lagging behind the American people in measures to meet the new obligations thrust upon us by the Red invasion of Korea.

The majority of Americans are aware that the $16,500,000,000 in additional armament spending asked by President Truman may be only the beginning. They know that every gun, every tank, every plane will cost more if pressures on prices are not reduced. They know that heavier taxes both help pay for arms and keep their cost of living down.

But they are not ready to accept the theory that profiteers can keep their gains while our men are dying in Korea. They won't approve of any congressional juggling which means that individuals start paying higher taxes on October 1, and corporations keep their extra, war-connected profits until some indefinite date in the future.

The excess-profits tax law in effect during the last war may not have been perfect. Such a law is extremely difficult to draft without involving some hardships. But at least the law worked, and offers a model for new legislation to be passed promptly. Then, if it seems desirable, the Senate committee could undertake the study it now offers as its excuse for side-stepping action.

This newspaper believes firmly that equity, in economic controls, in defense measures, and in tax laws is essential to our national strength. For that reason, an excess-profits tax should be passed without further delay.

Community Recreation Guides Youthful Energy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES R. HOWELL

OF NEW JERSEY

Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I want to take this opportunity to commend most highly the civic spirit of the many men and women in our small American communities who devote much of their own leisure time to providing suitable and constructive recreation for the boys and girls of America. It is this wise guidance of youthful energy which helps our young people to learn the importance of friendly cooperation; the success of joint endeavor; the pleasure in the accomplishment of the group. It is what is known as learning by doing and is perhaps one of the outstanding factors in helping our young people to develop into useful citizens and to be thoughtful men and women—the spirit and backbone of our American way of life.

In this world today, wher the free nations are banding together to stamp out the threat of communism within their own borders and to prevent its further spread throughout the world, the strength of America lies of necessity in its youth. A few years ago many of us became seriously alarmed by the increase of juvenile delinquency here in the United States. In an effort to provide a suitable outlet for the youthful energy which in most instances was the cause of juvenile delinquency—I often think of it as mischief carried to a dangerous degree—many civic-social organizations came into being. These are all fine, patriotic groups whose members give a large part of their personal leisure to help the young people of their communities.

A typical example of such an organization is the Happy Hour Social and Athletic Club of Maple Shade, N. J. This organization sponsors a fine softball team which is assured a place in the league play-offs this year; its boys' baseball team holds first place in the junior baseball league. In the fall the club encourages a local football team and in the winter there is basketball. The Happy Hour Social and Athletic Club cooperates with other local civic organizations in Maple Shade to make the Fourth of July and Christmas celebrations highly successful. Because of the interest which televised boxing bouts have aroused among young and old, this club recently has sponsored a new athletic show for the people of the community. They have constructed an outdoor boxing ring at their clubhouse and every other Thursday evening provide an outdoor boxing show. In the bouts which will be held tonight there are five Maple Shade youths participating: Timmy Morton, Al Gibson, Al Pike, Jack Thiel, and Tony DiMezza. They will box an all-Philadelphia team sponsored by the Philadelphia Police Athletic League (PAL), which is well known everywhere for its successful work with boys and young men.

Maple Shade's Happy Hour Club is but one outstanding example of the many, many fine civic organizations in my district which are contributing so much to the future of America by teaching our boys and girls good sportsmanship and respect for the rights of others—the firm foundations upon which good American citizenship must be built.

Hawaii's Sons on the Korea Firing Line

OF
HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under previous authority to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to submit an editorial from the Honolulu Star-Bulletin, of Honolulu, T. H., of date August 18, 1950, as follows:

HAWAII'S SONS ON THE KOREAN FIRING LINE

During World War II, Hawaii soldiers were in the thick of battle in both the European and the Pacific theaters. Their glorious combat record is now a bright page in our Nation's history.

Today, in the blood-soaked mountain passes of Korea, Hawaii's young men are writing another stirring page in history.

In larger numbers, proportionately, than fighting men from the States, they have been locked with the enemy in some of the bitterest fighting of the Korean campaign.

From the casualty lists of the Fifth Regimental Combat Team and the Twenty-fourth Division (originally the Hawaiian Division, with the taro leaf shoulder insignia) we get a picture of the cross section of island youth engaged in the fighting.

Here are some of the names, taken at random from the list of killed, wounded, and missing: Arakawa, Nakama, Bourdreau, Keanoanoa, Nakasato, Birch, Chun, Lishman, Patacsil, Perry, Santiago, Kim, Lee, and Ladao—Americans all.

By ancestry Irishmen, Germans, French, English, Japanese, Chinese, Filipinos, Koreans, Hawaiians—but Americans all.

These men and their comrades in arms are fighting to preserve the American democracy they love, which they and their parents have helped to establish in Hawaii. There names are the names which have appeared on the sugar and pineapple plantation payrolls, in the business tax records, and on the rosters of civic organizations.

Behind the lines, Hawaii itself is stirring into new action as a port of call for men and material bound for the front. It is growing once more into a major staging base for an advance operation.

Symbolic of this renewed recognition of Hawaii's strategic importance in the Pacific basin is revival of Pearl Harbor's World War II slogan: "We Keep the Ships Fit to Fight."

And although the sound of exploding shells has yet to disturb Hawaii's gentle breezes, civilian defense preparations are well advanced, far ahead of planning in most mainland cities equally vulnerable to enemy attach.

Plans are going forward for the organization of a counterpart of the wartime USO to fill a growing need brought about by the Korean war.

The sum of these things is that Hawaii is again demonstrating that it is a forward bulwark of the nation, quick to rise to each new emergency, generous in its response to every call.

Hawaii is proving again that it cannot be written off the strategists' maps, that it is and will remain an outpost of foremost importance.

And its two dead, 22 wounded and 25 missing in the Korean fighting are mute evidence that Hawaii once again is on the firing line of democracy. But politically, Hawaii remains relegated to the back seat of territorial status.

We're American enough to operate a productive group of islands and contribute vastly to the national revenues.

We're American enough to send young men of skill and valor to the battlefield—and they're American enough to fight with complete courage and loyalty.

But we're not American enough to join the family of States.

What travesty.

Refusal of United States To Make Peace Deal With Russia Will Strengthen UN

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include herewith an editorial appearing in the White Haven Record entitled "Refusal of United States To Make Peace Deal With Russia Will Strengthen United Nations." The editorial follows:

REFUSAL OF UNITED STATES TO MAKE PEACE DEAL WITH RUSSIA WILL STRENGTHEN UN

The United States, in a note from Secretary of State Acheson to Prime Minister Nehru, of India, replied this week to the Soviet Union's statement that to grant Nationalist China's seat on the UN Security Council to Communist China is the only term on which peace can be secured in Korea.

Although the details of Secretary Acheson's reply to the Russian proposal were not made known, it is known that his note stated bluntly that the United States is in no position to make such a compromise and that any settlement and the terms for the same must come from the United Nations, not from an individual member. Our reply also made it clear that the UN has specified that no settlement will be attempted until North Korean Communist troops have withdrawn from South Korea—or have been forced out of that Republic and we have emphatically pointed out that we mean to adhere to that decision.

This reply to the Soviet peace proposal is one of the most heartening developments of the war, for it means that the United States as a loyal member of the UN, has refused to enter into any form of private "deal" merely to achieve peace. It has notified the whole world that we are not interested in "peace at any price," and that final settlement of the Korean issue is not a matter that can be settled on a narrow, nationalistic footing. We have made it clear that our stand to back the UN in its support of the invaded Republic of South Korea was taken in the interests of the world community and with sincere belief in the principles upon which the United Nations is founded.

This is probably one of the greatest boosts to the United Nations organization since its inception. Coupled with the United States decision to help provide military support in an effort to enable the UN to enforce its decision in Korea.

A Test for 20/20 Hindsight Vision

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLAIR ENGLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. ENGLE of California. Mr. Speaker, the columnist, Marquis Childs, in his column day before yesterday in the Washington Post, has some interesting comments on some of the legislators who have developed 20/20 hindsight vision since the beginning of the Korean war. Those who criticize what happened should be able to answer two questions: First, did they oppose the policies followed in the 5 years since the war ended? Secondly, if they did, what constructive proposal did they put forward to take the place of the policies which they now contend led to or abetted our present difficulties. There are very few who can meet that test. I think Marquis Childs' column is interesting in its comment on some who cannot. Mr. Childs' column follows:

RESULTS OF DEMOBILIZING—WHERRY'S POISON
(By Marquis Childs)

If the poison exuded on the Senate floor by Senator KENNETH WHERRY of Nebraska is a sample of Republican campaign oratory, then the country is in for a bad time this fall. All hope of unity will be destroyed in a savage dog-eat-dog attack that will leave victory a pretty empty thing.

The psychologist says that a sense of guilt produces a desire to find a scapegoat; to hit out at someone else with a blind anger. It's about time to face up to the fact that for the tragedy of Korea and for our present defenselessness there is more than enough blame to go around.

The fifth anniversary of VJ-day has come and gone as though it had never been. Perhaps we preferred to forget that mood of exaltation and the aftermath in which the clamor to bring the boys home drowned out everything else.

America had in being on VJ-day military power of overwhelming weight everywhere in the world. That power was dismantled with a speed that was fantastically destructive. If you want to go back to original sin to explain our present plight, there it is.

A brief glance at the record will show that almost every politician, both Republican and Democrat, joined in that cry to bring the boys home. Wasn't the war over?

Gen. George C. Marshall, who was Chief of Staff of the Army until November of 1945, realized how destructive and costly this immediate dismantling would be. So did some others who understood what a power vacuum would be left if American force in being was taken apart while Russia kept her legions armed and strategically placed.

But these were the brass hats. They wanted to keep the boys in service so they could retain their wartime rank. Why, if you let 'em, they'd take the country over. So went the political cry.

A few men in political life spoke up for what they believed to be the truth about the dismantling that was proceeding at disastrous speed. One was Representative JAMES WADSWORTH of New York, who is now retiring after 30 years of distinguished and honorable service in the Senate and the House. A little later WADSWORTH was one of the few Republicans to work actively for adoption of universal military training when President Truman recommended it following a report by a special commission of inquiry.

President Truman, who placed great faith in General Marshall's advice, made some effort to stem the dismantling tide. A revealing incident comes to mind out of this period.

One of the nationally broadcast commentators was working the "bring the boys home" theme as hard as possible. He personally directed the collecting and signing of GI petitions to come home.

At the end of a press conference he sought to present these petitions to Truman. This was the signal for the President to let loose some earthy Missouri language to the effect that he didn't want any of the blankety-blank petitions.

There is some evidence that the "bring the boys home" drive was egged on by Communists. But very little inspiration was needed, since it fitted the temper of the time. We all wanted our sons back to get them into college, into the family business, into jobs. Wasn't the war over?

Some Republicans in 1946 went so far as to hint that the Truman administration wanted to keep the boys overseas because it would be harder for them to cast a ballot against the party in power. In the election that fall, the party out of power captured control of both Senate and House. Undoubtedly, one reason was because the Republicans had capitalized successfully on the discontents growing out of demobilization and the aftermath of a terrible war.

This dismantling process in 1945 and 1946 is estimated to have cost $48,000,000. How much of that could have been saved if it had been done more cautiously and slowly, no one can say. Part of the savings would have been in war material bulldozed into dump heaps or thrown into the sea because no ships were available to send it back to storage while manpower to carry on a salvage operation was melting away.

Perhaps the very fact that the Democrats are in and the Republicans are out adds up to political responsibility. But this does not alter the record. Nor does it justify wild and reckless and divisive talk about guilt for the blood that is being shed by young Americans in the Korean war.

Help for the Policemen, Firemen, and School Teachers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN D. DINGELL
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased with the President's action in signing the police bill providing for a 5-day workweek. We, the Members of Congress, serving in the capacity of City Councilmen for the District of Columbia, have made progress in matters pertaining to wages, hours, and retirement of school teachers, firemen and policemen, but we have not gone far enough, according to my views, to make of the Nation's Capital the shining example and the model that it should be in order to attract the attention and emulation of other cities.

Washington, the great capital city of the richest, most powerful Nation in the world should have the best paid school teachers, policemen, and firemen if it wants to attract the intelligent, honest, and dependable employees necessary to maintain the highest standards of education and safety. In addition to the best pay, we should provide a shorter work week and healthful conditions of employment, a sound, permanent, and liberal retirement system, with dependency allowances, and a special lump-sum or annuity provision where death results from performance of hazardous duty. This applies particularly to policemen and firemen who daily risk their lives in the line of duty. If we will follow up now with the necessary appropriations our duty will have been discharged and we will, moreover, render exemplary service which will aid the teachers, policemen, and firemen of our own communities, because public sentiment will force the hands of local city councils to maintain the honor and prestige of the old home town.

The church provides moral and religious strength, but if you want to secure for the citizen a progressive, strong, and permanent democracy, our schools and our teaching staffs must be enlarged and encouraged to plan for future intellectual expansion, and our policemen and firemen to provide for our physical safety. These privileges cost but little compared to the happiness, security, and satisfaction they bring. It is our own insurance for tomorrow.

Secretary of Agriculture Brannan Speaks at Carlisle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. NOLAND
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. NOLAND. Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of Agriculture, Charles Brannan, honored the farm people of Carlisle, Sullivan County, and the Seventh District by addressing a gathering at the Sullivan County Fair on August 21. Secretary Brannan directed his speech to the role of our farmers in a changing world.

Mr. Brannan was welcomed by the many hundreds who attended this meeting and his remarks were received with great interest. For this reason I think his speech which follows should be of general interest to all of those interested in the welfare of the American farmer. It follows:

FARMERS IN A CHANGING WORLD
(By Secretary of Agriculture Charles F. Brannan)

Ten years ago the Department of Agriculture published a yearbook titled "Farmers in a Changing World."

Here is one of the sentences from that book: "The year 1940 marks the end of a decade that has seen more swift and far-reaching changes in agricultural viewpoints and policy than perhaps any other decade in the history of the United States."

Looking back now after another 10 years, we might well feel that prior to 1940 we hadn't seen anything. For the changes of this past decade have been so much faster—so much more far reaching—that there hardly seems any basis at all for comparison.

"Farmers in a changing world": That was an appropriate theme in 1940—but it is much more appropriate in 1950.

What kind of world is it?

First, it is a world of breath-taking swiftness. On Saturday, June 24, all seemed quiet in Korea. The next morning the thirty-eighth parallel was a blazing military front. Except for our intervention as a member of the United Nations the Red armies would have conquered many weeks ago.

A second characteristic of today's world is its terrible power of destruction. Five years ago this month one atom bomb was exploded 2,000 feet above Hiroshima—and the casualties in dead, injured, and missing have been estimated at 130,000 persons.

One bomb—and a primitive type of atom bomb at that.

Another characteristic of the modern world is its interdependence—it is one world. Aggression or threats of aggression in Korea—or in Germany—or in the Balkans—affect freedom and security everywhere. We learned a bitter lesson from Hitler—but thank God, learn it we did—we learned that one act of aggression, unchecked, inevitably leads to another, until the whole free world either goes down in submission—or stands up and fights.

That is why American young men and American guns and armor and planes and ships are standing valiantly against greedy and power-mad forces in Korea today.

This changing world, finally, is a world of conflict. As President Truman recently said: "The attack upon the Republic of Korea makes it plain beyond all doubt that the international Communist movement is prepared to use armed invasion to conquer independent nations. * * * The free world has made it clear, through the United Nations, that lawless aggression will be met with force."

Our national policy has been made very plain for all the nations to see.

We are determined to maintain and defend world peace. We shall do this by repelling aggression.

We shall do it by restoring peace through joint action with other members of the United Nations.

We shall do it by providing a shield behind which a free and lawful world society can live and prosper.

That is our national policy. To carry it out this Nation has work to do on two broad fronts. On the military front we have the job of repelling actual aggression, as in Korea, and of preparing defenses against potential aggression, as in western Europe and elsewhere.

But there is a second front upon which we must fight. As effectively as we know how, we must wage a war of ideas—a war of good deeds based upon ideals—a war of works founded on faith.

In this struggle of ideas, we have made a solid beginning. The Voice of America short waves the story of democracy all around the globe. The European recovery program backs up our words with deeds and dollars. The point 4 program will bring to underdeveloped countries a type of economic cooperation that has been operating with excellent results between ourselves and Latin America for more than 10 years.

The Food and Agriculture Organization is tackling the broad problem of world hunger. Other international agencies are hard at work on other fundamental tasks concerned with raising world standards of living.

In all these fields, the free people of the world are on the march. But we must march even faster. Every day hunger is breeding discontent. Every day people who suffer from malnutrition, lack of shelter, and insufficient clothing become easier targets for communism.

In this struggle for peace which now engages us, our agriculture is a vital element.

At the base of our strength—supporting not only our Armed Forces but our industry as well—is the land and its products. From the land come food and fiber, lumber and oil, the raw materials out of which men build and by which they live.

From our agriculture must also come many of the valuable techniques of food and fiber production which can be transferred to the farmers of other lands.

In such ways as these does a strong and prosperous agriculture contribute to peace and security.

But there are still other ways.

It is only because of the increasing productivity of our farms that so many millions of men and women have been released from the necessity of tilling the soil and made available for industry. A little more than a century ago, one farm worker, on the average, provided food and fiber for less than five persons. Now a person engaged in agriculture provides, on the average, for 15 persons.

This process was accelerated during the decade just ended. While the nonfarm population of our country grew by about 20,000,000 persons, the number of people on farms decreased by nearly 3,000,000. Yet our farms have been producing about 40 percent more than the 1935-39 average—and using about the same number of acres. In 8 of the past 10 years, in fact, farm output of crops and livestock has equalled or surpassed the greatest production of any previous year.

This agricultural strength is one of the fundamentals upon which the vitality of our whole economy rests. Without raw materials from the farms, much of our industry would be crippled; a large part of our labor force would be idle.

The same relationship holds between agriculture and the health and vigor of our people. Milk, meat, eggs, and other protective foods are translated into millions of additional man-hours of labor.

One of the most important battles of World War II was the battle of food—and a big segment of that battle was won on the farms of the United States. The farm people of the United States have every reason to take pride in their accomplishment. They did a terrific job. And you of this great producing State of Indiana contributed immeasurably to the victory.

We do not know at this time exactly how far the Nation will have to go in mobilizing its military might. But there is one thing upon which all farmers—from Maine to California—are ready to assure their fellow Americans. They are ready to assure the Nation that whatever the demands may be for food and fiber, they will come through with the required production.

Right now we are in very fine shape. Our food production resources are far and away the greatest in the world. American farmers have the know-how that it takes. And they have been plowing back into their business the gains of relative prosperity, making farming more highly efficient than ever before. Another year of very large farm output is in prospect. Even allowing for increases in military food requirements, we expect to have enough food so that civilians can continue consuming as much as in the past 2 years.

We have big reserves of wheat and other grains.

We have lots of cotton and other fibers out of which to supply agricultural raw materials to industry.

And, what is more, big as our production is now, we can boost it a good deal higher if we should have to. Research is steadily producing better plant varieties, new hybrid seeds, improved bug and weed killers, and more efficient uses of fertilizers. We have more farm machinery and electric power than ever before. It all adds up to a constantly widening productive capacity.

Many of our Department specialists believe that, great as the advances of the past have been, science has no more than made a good start in advancing the agriculture of the United States. The big harvest, in other words, is not behind but ahead of us.

Much of the progress already achieved, and much that will be achieved, owes a great deal to the valuable farm programs developed over the past two decades. These programs did not come into being automatically. Farm people with determination and ideas made known the needs of agriculture in this changing world. They have led in developing the measures that are needed, and they have been public spirited enough to handle the jobs of local administration. In many cases, they have developed in their ranks a leadership that has reached beyond local to State, National, and international levels. It is significant that the new Under Secretary of Agriculture is a Hoosier farmer who has had long and successful experience in farm-program development and administration. I am sure that Indiana is proud—and I know it is a satisfaction to me—to have Clarence J. McCormick as the new Under Secretary of Agriculture.

Here in Indiana, when the Rural Electrification Administration was established in 1935, less than 12 percent of your farms had central-station electric service. Now, more than 98 percent—I want to repeat that—over 98 percent of your farms are served. You know what that has meant in terms of increased production.

I am very happy to say that this nearly perfect record for the State of Indiana is a wonderful tribute to a man who has done a truly great job for agriculture and for REA—our good friend Claude Wickard.

Under new authority recently given to REA, the improvement of telephone service is also under way. In 1945 less than three Indiana farms out of five had telephone service. One loan for providing new or improved telephone service to rural subscribers in Indiana has already been approved and six other applications have been received.

About half of Indiana's farms and farm land are in soil-conservation districts, and 60 percent of your farms cooperated in the 1949 agricultural conservation program. You know the importance of conservation to continued farm abundance.

You have benefited by research on forage and cereal crops and the diseases which attack them. Several new corn hybrids, with greater resistance to the corn borer, were released for 1950 plantings. The new bacterial wilt-resistant varieties of alfalfa—Buffalo and Ranger—are now widely used and even better varieties are under test. Also in wide use are new grain storage plans designed by agricultural engineers to provide better handling and storage at reduced cost.

Work is also going ahead here in Indiana to improve the milking qualities of your cows and at the same time develop a good quality meat animal which will produce a good steer.

You all know the benefits of our farm credit programs and of the price support and production adjustment programs.

All of this progress in electrification, conservation, credit, research, and price support has been reflected, and will continue to be reflected, in larger output per acre and per animal.

From the production angle, therefore, we're in fine shape.

Although I want to emphasize again that our future requirements are not yet fully known, we should be able—given adequate labor, equipment, and supplies—to turn out all the food and fiber we'll need for the foreseeable future.

Meantime, farmers want the answers to a few questions. There is a lot of talk these days about allocations, price controls, rationing and various other regulations. All of us recognize that circumstances have and could again arise in which such devices are necessary to the protection of our economy. In fact, there are now indications that allocations may be needed for certain nonagricultural commodities most directly related to the military effort.

Agricultural supplies, on the other hand, are large, and the ability of farmers to maintain abundant supplies is such that we can all hope it will be possible to postpone the use of regultory measures for a considerable period, and even avoid using them at all unless the emergency becomes much worse.

American farmers have the opportunity to help postpone or avoid such regulations by simply following their natural desires to produce efficiently and abundantly. I am sure they will do what is necessary to make food regulations unnecessary for as long a period as possible in their own interest and in the interest of all the people.

Right now the big task for farmers is to maintain production by keeping tooled up for abundance. You can make sure your machinery and buildings are in condition for productive use.

You can make a special point of getting rid of fire hazards and accident booby traps.

You can make a more intensive effort to control insects, rodents, and diseases.

You can step up your endeavors to improve your land and your livestock. You can doublecheck whether you are getting the most out of your pastures.

You can see to it that you have storage and handling facilities for the crops now growing in your fields.

There's a lot that every farm family can do to meet the requirements of this changing world.

Farmers also want to know what to expect in the matter of prices, storage, materials, and labor.

I want to assure you that the Department will do all that it can to keep farmers supplied with up-to-date information related to the farm production job and to keep our programs geared to actual conditions.

Wheat producers already have the guidance of wheat acreage allotments. Other acreage allotments will, of course, be announced as far in advance of planting seasons as possible, and, if production goals seem likely to be useful for commodities on which we do not have acreage allotments, goals will be announced.

Price-support announcements will serve as further guides.

We intend to keep a close watch on the developing corn crop so that, in case of a soft-corn problem, advance preparations can be organized for the most advantageous use of drying equipment.

We will also keep in close touch with the farm equipment and supplies situation.

Never before has our agricultural production depended so heavily upon adequate amounts of gasoline, tires, repair parts, fertilizer, and lime. We now have twice as many tractors on American farms as we had at the end of 1941—3,500,000. American farmers use four times as much lime as in the 1935–39 period, and twice as much fertilizer.

With respect to conservation activities, present plans call for continuing the agricultural conservation program and aid through the Soil Conservation Service in 1951 at the same level as in 1950.

I hope what I have said will answer some of the questions in your minds. We will have more information for you as time goes on.

In conclusion, I want to talk just a little while about one more question that I know you have in your minds as you consider the world situation and the responsibilities of agriculture.

We have seen that agriculture has great productive resources. Agriculture is strong. But we must be very certain that we can keep our production geared to actual requirements.

We need the kind of agriculture in this changing world that is able to shift its production gears quickly and efficiently. To do that, farmers need reasonable and fair price-support protection. And the whole Nation needs a program that will give the people the full benefit of abundant production.

I want to say now, as I have often said before: The present price-support program has many excellent features. It is better than the Agricultural Act of 1948. I do not advocate discarding the present program where it is working satisfactorily—but I most certainly do urge that it be improved where it is weak, and expanded to cover effectively the important perishable commodities which bring in the greater part of total farm income.

So far, I have made no reference to the recommendations made by the Department of Agriculture for improving the price-support program. I would be perfectly satisfied to have the present circumstances studied and assessed without reference to the recommendations that have been made in the past. But I do say that we must keep on trying to improve our farm program so that it meets our actual needs.

In saying this, I hope you will not misunderstand me. In my opinion, the recommendations made by the Department are even more pertinent than ever. I believe in them fully. All I am saying is that I do not wish to use the present situation or wave the flag as an argument for my past position. I simply suggest that we think constructively about our present needs and what we should do now.

As matters now stand, we are in need of a program which solidly protects farm prices in case of sudden slackening of demand. We are in need of a program that puts an abundance of milk, eggs, and other perishables in the hands of consumers at attractive prices. We are in need of a program that is able to bring about efficiently the production adjustments that may be required.

The program we now have is no more adequate for current conditions than it was for the conditions existing a few months ago. Its deficiencies may not stand out so clearly at the moment, perhaps, because the downward trend of farm prices has been reversed—but it is still the same program with the same fundamental weaknesses. It fails to assure support on some of our most important commodities, and it offers farmers no incentive for making necessary shifts in production.

Moreover, we are still faced with the sliding scale of supports; the provision that as supplies go up, supports should go down. At the very time when farmers may need supports most—that is, when supplies are biggest—the support level will be lowest.

Maybe that makes sense to some people—it doesn't make a bit of sense to me.

Nor does it make sense that we should depend on the sliding scale as a mechanism for adjusting farm production.

The way to get production adjustments quickly is not by starving farm families out of producing. It is by encouraging farm families to produce what is needed through programs which will give them reasonable assurance of fair prices and fair incomes.

It is only proper to point out that the present price legislation does not rely on the sliding scale to bring about desirable adjustments in really critical times. The law provides that when the national security or national welfare is formally found to require increases in production, the Secretary of Agriculture may set price supports at the levels he considers necessary, regardless of the other provisions of the law.

This, you will note, is very much like the wartime Steagall amendment—the law which gave agriculture assurance of price supports at 90 percent of parity on many commodities until a period after the end of the war.

By and large, the Steagall amendment worked very well. It helped to call forth year after year of record-breaking farm production—and production of the specific foods and fibers most needed for victory. So long as demand was equal to, and even greater than, supplies, no particular problems of waste developed.

But the Steagall amendment had a big weakness—a weakness that exists also in the present legislation. It began to stand out, and to hurt, as soon as supplies outran demand at the support-price level.

The weakness was this: We did not—and we still do not—have an effective method for supporting the prices of important perishables like milk, meat, and eggs, and at the same time letting the people have the full benefit of abundant production.

For want of such a method, we now have in the possession of the Commodity Credit Corporation more butter, cheese, eggs, and milk than we know what to do with.

That's why the Government, during and since the recent war, has been forced to pay out half a billion dollars to take potatoes off the market.

In critical times like these we cannot afford to let milk, meat, butter, cheese, eggs, and potatoes go to waste. For these foods, therefore, we need authority to apply support not only through purchases but also through direct payments to producers. This does not mean that we should discontinue purchases of perishables for which we have adequate outlets through the school-lunch and other desirable programs. It does mean that the purchase method should not be our only recourse in supporting such commodities as meat, milk, and eggs.

Under the direct payment method, cattle and calves, sheep and lambs, hogs, milk, chickens, and eggs would be allowed generally to find demand-and-supply prices. If the price should fall below a fair return, producers would then receive a direct payment from the Government—a payment amounting to the difference between the support price and the average market price.

Take note, please, of that word average. It means that if any producer turns out a better product, or is a better bargainer, and is thereby able to command a higher-than-market price, he would still get a payment based on the difference between the average selling price and the support level. He would get the same payment as those who sold for less. Initiative and better quality would bring him greater income, just as under any other free market conditions.

We should continue the prevailing method of support for storable crops. Under this method the Nation has built up valuable reserves of wheat, corn, and cotton.

But, in terms of farm income, the nonstorables are far more important than the storables.

Here in Indiana last year the value of your hog production exceeded the value of your corn. The value of your cattle and calves far surpassed the value of your wheat production. For the Nation as a whole, meat, milk, and eggs bring in over half of the total receipts from farm commodities.

These same foods pretty much determine the adequacy of our diets. Most times if the diet is deficient, it is not for lack of bread or potatoes, but for lack of meat, milk, eggs, fruits, and leafy green and yellow vegetables.

Why, then, should we continue to maintain perishables at artificially high prices—while we accumulate wasteful surpluses—and while we keep consumers from access to part of our supplies?

Why should we continue this wasteful process of trying to store excessive stocks of food that are not easily storable? When we try to dispose of these foods in ways that will not affect market prices, the Government cannot even give them away, without paying freight and packaging costs as well.

Again I say, maybe that makes sense to some people—but it doesn't make a bit of sense to me.

These are some of the thoughts that occur to me as, in accordance with my responsibilities as Secretary, I consider the role of farmers in a changing world.

I have complete confidence in the ability, and the will, of American farmers to do their job on the home front as brilliantly and as resolutely as American boys are doing their job in Korea.

Now, in this changing world we who believe in the principles of our Declaration of Independence—in the God-given rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness—have perhaps as great an opportunity, and as great a responsibility, as was ever given to men.

This Nation stands before the world as the defender of human freedom.

It is not the first time we have worn that mantle. We shall continue to wear it, God willing, until freedom-loving nations have no longer anything to fear from the greed of totalitarian aggressors.

To this end, let us all strive to make our agriculture as strong and secure as it needs to be. For whatever we do to render farmers better able to play their role in this changing world will help the entire Nation to final victory in its struggle for peace and security.

Oil Imports and United States Security

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the ESPA magazine of July 1950.

OIL IMPORTS AND UNITED STATES SECURITY

For the past 18 months, thousands of dollars have been spent and millions of words written on the problem of oil imports. The term "general welfare" has been bandied about until only the acutest mind could sense the true meaning of the word, for those who opposed imports would have had Congress and the people of the United States believe that it was inimical to our very "way of life" to permit the continued flow of products into the country.

It has taken the threat of war, and the "police" action in Korea by the United States Armed Forces under the banner of the United Nations, to bring the situation into its proper perspective. As we have often said, the need for petroleum to run the wheels of war, and to maintain our essential civilian economy, makes any effort to reduce our supply, by imposing restrictions or tariff barriers, run counter to national policy. And with the rearrangement of the picture, the real proponents of the Nation's welfare and security come into view. It becomes clear that the importing companies were right when they contended that imports were vital to the long-range preservation of the national security, the welfare of the American consumer, and the domestic industry, and the sound growth of international trade.

Events have proved right. Those industry spokesmen who saw in any curtailment of the flow of crude and residual oil into the country a danger to the smooth operation of our economy should a national emergency arise. Figures on reserve petroleum stocks indicate that we are not in as favorable position as we would like to meet current civilian demand. And these figures do not even mirror the tremendous drain on those reserves, and the increased pressure for greater production, and refining, that military requirements will bring.

Latest figures on refinery capacity indicate that the petroleum industry is running at top speed now, and with the increased military demand, it becomes evident that we will have to continue to look to other areas in the Western Hemisphere to supplement our own petroleum reserves. We may be able to cut back on consumption of some civilian goods, but ours is a Nation which runs on oil, and to cut back on civilian consumption of oil products would seriously hamper our economy.

It is for these reasons that we applaud the successful efforts of the importing companies to prevent the disastrous restrictions on oil imports, and caution certain elements in the industry to refrain, in the future, from putting their own selfish interests before the welfare of the Nation.

Gov. K. C. Wu, of Formosa

OF
HON. KARL M. LeCOMPTE
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 23, 1950

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, K. C. Wu, who presently is the Governor of Formosa, is a graduate of Grinnell College in Iowa. Recently after Time magazine used his picture on its front cover, the Grinnell (Iowa) Herald-Register carried a very interesting editorial mentioning some of the facts about K. C. Wu when he was in school in the United States. Because of my personal acquaintance with Governor Wu, I was especially interested both in the Time article and the editorial in the Grinnell paper, and I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein the Herald-Register editorial of August 10, 1950:

A SON OF GRINNELL

When we glanced at the cover of last week's Time magazine we stopped and looked again, for there looking out at us were the more or less familiar features of K. C. Wu, Grinnell college graduate who has won high rank as an administrator in China and now holds the crucial post of Governor of embattled Formosa, the last stronghold of Chiang Kai-shek's nationalist government. Naturally we read the accompanying sketch with unusual interest, for here is a Grinnell graduate who is playing an important part in the events of today's troubled world.

Incidentally, the magazine mentions that Wu attended Grinnell College. Here, says Time, the only course in which Wu, later to be mayor of three cities, including sprawling Shanghai, did not get an A was, oddly enough, municipal government.

When Wu left to study for his doctorate in political science at Princeton in 1926 he faced the formidable Dean Andrew Fleming West, who personally interviewed all graduate students seeking admission. Time tells it this way. "'Young man,' said West, after contemplating the round, boyish face of the applicant, 'you are immature.' 'Sir,' replied Wu, 'to judge maturity by the criterion of age is an immature thought in itself.'"

They let him in.

Wu's whole life has been a demonstration of that saying. He entered Grinnell when he was only 17, but he proved himself intellectually as mature as older students and more mature than many

Returning to China Wu first attracted public notice as a tax collector. Contrary to precedent in China he balanced the Hankow municipal budget in 6 months. Ordinarily, in China, the tax collectors didn't work that way. They balanced their own budgets.

Recognizing that here was a rare bird, Chiang Kai-shek appointed him as mayor of Hankow. Later on he became mayor of Chungking when it was the seat of Chiang's government, and later of Shanghai. Now he is Governor of Formosa.

Wu's policies have always been forward-looking. He is a phenomenon found all too rarely in Chinese public life. He is honest and progressive. In every post which he has held he has instituted reforms.

We feel that here is one Grinnell graduate who in his daily life and in all his activities exemplifies the motto on the college seal, "Christo Duce."

We read one statement by K. C. Wu which we believe might well be pondered by President Truman, the State Department, and officialdom in Washington generally. "The only force in this part of the world with a sizable anti-Communist army," said Wu, "with a leadership that has a popular following and with the will to fight, is the Nationalist Government."

Ultimately, Wu believes, the United States Government will come to realize that fact. He has never lost faith.

Baring Bill Would Prevent Run-Around

OF
HON. WALTER S. BARING
OF NEVADA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. BARING. Mr. Speaker, the following is an excerpt from the August 18, 1950, issue of Pay Dirt, an Arizona publication devoted to the interests of the small-mine operators, which I should like to have inserted into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

BARING BILL WOULD PREVENT RUN-AROUND

Now is the time to revive the bill by Representative BARING, of Nevada, to establish the Office of Mineral Coordinator. This suggestion is made in spite of the statement by the Interior Department that "It is not apparent to this Department that the enactment of H. R. 6032 would serve any useful purpose." Were the bill enacted, Interior would soon sing a different tune—a more useful one than it has heretofore—and the Secretary probably knows it and so dislikes the bill.

Actually, H. R. 6082 arises out of a suggestion in a National Security Resources Board report and should be welcomed by Symington with open arms. Aside from the fact that the bill would bring order out of the present administrative chaos in the minerals and metals field, it sets up for the first time a policy of procurement priorities in this language: "The Coordinator shall integrate, insofar as is practicable, through his foreign section, the mineral wealth of the rest of the world with that of the United States so that our industrial complexes will benefit: Provided, That preference shall be given to development of sources of minerals and metals in the following geographical order: (1) Within the United States, its Territories, and possessions; (2) within the rest of the Western Hemisphere; (3) within the Eastern Hemisphere."

It is probably the unerring logic of this section which the Government detests as much as any part of the bill. If the mining industry understood what the enactment of H. R. 6082 would mean to them there would be a clamor for it from border to border and coast to coast, especially at a time when Congress is about to abdicate in the President's favor without giving any specific instructions as to the treatment of the industry in the emergency planning. Without H. R. 6032 it will be the same old run-around.

Controls on the Way

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAY LeFEVRE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. LEFEVRE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include an editorial taken from yesterday's New York Herald Tribune.

I think everyone is pleased that both the Senate and the House have passed an economic controls bill. It is hopeful that the conferees will iron out their differences so the final bill will be more satisfactory. After this is done and if the President approves this measure, he will be given the most extensive authority ever granted a Chief Executive in this country, to regulate our Nation's economy.

If the reports are true that our Nation's productive powers are sufficiently great enough to satisfy our military requirements and our civilian needs, we all hope the President will not be forced to put into effect price and wage controls. We all can still recall the OPA days and the many inequities it brought to the consuming public. The way some commodities have spiralled, since the outbreak of the Korean war, is ridiculous and unjustified. It is hopeful that our large producers will recognize the unfairness in grabbing this opportunity for personal benefits. Everyone should do his best to keep prices to a reasonable level so the President will not be forced through pressure groups, to put this legislation into effect. The leveling-off process is already bringing some prices down and I have every reason to feel that they will continue to go down if we, the public, will only purchase what we need and stop hoarding. The New York Herald Tribune editorial follows:

CONTROLS ON THE WAY

At long last a bill to provide the limited controls needed to stem inflation and speed rearmament has reached the final stages of congressional deliberation. The Senate has sent into joint conference with House delegates a measure which has greater strengths than weaknesses. It contains most of the limited controls needed at the moment, and it provides for fuller stand-by controls to be invoked by the President as need may dictate. The conference must reconcile the Senate and House versions of a control statute. If it uses the Senate bill as a standard and removes some of its defects, we shall have a very adequate controls measure indeed.

The main difference between the Senate and House versions is that the Senate decided against giving the President power to adopt price controls on a selective basis. This makes control authority less flexible than the President would like to have it, but we believe the Senate was correct. Controlling some prices and not others is like squeezing a balloon in one's hands. Press in at one point and the balloon bubbles out at another. If the inflation balloon should become so big that great restraint is needed, a combination of over-all price and wage controls, plus additional taxation to let out some of the air—purchasing power—should do the job.

If a bill is finally passed without selective controls, and we hope it will be, great pressure will be placed upon the President to use his limited mobilization powers with vigor. He will be under pressure, too, to supplement the limited controls over industry with thoroughgoing employment of all the monetary powers at the administration's disposal. This is as it should be. None of us wants full controls if they are avoidable. They may be avoidable if the President uses his powers wisely, if he mobilizes the Treasury, Federal Reserve Board, and other monetary and credit agencies into a cooperating team, and if Congress provides the new taxes needed to reduce general inflationary pressure.

Because we wish limited controls to be given the best possible chance, we regret the Senate's failure to create checks on private credit over existing real estate properties. Unfortunate also is the Senate's peculiar assignment of powers over allocations and priorities to the Secretary of Commerce. If it wished to assure unified administration, it should have provided for a single agency to handle all controls. In any case, the responsibility should go directly to the President, not to one of his appointees. Finally, the provision requiring the Secretary of Agriculture to watch the commodity markets with a view to discouraging excessive speculation must fail to satisfy either those who believe that such speculation must be firmly restrained or those who are disturbed to see unnecessary regimentation. The Secretary is not given enough power to prevent abuses, but he is given enough to encumber the markets. Let us hope that the conference committee will retain the worth-while features of the Senate bill while making the changes necessary to add to them.

New England's War Record and Potential For War Production

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 23, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following letter and report that I have received from Mr. Dudley Harmon, executive vice president, the New England Council, Boston, Mass.:

AUGUST 22, 1950.

Hon. THOMAS J. LANE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN LANE: I am sending you herewith, for your information, two copies of a memorandum, "New England's War Record and Potential for War Production," prepared by Mr. Ray M. Hudson, manager of our industrial department. In the event that greatly expanded production for the purposes of national defense becomes necessary, we hope you will take advantage of every opportunity to call attention in Washington to the facts and figures contained therein.

With kindest regards, I am
Cordially yours,
DUDLEY HARMON,
Executive Vice President.

NEW ENGLAND'S WAR RECORD AND POTENTIAL FOR WAR PRODUCTION

(By Ray M. Hudson)

New England's contribution to war production during World War II, and some aspects of the region's capacities which indicate it should receive a high priority in plans for increasing production to meet the needs of the present emergency, were recently set forth in a letter to the National Security Resources Board. Pertinent sections of that letter are presented herewith:

THE RECORD IN WORLD WAR II

"In World War II, our war output totaled more than $17,700,000,000 as follows:

	Amount	Percent
Aircraft	$4,467,000,000	25.2
Ordnance	3,835,000,000	21.6
Ships	3,173,000,000	17.8
Textiles and apparel	2,575,000,000	14.5
Machinery and metals	1,350,000,000	7.6
Communication equipment	910,000,000	5.1
Miscellaneous	1,450,000,000	8.2
New England total	17,760,000,000	100.0

"Altogether, New England was awarded more than 9 percent of all the war contracts, impressive evidence, we believe, of its capacity and efficiency.

"Connecticut led the other New England States in the production of war supplies with approximately 45 percent of the regional total. Massachusetts was second with 38 percent, Rhode Island and Maine each had about 7 percent, New Hampshire 2 percent, and Vermont a little over 1 percent of the supply contracts let in the region.

"Our smaller plants were important cogs in New England's war production. Many of them were able to go right into the production of war specialties. Others were aided by the Smaller War Plants Corporation in adapting plant and equipment from nonwar products to war supplies. Over 5,000 of New England's smaller plants registered with the Corporation received contracts for about $600,000,000 for the production of war matériel.

"New England's construction industry was among those hardest hit by the war, the value of construction for all types of buildings dropping from $440,000,000 in 1941 to about $89,000,000 in 1944. Since expansion of war industries in New England took place generally in well-established areas, war housing and new-plant construction was well below that in many other parts of the country where expansion often took place in relatively nonindustrial areas. Nonmilitary facility contracts in New England amounted to roughly $780,000,000, only about 4.5 percent of the national total.

"Nearly $150,000,000, or about 20 percent of the total for nonmilitary facilities, was allocated for the construction of housing units to provide homes for war workers. About 30,000 permanent family units and 17,000 temporary and dormitory units were built with public funds, and an additional 17,000 units were developed by private capital under the war-housing program in New England."

THE REGION'S POTENTIAL

For new-plant sites

"If new defense plants are to be built, some of them should be located in New England. Our hills and valleys afford natural shelter; our networks of railroads, power lines, highways, and our abundant sources of fresh water are factors not easily disrupted. Even if they were, the disruption could be quickly localized and bypassed, or duplicate facilities quickly opened up."

For production

"The flexibility of our industrial structure, with its thousands of small suppliers, makes it ideal for subcontracting, while our ample, highly skilled and well-educated labor force is, in itself, a great source of strength. We have the least labor trouble here of any section in the country."

For regional action

"The New England Council provides an exceptional facility for assisting in the coordination of regional efforts for national defense. Its 25 years of achievement in uniting New England for constructive purposes proves this."

Control for the Love of Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OMAR BURLESON
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, at this time, when it appears necessary to take action to control the economy of our country, due to the situation we face, I think it timely that we take note of the views expressed in an editorial in the Herald-News, a weekly newspaper in Hamilton, Tex., located in my congressional district.

Many of you are familiar with the Biblical quotation, "What profiteth a man if he gains the whole world, and loseth his own soul." Economically, I wonder how long we can support half the world with our money and goods and fight the other half and remain free. I certainly think we should have bright red warning lights along the path we are taking in order not to go too far, but more especially, to be sure we can return on the same road down which we have already traveled some distance.

I commend this editorial to you as something to bear in mind in this time of pressure and demand:

CONTROL FOR THE LOVE OF CONTROL

How does socialism come to a country? A vivid and historically accurate answer to that question has been supplied by Dr. Franklin Bliss Snyder, president emeritus of Northwestern University, in a recent speech.

"Socialism lays its chilling hand on a nation the way old age overtakes us human beings," he said. "No nation, so far as I know, ever said, 'Go to it; after next Thursday we will all be Socialists.' No; the affliction comes gradually, and usually without discomfort in its early stages. But the ultimate result is unhappiness, national destitution, and slavery. The only way to fend it off is to be alert to the symptoms and take proper measures to eliminate them. In this way socialism can be kept at bay, for, though old age is inevitable, socialism is not.

Anthony Eden put the case against socialism well when he said last summer: "The Socialist Party is far too much given to control for the love of control. * * * In restricting liberty in small matters, they are playing into the hands of those who would suppress liberty in the greater things of life. The more we are conditioned to control the weaker becomes that sense of personal responsibility that in the past has been our strength as a nation."

"Control for the love of control" is a characteristic of all the "isms"—socialism, communism, nazism, or what have you. The appetites of those who seek ever-increasing power over others is insatiable. The ideals of sincere men are perverted to the use of the tyrant. Classical socialism stands for the maintenance of individual liberty—yet never in history has that been possible as a practical matter, as weary England has demonstrated. We must nip socialism in the bud or it will engulf us.

Canada's New Iron Treasury

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE E. KILBURN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. KILBURN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the Members and the country will read the article which I include from the Buffalo Evening News, Buffalo, N. Y. It proves how extremely necessary the St. Lawrence seaway and power development is for our country. I think the people are studying this question more and more and the whole great project is gaining supporters every day. The St. Lawrence seaway and power development is badly needed, especially under present conditions. We should have started it years ago. I ask my colleagues to read this article carefully:

CANADA'S NEW IRON TREASURY—RAILWAY TO ORE FIELDS IN LABRADOR EXPECTED TO START THIS AUTUMN

(By Ken W. MacTaggart)

BURNT CREEK, QUEBEC, August 12.—Unless the economic equilibrium of this continent becomes seriously disturbed, there appears to be a new mining empire in the making in this rocky wilderness—plus a powerful argument for deepening the St. Lawrence waterways.

Here, right on the Labrador-Quebec boundary, has been located one of the biggest iron deposits ever discovered. To date, sufficient ore has been found, and probed as to volume and values, to produce annual shipments of 10,000,000 tons until probably the end of this century. And they're still finding more.

To illustrate just how much there is, here is a recent incident:

Sampling of the deposits is being done by churn drills, the name describing just what the drill is and does. It churns down into the rock, the displaced material is washed up by water and collected for analysis.

SHRINKING UNITED STATES RESERVES

One of the drills out in the bush broke down and was hauled into camp here for repairs. When the salvaging task was completed, the drill was lugged out beside the camp cookery for a test. The drill struck one of the richest deposits to date, unknown till then. That shows how much iron there is here, there and everywhere.

The importance to Canada of this discovery has been described by many authorities as one of the greatest in mining history. With reserves of high-grade iron being depleted rapidly in the ranges of Minnesota, the United States steel industry has been casting around for new sources.

This new iron treasury is the reason why this frontier camp, 320 air miles from the nearest port and further than that from any railhead, can some day be a bustling city, consuming Canadian-made products and supporting thousands of people.

RAIL ROUTE FOUND

After the railway comes in, that is the big, next step. Survey gangs have been working in the area south from here to Seven Islands on the St. Lawrence and have blazed a route only 347 miles long.

Pessimists originally predicted that the air distance of 320 miles would mean a much longer rail route because of mountains, muskegs, and roaring rivers. But Engineer D. A. Livingstone, now on the job here, has found the highest point would be only 1,900 feet, despite 3,500-foot mountains.

D. J. A. Retty, one of Canada's best-known geologists, came in here in 1936 to begin his search of this hitherto little-known area. He has been here ever since and is now chief geologist of the set-up of many big companies involved in the exploration of the area.

TARGET DATE IS 1961

Labrador Mining & Exploration started the search, Hollinger Consolidated Gold Mines came into the picture later, and now Iron Ore Co. of Canada unites the parent companies and six of the biggest iron consumers of the United States.

The latter are providing $15,000,000 for exploration on the basis that if ore is produced they will receive their requirements before sales to others.

Thus co-operation has been achieved between Canadian originator of the project and American consumer of the product. Big-name United States engineers are familiar people around here, and executive aircraft of all types pop in regularly with loads of men whose names are constantly in the news.

They expect to know what is here by the end of 1951. Then development would begin. This would justify a railway to cost many millions ending at Seven Islands at the mouth of the St. Lawrence which would become thereby a big port.

Talk here is that the railway will get under way this fall. This would look as if the big steel companies have made their decision, half way through the 3-year period of testing to take up subleases.

ORE-WHEAT TRANSACTIONS

Well-founded rumor is that President Truman, worried about United States steel future, has given a nod to the big companies that they ought to protect their position. Officials here estimate that 10,000,000 tons of ore a year would justify the cost of a railway, the mining of the ore and operation of carriers from Cleveland to Seven Islands.

Which brings up the St. Lawrence waterway angle. Ore carriers are among the biggest ships on the Great Lakes, but they can't come down to the sea because of the St. Lawrence bottleneck. With deepening of the bottleneck, these ships could steam right to Seven Islands.

Supporters of the idea even add this suggestion: The ships could haul ore to Cleveland and return with wheat from Canada's prairies. Some visionaries here foresee Seven Islands as a port soon with huge terminal elevators where ocean carriers would accept their cargoes of wheat for foreign lands.

TOWN AWAITS CIVILIZATION

In the meantime, deep into some of the most rugged country Canada offers, there are hundreds of men working at uncovering tremendous ridges of iron. From the air a cruise of the territory shows an incredible network of roads—147 miles of them—dug out of the wilderness, connecting many small camps to the major camp here.

Along these roads roll enormous trucks; deep in the bush big power shovels strip away overburden on ridges and in gulches. And strung along the 347 miles of surface down to the St. Lawrence, engineers and their crews are planting stakes that mark where they hope a railway will pass some day.

Belief is that when the first load of steel rails leave the factory for Seven Islands the tip will come that this new mining empire has been proved. It will mean that the United States firms want this ore and have said so. The railway will be needed.

The Thirty-eighth Parallel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following editorial from the Christian Science Monitor, Boston, Mass., Wednesday, August 23, 1950:

FOR A UNIFIED KOREA

What happens when United Nations forces in Korea reach the thirty-eighth parallel?

To raise this question assumes a victory, either military or diplomatic, for whic only the first solid footings have begun to be laid. It assumes that no fresh aggression breaks out in another part of the world to demand attention.

Yet the question is being asked by a number of Americans and perhaps residents of other nations.

Though this is too early for the non-Communist world to lay down a binding course of action, it is not too early to begin thinking through some of the issues which will become concrete and pressing once South Korea is reoccupied. For then the nations will face a question which already deeply concerns Koreans, and that is, "What kind of government or governments shall exist throughout Korea, South and North?"

Koreans for generations, even centuries, have yearned for independence. They have never been significantly divided among themselves along any geographical lines, but have sought independence in terms of unity.

Unification of Korea now, as a result of the tragedy that has occurred, would seem as natural as the aspiration to independence itself.

Possibly the make-up of the United Nations contains the elements for accomplishing that unification and correcting an arbitrary and improvised division of the country.

Sir Benegal N. Rau, UN delegate from India, suggested as much when he told newsmen that the Security Council subcommittee he proposed might, among other things, draw up a picture of a postwar unified Korea.

American Delegate Warren Austin pointed out on August 17 that the UN General Assembly for 3 years has sought the establishment of "a free, unified, and independent nation" for the Korean people, and has urged that free and fair elections should be held for this purpose throughout the length of their peninsula.

Those declarations by the Assembly would seem to govern the necessary war aims of the United Nations, including the United States.

One further consideration is pertinent, too. The aggressor must be rolled back far enough to discourage any further aggression.

If the crime of breaking and entering a man's house bore no further penalty than that the burglar should get out of the house and give back the silverware he had stolen, how effective would be the law enforcement against burglary? There must be some punishment, something forfeited, for the breaking and entering, whether it be a person's house or his country.

What would be more reasonable in this case than that Soviet Russia, the principal in the crime, be required to give up its police-state hold over the territory used as its base for aggression and over the people dragged into fighting its war?

These are some of the considerations which must carry weight when the time comes for a decision as to whether United Nations forces should, or can, stop at the thirty-eighth parallel.

Chile Offers Bolivia Seaport

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith an article entitled "Chile Offers Bolivia Seaport; Truman Said To Back Proposal" which appeared in the New York Times, Thursday, July 13, 1950:

CHILE OFFERS BOLIVIA SEAPORT; TRUMAN SAID TO BACK PROPOSAL—OUTLET WOULD BE BETWEEN ARICA AND PERU BORDER—NO COMPENSATION SOUGHT

(By Milton Bracker)

LA PAZ, BOLIVIA, July 12.—Chile is willing to give Bolivia an outlet to the sea between Arica and the Peruvian border and President Truman has given enthusiastic approval of the plan, President Mamerto Urriolagoitia said in an interview here today.

The project, which would in effect change the map of South America and revitalize Bolivian economy, has been delayed by the lack of a constitutional government in Peru, President Urriolagoitia added.

He declared that it was unquestionably a tripartite question among Chile, Bolivia, and Peru, and once Gen. Manuel Odria was sworn in as the elected President and the Peruvian Congress convenes July 28, he said he felt that the matter could be abvanced in practical terms.

President Truman was understood to have approved the matter when President Gabriel Gonzalez Videla, of Chile, broached it to him during a recent United States trip. The implication was that the United States would help to finance the construction of the port and the building of a spur northward from the existing La Paz-Arica Railroad northward to the new city.

Naturally no such commitment is regarded as firm until the political aspect of the matter has been worked out. Assistant Secretary Miller on a trip last winter during which he invited Gonzalez Videla, also assured President Urriolagoitia that the United States favored the plan, the Bolivian President said.

NO COMPENSATION SOUGHT

Bolivia's lack of a Pacific port dates to the loss of Antofagasta in 1879. President Urriolagoitia emphasized gratefully that President Gonzales Videla's proposal involved no compensation from Bolivia.

In effect the plan would alter the map of South America. It would also shorten the distance over which Bolivian tin and other minerals have to be shipped to the United States. Most of these now go through Antofagasta.

Peru is obviously involved because the proposed corridor would border on Peru's southern frontier—which long figured in the celebrated Tacna-Arica dispute.

The subject stirred wide interest here this morning because of articles in a Chilean weekly that evoked a declaration in Santiago from Horacio Walker, Chile's Foreign Minister, that Chile was disposed to start conversations on the matter with Bolivia.

In the same bullet-scarred palace from the balcony of which Dictator Villaroel was thrown 4 years ago this month, President Urriolagoitia also revealed an unprecedented plan for implementing the work of the United Nations Technical Assistance Commission here.

The President said that a law would be proposed permitting the assignment here on a long-range basis of international experts who would effectively take jobs in various ministries with a view to cleaning up and coordinating the inefficient administration that has long plagued the country.

Care would be taken so as not to have all, or a majority, from the United States for in that case enemies of the regime might capitalize on the issue of imperialism.

Rather, the experts would be truly international—a sort of extension of the present mission whose 14 members represent 11 nations. It was understood that approval of this plan by the technical assistance board of the United Nations was what Mr. Keenleyside, chief of the mission, had sought and obtained in Geneva.

America's Summons To Greatness

OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Des Moines Sunday Register of August 13, 1950:

AMERICA'S SUMMONS TO GREATNESS

In the current Saturday Review of Literature, Editor Norman Cousins projects himself into the year 1960 and "looks back" upon two alternative developments which he considers possible during the present decade.

The first "retrospection" pictures a world in which the human race has been three-fourths destroyed—and its remainder reduced to primitivism—by the atomic bomb. The second, more optimistic résumé describes the evolution of a world government at least, through the courage and vision of the president of the United States and the American people.

This comes about, in Mr. Cousins' imagination, when the American president acknowledges the futility of a world organization which is only a debating society, and decides to appeal to the decent nations for a United Nations which instead is truly a world government.

Mr. Cousins has the president say in giving new instructions to our UN delegates:

"Briefly stated, (my) instructions direct the American delegates * * * to propose at once a Revision Conference of the United Nations under Articles 108 and 109. These articles provide that a conference may be called for the purpose of altering the structure of the United Nations if two-thirds of the nations wish to do so. Such a call is not subject to the veto.

"The American purpose in proposing such a Conference is to give the greatest possible strength to the United Nations in the shortest possible time.

"By all possible strength, I am thinking of the power of world law. This would most certainly include law-making, law-enforcing, and law-interpreting agencies.

"It would mean that the United Nations would have at its disposal a police force or army of substantial numbers.

"It is no secret that the aggressor in modern warfare possesses a tremendous advantage. He can choose the time and place of attack, counting on surprise to attain the objective before the victim can defend himself or rally support.

"No one nation can be expected to police the entire world against this type of aggression. The threat is against the world, and the world must organize to defend itself. * * *

"But let there be no mistake about it. There are benefits but there are also obligations and responsibilities. * * *

"Unlimited national sovereignty cannot be retained—if we sincerely want peace.

"No nation can be a law unto itself in the common affairs of the world community—if we sincerely want peace.

"No nation can expect to retain sole jurisdiction over the size and nature of its arsenals—if we sincerely want peace.

"Any nation sincerely interested in security, any nation that does not covet other territory, should have no hesitation in accepting these duties as a member of the world community. * * *

"I am proposing that the delegates from each nation be elected by popular vote. This will make the United Nations a truly representative body of the world's peoples. The method of elections and the size of the various representations should be left to the determination of the Revision Conference.

"Participation in the building of such a responsible world body is the greatest challenge and privilege for America in its history. It is a summons to greatness. * * *"

That is Norman Cousins' thesis.

It is one which, as our older friends know, The Register has espoused a thousand times in the past 35 years.

Events year after year simply prove the more conclusively that there cannot be law and order without government, and that world political institutions—however embellished with fine documents—are not really world government unless they are (1) responsible to the people, and (2) given the authority and power to act.

Intervention in Foreign Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following editorial from the Telegram News, Lynn, Mass., Monday, August 21, 1950:

FOURTH KOREAN WAR FOR UNITED STATES

The fighting in Korea represents the fourth time American forces have intervened in that far-eastern nation with armed forces without a formal declaration of war. Prior interventions were in 1871, 1888, and 1894. They were small-scale and of short duration.

Nor does the action in Korea represent the first time the United States has participated in an international army while ostensibly at peace.

Curiously enough, American forces once fought shoulder to shoulder with Russian troops less than 700 miles from where GI's are now battling Russian-trained Communists.

This was in 1900-01, during the Boxer rebellion in China, when President William McKinley sent 5,000 troops to help relieve the siege of foreign quarters in Peking by Chinese rebels. The American troops were joined by Russians, British, French, German, and Japanese armed forces.

The United States has participated in at least five international armies during peacetime. In addition to the Boxer rebellion, the United States acted in conjunction with the British in 1854 during a Chinese civil war, intervened in Uruguay with other powers in 1858, bombarded the Japanese in 1864 with British, French, and Netherlands forces, and acted jointly with Germany and Great Britain in Samoa in 1888.

This is the first time, however, that an American commander, Gen. Douglas MacArthur, has headed an international army except in time of war.

According to one historian, American Armed Forces, largely marines, have intervened in the affairs of other nations more than 180 times.

In the earlier, lusty days of the Republic, American Armed Forces didn't hesitate to intervene at the drop of a hat, sometimes without the prior authorization of the President, much less Congress.

American Armed Forces first saw action in Korea in 1871, when a six-ship naval squadron was fired upon while investigating a Korean attack on a United States merchant vessel.

The squadron fired back, silencing two shore batteries, but withdrew when a warship struck a rock. Ten days later, the expedition returned. The Marines stormed the Korean forts and killed 250 Koreans. American losses were three killed and nine wounded.

In 1888, American forces sent to Seoul to protect American residents whose lives were endangered by a threatened outbreak. From 1894 to 1896, a Marine guard was kept at the American legation there to protect American lives and property during and following the Sino-Japanese war.

Intervention in foreign nations without a declaration of war or the consent of Congress has been a frequent occurrence in American history. Indicative of this is the impressive list of countries which American Armed Forces have entered.

They include: Dominican Republic, Egypt, Tripoli, Spanish Florida, Cuba, Greece, Falkland Islands, Sumatra, Argentina, Peru, Fiji Islands, Portuguese West Africa, Formosa, Mexico, Haiti, Chile, Brazil, Syria, Ethiopia, Morocco, Honduras, Turkey, Russia, and Iceland.

The major conflicts in which the United States engaged without the formality of declaring war included the naval war with France in 1798, the attacks upon the Barbary pirates of Tripoli (1801–05) and Algiers (1815), the bombardment and capture of Vera Cruz, Mexico (April 21–November 23, 1914), Gen. John J. Pershing's punitive expedition into Mexico against Pancho Villa in 1916, and a similar search for the Nicaraguan outlaw Sandino some years later.

Furthermore, 5,100 American troops occupied Russian territory around Archangel in 1918-19 to protect the port and surrounding area from the Bolshevists. From August 1918 to April 1, 1920, some 9,000 American troops helped protect Vladivostok, Siberia, and railways westward for hundreds of miles from the Bolshevists.

In 1941, while the United States was still officially at peace, President Roosevelt ordered Greenland and Iceland, then dependencies of German-occupied Denmark, "protected" by American troops to guard them against a possible Nazi seizure.

Letter to Hon. Yacov Malik, United Nations, Lake Success, N. Y.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith the following letter written to the Honorable Yacov Malik, United Nations, Lake Success, N. Y., by the Reverend Jule Ayers, minister, First Presbyterian Church, Wilkes-Barre, Pa.:

GOVERNORS ISLAND, N. Y.,
August 13, 1950.

Hon. YACOV MALIK,
United Nations,
Lake Success, N. Y.

DEAR MR. MALIK: I am sure that there are not many of us in the world who envy you in the position of great power and responsibility which you have today. Yours is the task of representing the Soviet Union, which Union has had a very determining influence on the events of the twentieth century.

In recent years, we in the United States, have known your countrymen as brave and respected allies. Your people and our people are both young in nationhood, virile, industrially minded, concerned to raise the standard of living, and impelled by a sense of mission of world-wide importance.

It would be grand if the people of our countries might know each other better. I am sure that I lack understanding and appreciation of the country you represent. You will recognize, I know, my enthusiasm for America. I want you to feel that—for it is important that you do.

In company with many others, I feel that our Nation was founded as an experiment in liberty. Our institutions reflect the fundamental conviction that human origin and destiny, as well as human rights and duties have their source and meaning in Almighty God. Millions have come here from other lands to find, develop, and extend opportunities to enjoy life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness free from ecclesiastical, economic, and political tyranny. This is the clue to, and the goal of, our national life.

To be sure, we are very much aware of our personal and collective shortcomings. In many respects our professions outdo our practice. We acknowledge that we have not yet given democracy its full or proper expression in race relations, economic welfare, and educational opportunities. But democracy here has not ceased to grow. We know the direction we must go. We are progressing and we shall continue along that course. Yes, we have been vindictive at times toward former enemies, suspicious toward recent allies, complacent toward the suffering of people who need desperately not a United States dole but peace treaties and access to raw materials and markets in order to survive. Granted that, in the midst of temptations that overwhelming power has placed in our hands, we have been all too smug, comfort-loving and pleasure-seeking, and materialistically minded, yet this is only a fraction of the true picture.

You are certainly aware of the fact that citizens of the United States, through private and public sources, during the past 5 years have made great efforts to answer the cry of mankind's sickness, misery, and starvation. The objective has been to express humanitarian compassion and to help people to help themselves. Conscious that dollars and cents, and even food, clothing, and medical supplies, can never express the indebtedness we feel to one another as nations, yet I dare say that never before has history recorded such a consistent, determined and cooperative endeavor to advance, in so limited a time, the well-being of multitudes of men, women, and children in distant and diverse countries.

The point 4 legislation of our Government, providing economic aid in areas of the world where it is most needed and welcome, follows the spirit and basic intent humanitarian aspects of the Marshall plan. Insofar as that plan has furthered resistance to communism, it has accomplished this through alleviating and overcoming chaotic conditions and promoting social health and welfare. It is true that our recent policies have included military preparedness for ourselves and the willingness to give such assistance to certain others upon request. Some of us have sought to have this curtailed. Nevertheless this has been accepted by most of our people as a buttress of the policies of our administration, not so much for our own sake alone, but for the sake of those who were receiving our cooperation and assistance in economic reconstruction and national rehabilitation.

If the policies our Nation has followed in Europe and Asia have aroused fear and anxiety among your people, the action of Communist Parties in Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Greece, Yugoslavia, and other parts of the world, have had a similar effect in this country. This action usually has involved treachery, lying, cruelty and the use of force, to further purposes which, under the guise of liberation, have been inimical to the values of democracy and freedom, dear to the people of the United States. It is clear to me that the continuation in the modern world of feudalism, colonialism, and imperialism makes peace perilous. But likewise the policy of undermining governments in authority, of violent revolution, and of promising a bright future for the human race under communism is a threat to peace of major proportions.

I believe that the way to peace with justice and benevolent concern for all people, including those who agree and disagree with us on matters of politics and economics, lies in a different direction. As a citizen of the United States, I have had the chance to grow up in a community where I came to believe in God. I am convinced that He is my Heavenly Father, and the Father of all mankind. He has made men in His image and likeness, and intends that they live as brothers. God is the author and preserver of both natural law and moral law. It is His Will that men obey the principles revealed in the Holy Bible, and that there be "peace on earth and goodwill toward men." The purpose of our human existence is for us and all men to come to know God through a personal response to the message, spirit, and leadership of His Son, Jesus Christ. The peace God brings, and seeks for the world, comes among, and works through, those of every race, class, and nation, who serve Him unreservedly, in their allotted time and place on earth, as they share in building His Kingdom, and extending His sovereignty over the minds and souls of His children.

It has been the source of regret to many of us in the United States that the youth of the Soviet Union have lived in an environment in which the expression of vital Christian experience and activity has been discouraged officially. This has been tragic, to our way of thinking, because the fruits of peace, justice, and the common welfare cannot grow without rootage in a fundamental spiritual loyalty. Granted that churches can be handmaidens of superstition, magic, and the worst features of the status quo, yet commitment to the principles and person of Jesus Christ provides the only basis for justice, security, decency and peace in the world. There can be no honesty, integrity, respect for the written or spoken word, or sensitivity to the rights and point-of-view of people who differ from us, unless there is acknowledged One, above all nations, all expediences, all advantages of time, circumstance, and position, to Whom all are acknowledged responsible and accountable.

Servants of Jesus Christ have carried on their mission while living under every form of government. They bear their testimony today in the western democracies, eastern Germany, Poland, Yugoslavia, Hungary, the Near East, Africa, India, Japan, and China—as well as in the Soviet Union and the United States. They are not seeking primarily to further one or another system of government. Where religious freedom is guaranteed, they make a more apparent impact. Nevertheless they remember that their Lord, while on the earth in human form, set out to change men's hearts (their motives, attitudes, and relationships) and not to further a military revolt. Hence they seek to: Discover good wherever they can in every constructive movement, encourage and expect the best from existing leadership, and trust God more fully each day—remembering that since He is Creator and Ruler of the universe and mankind, He knows what He is doing, or allowing men to do, and His ways are mysterious, and too often misunderstood by His children.

My American citizenship, you can see Mr. Malik, placed me in an environment where the Christian faith was transmitted to me. The reason for my living, and the sole purpose of my life, is to pass it on to others. I want to pass it on to my family. I want to see it transmitted through the world-wide fellowship of those who accept His purpose and live by His power.

During World War II, I served as a chaplain in the United States Air Force. I saw something of the reality of war in the twentieth century, and its aftermath in the United States. I am sure, however, that any experiences that may have been ours here scarcely compare with the physical, material, economic, and spiritual loss which your people suffered from 1939 to 1945. Out of the sorrow and tragedy of those years, there arose the will to form and establish a United Nations Organization. How the rank-and-file people of our land, and of other lands, including your own I am sure, took heart when the UN Charter was adopted.

The early years of the UN have brought strains and difficulties, but a succession of important accomplishments. The record of the UN in preventing widespread war through peaceful negotiation, moral force, and reasonable compromise in Israel, India, and Indonesia stirred our hopes. The helping of dependent peoples toward self-government through the Trusteeship Council, the economic assistance and aid given to refugees and DP's, the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and the progress made in the fields of health, nutrition, agriculture, labor, education, child welfare, and finance and trade, bear witness to significant achievements, and overshadow differences in the Security Council on procedure and policies, and on the control of atomic energy.

The Christian people of America, and I think of many other lands, have come to feel that the United Nations is an instrument through which sovereign nations can meet and work for the protection and well-being of the community of nations. In that regard, the United Nations, acting through the Security Council by overwhelming votes, has made, of late, some fateful decisions. More are yet to be made. You and your government are needed to help make them, and to share in the common responsibility of seeing that they are enforced.

I wonder if you have any idea how many people are interested in, and concerned about, the United Nations. I assure you that a large number of them are profoundly disturbed lest the UN be used by the United States, the Soviet Union, or any other nation as a tool of a particular national interest, a means of coercive domination by any one nation, or a place where parliamentary processes are obstructed in the interest of a small minority. The UN should be the town meeting of the world, and the instrument for the maintenance and extension of peace, justice, brotherhood, and cooperation among all nations. Up to this point the UN has made efforts to be that, and to stand for that. Let us hope, let us work, let us relinquish the desire and need always to have our own way, let us see situations in their fullest perspective and implications, let us sacrifice even a measure of our "face," our pride, our assurance that we alone are right—much that is dearest to us, and let us pray to Almighty God, in order that the peoples and governments of the twentieth century may experience world cooperation and world order on a basis hitherto unknown in human history.

Mr. Malik, you note that I said, "let us pray to Almighty God." That is exactly what I mean. I believe that more things are wrought by prayer and sincere Christian living than this world recognizes or imagines. In these troublous days many people the world over are praying for you, your countrymen, your government, and Mr. Stalin. They are also praying for the United States, Mr. Austin, Mr. Truman, and the United Nations, with all its personnel, agencies, and purposes. We who are among those who are praying thus, feel we are in fellowship with people of like spirit and intent the world over. We believe that such prayers help provide the atmosphere and conditions whereby any and all of us, yourself included, can be used of God whereby, in consequence, things may be accomplished which otherwise would seem impracticable, foolish, impossible. We are praying for peace based on justice and benevolent concern for all people; for the acknowledgment of our common accountability to God and the relevance of the principles, message, and spirit of Christianity for our basic needs; and for the patience, courage, and wisdom to be given us, to you, and to all government and peoples, to measure up acceptably to the dangers and opportunities of the hour.

In your hands, and in ours, and in the United Nations, is placed a tremendous power and responsibility. The conscience of humanity pleads that this power may be so used now that the foundations of a richer and fuller life for ourselves and all people may be laid—as we acknowledge our relationship to Him and to His purpose for the world, revealed in Jesus Christ.

Respectfully yours,

Rev. JULE AYERS,
Minister, First Presbyterian Church.

Lessons of the Korean War

OF

HON. HARRY L. TOWE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. TOWE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Deseret News, Salt Lake City, Utah, for Friday, August 11, 1950:

KOREAN 6 WEEKS SHOWS THAT WARS ARE WON BY BALANCED FORCES, NOT "PRUSSIAN" STAFFS

Weeks of fighting in Korea have brought home to Americans a number of stern lessons in twentieth century warfare, but perhaps none so important or far-reaching as the emphasis on the need for a balanced fighting force along traditional American lines.

Only last October the Nation was rocked with the repercussions of the ill-famed interservice squabble, in which the Navy and Air Force figuratively threw brickbats at each other in hearings before the House Armed Services Committee. From those hearings the Navy appeared to emerge a discredited second in the interservice battle and was condemned as the villain of a plot to disrupt service unity.

Now, just over 9 months later, battle reports and expert military analyses of the Korean situation read like a rehash of some of the Navy arguments before Congress last fall. Let us refresh our memories with a look at the record of the October hearings.

Navy witnesses at the hearings testified that the "push-button theory" of an "atomic blitz war," to be won by heavy strategic bombers and the atom bomb was fallacious. They cried out against the slashing of the Navy air arm and the strength of the Marine Corps in the name of economy.

On the other hand, General Bradley, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and most influential spokesman for the Air Force-Army point of view, shook the country with his blast at Navy witnesses and said, among other things, that strategic air bombardment was the "first and quickest way the United States could strike back" in case of Russian aggression, and that Navy officers were "still preoccupied with past island-hopping campaigns" and showed "no conception of the kind of continental operations which a war with Russia would involve."

A conflict growing out of Russian-backed aggression has now come, and the United States is deeply involved. And what do we find? It is the kind of war for which the Air Force-Army critics of Navy forethought had not planned.

So far the effectiveness of strategic bombing has been—to say the least—minor in Korea. On the other hand, tactical air support is vital, and until such time as ground bases in quantity can be set up, equipped, and manned on the Korean mainland, tactical support has been in very large measure up to the Navy's carrier-based planes. Furthermore, the need for a "minuteman" fighting force such as the Marine Corps has once again been heavily emphasized.

In short, we have come clearly to see that the push-button war is still a long way off and that we need a balanced fighting force to preserve our national security.

Let it be clearly understood that we do not advocate that the Navy be made the dominant voice in our Armed Forces council. We do loudly cry out the imperative necessity for having no one service dominant in our councils. Single-service or two-service domination can lead only to one end: the establishment of a Prussian-type supreme general staff, the discredited concept of the military-minded Germany which followed this plan to defeat in two World Wars.

Instead, America should stand fast by the successful American concept of the balanced force, which has brought us ultimate victory in those same two conflicts. Certainly it would be unsound to discard a system proved successful for one which was employed by our defeated enemies.

Let us hope that the lessons being learned in Korea may be blessings in disguise, saving us from serious error which might otherwise have led us toward future disaster in some all-out big war.

Ambassador Walter Thurston, A Distinguished Public Servant

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLAIR ENGLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. ENGLE of California. Mr. Speaker, one of America's most capable and experienced diplomats is the Honorable Walter Thurston, the American Ambassador to Mexico. He has spent many years in Mexico, as well as other Latin American countries. His years of residence in Mexico prior to and since he became United States Ambassador to Mexico has given him an intimate knowledge of the Mexican people, their language and their customs. To a Foreign Service often criticized for the lack of career diplomats, he brought rare abilities for diplomatic service, which over the years he has made more valuable with training and experience. It is regrettable that the appointment of Mayor O'Dwyer as Ambassador to Mexico, whatever its merits, will cause the loss of Walter Thurston's outstanding ability and training to the Foreign Service. Our relations with Mexico have been so cordial that, as those of our northern neighbor, they have been taken for granted. That happy state of affairs is due in no small part to the splendid work of Ambassador Walter Thurston. He is one of the finest examples of the career diplomat. He has served his country with ability, patience, and distinction, and it will be a sad loss indeed to the State Department and to this Nation if there is not some way to make use of his unusual abilities in the Western Hemisphere, where his understanding of the political and economic affairs of the Latin American countries can continue to benefit the American people.

Resolutions of Pennsylvania State Camp, Patriotic Order of Sons of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS E. WALTER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolutions:

VIGILANCE AND ACTION AGAINST COMMUNISM

Whereas the eighty-fourth annual sessions, Pennsylvania State Camp, Patriotic Order Sons of America in the city of Easton, Pa., on this the 23d day of August 1950 being thoroughly cognizant of the imminent dangers of the ideology of communism; and

Whereas it is apparent that the ideology of communism is spreading rapidly throughout the world under the direction of the Politburo of Russia and as such ideology is directed toward the destruction of the free governments of the world and religion; and

Whereas it is apparent that the forces of communism have gained many recruits in the United States, who are active in the various phases of the life of our Nation, including the governmental economic and educational life of our Nation; and

Whereas the success of communism in recent years in many of the presently designated communistic satellite nations of the world has caused such nations to lose their freedoms and to become pawns of the communistic government of Russia; and

Whereas the loss of their freedoms has been established largely by infiltration tactics generally used by the communistic forces of Russia in overthrowing the established governments of such free nations; and

Whereas the infiltration tactics of the communistic party have also been used in gaining a voice in the direction of educational institutions of the free nations of the world which have proven to be a grave danger to the concept of democracy and Christianity in the nations where such infiltration has been accomplished: Therefore, be it hereby

Resolved by the officers and delegates attending the eighty-fourth annual State convention of the Pennsylvania State Camp of the Patriotic Order Sons of America, That we do hereby strongly condemn communism and the treacherous methods used by the leaders and followers of communism in seeking to destroy the freedom of the free peoples of the world and to distort the minds of the youth of the free nations of the world as to the everlasting values of freedom and Christianity; and be it further

Resolved, That the Government of the United States and the governments of the several States of the Nation, and the directing agencies of the educational institutions of the Nation be congratulated upon their courageous efforts to expel all persons belonging to the Communistic Party or who sympathize with the Communist ideology of government from employment by such governments or from such educational institutions and that rigid safeguards be set up where they do not now exist by such governments or educational institutions to prevent such infiltration and resultant danger to our Nation; and be it further

Resolved, That we do hereby urge the Congress of the United States to enact legislation which will require the immediate registration of all Communist Party members residing in the United States and its Territories with adequate penalties to be provided for failure to comply therewith—and be it further resolved that we do hereby endorse all legislation introduced into the United States Congress for the purpose of restricting and controlling the Communist Party and Communist Party members and activity in the United States.

SUPPORT AND EDUCATION FOR UNITED NATIONS PROGRAMS FOR EDUCATION

Be it hereby resolved by the Eighty-fourth Annual State Convention of the Pennsylvania State Camp, Patriotic Order Sons of America, convened in Easton, Pa., this 23d day of August 1950, That—

Whereas the United Nations is now engaged in a world-wide effort to establish its value as an international organization designed to preserve peace in the world and to protect the several nations of the world from aggression; and

Whereas the United Nations Headquarters is located in the United States and as the United States is the most powerful of the free nations of the world, which is supporting the United Nations in its noble efforts to attain to the high principle heretofore set forth; and

Whereas many of the citizens of the United States are not familiar with the high purposes and values to civilization of the United Nations; and

Whereas such understanding would result in greater public support for this international organization of which our Nation is a member: Therefore be it hereby

Resolved by the Pennsylvania State Camp, Patriotic Order Sons of America, That we do hereby commend the 53 free member nations of the United Nations which are now by their collective strength and influence seeking to bring peace to the world and to attain freedom through lawful means for the masses of humanity, many of whom have their freedoms still denied to them; and

We do hereby further recommend that each subordinate camp of the Patriotic Order Sons of America in Pennsylvania hold periodic United Nations programs in their several camps for the enlightenment of the members and the general public of the community in which such camps are located concerning the United Nations and its high purposes and actions in the cause of establishing peace and world freedom for the masses of civilization.

ADEQUATE NATIONAL DEFENSE

Be it hereby resolved by the Patriotic Order Sons of America of Pennsylvania in their eighty-fourth annual State convention in the city of Easton, Pa., on this the 23d day of August 1950, That—

Whereas there has been a general complacency throughout the Nation since the close of World War II concerning national defense; and

Whereas the present United Nations action in which the United States Armed Forces are participating has suddenly caused the people of our Nation to recognize the urgency of attaining adequate national defense within the briefest period of time without disastrous effect upon the national economy; and

Whereas it is apparent that the people of the United States desire the Government of the United States to immediately take such steps as may be necessary to provide immediately adequate national defense; and

Whereas it is apparent that the Congress of these United States has sensed the desire of the people of the Nation for legislation to provide immediate, adequate national defense: Therefore be it

Resolved by the officers and delegates attending this convention, That we do hereby urge the Congress of the United States to immediately enact such legislation that may be necessary to provide for immediate adequate defense with proper provisions therein to safeguard the inherent rights of the people under the Constitution of the United States; be it further

Resolved, That we do hereby urge the members of our order and all good American citizens to immediately realize the grave issues confronting our Nation and that we do hereby further urge the citizens of the United States to awaken from their complacency and become active as vigilant patriotic citizens in the preservation of our country and the liberty of our people through loyal cooperation with our Government in fighting the forces which would disrupt our national unity and destroy our efforts to adequately defend our Nation and to preserve the liberty of our people.

CONDEMNATION OF HOARDING AND ITS DAMAGE TO OUR ECONOMY

Be it hereby resolved by the officers and delegates attending the eighty-fourth annual convention of the Pennsylvania State Camp, Patriotic Order Sons of America, That—

Whereas immediately following the unwarranted attack by the armed forces of North Korea against the free nation of South Korea and the immediate intervention by the United Nations forces to aid the government of South Korea against the forces of North Korea, that throughout the United States in many communities that certain citizens of the United States immediately began scare buying and hoarding of commodities which they thought might become scarce and later rationed when such commodities are in great abundance in the Nation: and

Whereas such hoarding by American citizens is unpatriotic and injurious to the welfare of our Nation; and

Whereas such hoarding is directly contributing aid to the Communist enemies of our Nation by creating unnecessary shortage of such commodities; and

Whereas such hoarding is an indication of extreme selfishness and lack of patriotism on the part of such citizens who have or are engaging in such scare buying or hoarding: Be it therefore

Resolved by the officers and delegates attending the convention, That we do hereby condemn as unpatriotic and unworthy such citizens who hoard commodities in this time of grave international crisis and that we do hereby urge the several camps of our order in Pennsylvania to publicly denounce unpatriotic hoarding and to join with other patriotic and civic groups in urging the citizens of their several communities to purchase only their normal needs and thereby not endanger the economic life of our Nation by hoarding.

COMMENDING THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT FOR ITS ACTION IN KOREA

Be it hereby resolved that the officers and delegates attending the eighty-fourth annual convention of the Pennsylvania State Camp, Patriotic Order Sons of America in the city of Easton, Pa., That—

Whereas the Communist Government of North Korea without provocation attacked the nation of South Korea with its armed forces on June 25, 1950; and

Whereas the President and Government of the United States immediately intervened with 52 other free nations of the world, under the direction of the Security Council of the United Nations, to protect and defend South Korea from the unwarranted acts of aggression of North Korea; and

Whereas this intervention by the armed forces of certain member nations, the United Nations was prompted by the Government of the United States in seeking to preserve the liberty of the people of South Korea and to restrain the Communist forces of North Korea in their uncivilized attack upon the people of the free nation of South Korea: therefore be it hereby

Resolved, That we do hereby commend the Government of the United States and the governments of other free nations of the United Nations which have joined with the United States in fighting the forces of communism which are seeking to enslave the people of South Korea and to destroy their right of free government and the liberty which has been guaranteed to them by the United Nations, which created the government of South Korea following the close of World War II.

URGING APPROVAL FOR INCREASED FUNDS FOR VOICE OF AMERICA BROADCASTS

Be it hereby resolved that the officers and delegates attending the eighty-fourth annual convention of the Pennsylvania State Camp, Patriotic Order Sons of America in the city of Easton, Pa., That—

Whereas the Government of the United States is seeking by the radio Voice of America to penetrate the iron curtain which has been thrown around the Communist nations of the world by the Politburo of Russia; and

Whereas the effectiveness of such programs has become apparent by the jamming of the air by Russian radio stations to prevent the programs from reaching the citizens of the Communist nations; and

Whereas the Russian Government has recently increased its series of programs to the people of the Communist nations of the world for the purpose of discrediting the United States and the other free nations of the world: Therefore, be it hereby

Resolved by this convention, That we hereby urge the Congress of the United States to provide sufficient funds to adequately present to the people of the world by radio and other mediums programs designed to set forth the true value of democracy and the lasting benefits of free governments to the people of the world, that such programs be presented in areas where the Communist governments of the world are located and which are seeking to embitter the minds of the people under Soviet domination against the free nations of the world, and particularly the Government of the United States.

Be it hereby resolved by the officers and delegates attending the eighty-fourth annual State convention of the Pennsylvania State Camp of the Patriotic Order Sons of America, in Easton, Pa., on this the 23d day of August 1950, That—

Whereas the representatives of the various nations who attended the International Genocide Convention signed the convention proposal to outlaw the crime and un-Christian act of genocide; and

Whereas all nations with signatory representatives at the Genocide Convention have ratified the convention with the exception of approximately six nations including Russia: Therefore be it hereby

Resolved, That we do hereby recommend that the governments of all nations which were represented at the convention and which have not ratified the Genocide Convention do so at the earliest possible time in order to attain the high Christian purpose of the convention.

A Fight for Democracy Still Alive

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI

OF WISCONSIN

Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, because so many of us have of recent date expressed or heard infelicitous attitudes toward the downtrodden people suffering under the yoke of the Soviet rulers in satellite countries, it is heartening to learn that the spirit and willingness to fight for democracy is evident in many instances.

I wish to call to the attention of my colleagues the letter of Jerzy J. Lerski, vice chairman of the Polish Freedom Movement for Independence and Democracy, published in the Washington Post of Sunday, August 20, 1950. The letter should correct the concept some of us have toward the peoples of the satellite countries. It dispels to a degree the prevalent fatalistic attitude of the future of these countries.

Mr. Kazimierz Puzak, of whom Lerski writes as an outstanding representative of Polish democracy, was indeed a champion of the freedoms in his native Poland. He gave unselfishly of his time and effort to better the conditions in his land. It can be said that he gave his very life for the cause of freedom in a subjected, Soviet controlled and influenced nation. Although he died in May of this year, his passing was kept secret until recently because the regime in power realized his popularity with the rank and file. He has spent much of his life in prison because of his political activities. No doubt, contrary to common belief, there are many of his type in the subjected countries, striving against tremendous odds, and with little help fighting the cause of freedom.

Too often we are unaware and not duly apprised of their efforts. Too often we are critical without thorough knowledge and due consideration for those who are giving their all in the struggle for the very freedoms and democracy that we wish them to have.

It is because I believe that the memorial to Puzak points up the fight that is still active in underground movements in satellite countries that I commend the following letter to the attention of my colleagues:

KAZIMIERZ PUZAK

It was with deep sorrow that I read in your August 12 issue about the death of the great Polish leader Kazimierz Puzak in a Communist prison in Warsaw. That outstanding representative of Polish democracy became a symbol of unconquerable spiritual resistance to any totalitarian regime.

Puzak was for many years one of the most prominent members of the Polish Parliament and the chief organizer of Polish workers. He took a very active part in our struggle with Nazi Germany, being among the first to organize the strong European underground movement. He became later the chairman of the clandestine "Council of National Unity" (Polish Underground Parliament) and it was in that capacity that I saw him last in my humble role of the secret courier between London allied headquarters and Warsaw underground leaders.

Puzak was chosen by all Polish political parties as their designate for Polish Presidency. At our secret meeting held at the Powazki Cemetery in Warsaw he told me bluntly that he was not going to accept this proposition, since he did not want to go to London, because he wanted to stay with the Polish working masses.

Puzak was one of the civil leaders of the 63-day heroic Warsaw uprising led by General Bor-Komorowski. But after the tragic end of that insurrection he remained in the Warsaw area and was arrested by Soviet military authorities and tried in the shameful Moscow trial of the 16 Polish underground leaders. Released after a few years, he returned to Warsaw, where he was rearrested by Communist authorities who were anxious about his great popularity among Polish workers and peasants.

Tried again in Warsaw in December 1948, he rebuked the oppressors in the best possible way. When tired and exhausted, after many months of investigation, he was asked publicly by his prosecutors for a declaration of guilt. Puzak answered slowly but firmly and without hesitation: "I will not answer any of your questions because you are not the genuine court of the Free Republic of Poland. You are just puppets of Moscow."

JERZY J. LERSKI.

Mr. Speaker, should God grant that Poland some day will be liberated and numbered among the family of free nations of this world, I am sure that the person in the above quoted letter will be given adequate and due recognition for the historical role he played in the struggles of Poland's freedom. His heroic replies to accusations at his trials in Moscow and Warsaw, particularly his reply—

Even if at the threshold of my grave it is unthinkable that I should change my attitude and opinion (you are not the genuine court of the free Republic of Poland—you are just puppets of Moscow).

Spoken on the occasion of his last trial when demanded to repudiate his prior trial statements, portray the determination and diligence to the cause.

New Record for Extravagance and Waste in Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following News Bulletin of August 22, 1950:

NEW RECORD FOR EXTRAVAGANCE AND WASTE IN GOVERNMENT

(By Paul O. Peters)

It is just beginning to dawn upon the American people that the Truman administration is the most expensive, the most extravagant, and the most wasteful in the entire history of the Republic.

A careful check of governmental expenditures by all Presidents from the beginning of the Republic down through the first 8 years of Franklin D. Roosevelt's administration the total expenditures amounted to $181,026,726,687.

This total included the cost of all wars and the emergency relief spending just prior to our entrance into World War II.

During the four war years, fiscal 1942 through fiscal 1945, our governmental expenditures were $309,951,167,642.

Under President Truman's administration the spending is progressing at a rate only one-third below the wartime average. The bureaus and agencies of government are being maintained at wartime levels, and actual governmental practices belie the preachments for economy.

Between July 1, 1945 and August 15, 1950 the spending was as follows:

Fiscal year 1947	42, 505, 045, 529
Fiscal year 1948	39, 326, 072, 233
Fiscal year 1949	40, 057, 107, 857
Fiscal year 1950	40, 166, 835, 914
Fiscal 1951 to August 15	4, 230, 515, 900
Total spending	229, 999, 546, 850

In 1945, the purchasing power of the dollar stood at 77.4 cents. Today it averages about 55.0 cents. Government deficit spending speeds the inflationary trend, and the political parties may do well this fall to acquaint the voting population with some of the facts of our economic life, other than give more lip service to administration promises of government hand-outs in the form of social security, and cradle-to-grave care for all.

Julius Epstein Letter in the Washington Evening Star Regarding the Voice of America

OF
HON. GEORGE A. SMATHERS
OF FLORIDA

Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. Speaker, in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on page A5744, there was inserted by the distinguished Congressman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO] a letter written by Mr. Julius Epstein in which letter Mr. Epstein charged the Voice of America with having not explained properly the Katyn massacre and at the same time there appeared in the letter a more serious charge wherein Mr. Epstein was alleged to have been told that the reason a certain position was not taken was that "it would create too much hatred of Stalin among the Poles."

A short time after Mr. Epstein's letter was inserted in the RECORD, Mr. Edward W. Barrett, Assistant Secretary of State in charge of the Voice of America and other International Information and Educational Exchange Programs, appeared before a subcommittee of which I am chairman. Mr. Barrett was questioned about Mr. Epstein's charges. We advised Mr. Barrett that the charges made by Mr. Epstein were of such a serious nature that we felt that some explanation should be forthcoming.

I recently received a copy of a letter dated August 16, addressed by Mr. Barrett to Mr. DONDERO, and attached to that letter was a memorandum prepared by Mr. Charles M. Hulten, general manager of the International Information and Educational Exchange Programs, explaining the Epstein charges. In order that the record may be straight on this matter I ask unanimous consent to insert herewith a copy of the letter Mr. Barrett addressed to Mr. DONDERO and a copy of the memorandum prepared by Mr. Hulten on this same subject:

WASHINGTON, August 16, 1950.

Hon. GEORGE A. DONDERO,

DEAR MR. DONDERO: In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 9, 1950, on page A5744, you had inserted the letter by Julius Epstein appearing 2 days earlier in the columns of the Evening Star of Washington.

Because of the serious nature of the charges made by Mr. Epstein, I have had a complete and thorough investigation made to determine whether they have any factual basis to support them. I am sure that you will want to have the results of that investigation, which are contained in the attached memorandum to me from Charles M. Hulten, general manager, International Information and Educational Exchange Programs.

Several other Members of Congress have inquired about the Epstein letter and I am furnishing them with copies of this letter and of the memorandum.

It is the policy of the Department to investigate thoroughly any serious criticisms of this nature. I would appreciate it if you would be so good as to let me know of any which you receive so that I can look into them.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD W. BARRETT,
Assistant Secretary.

Enclosure, from Mr. Hulten, dated August 16, 1950.

MEMORANDUM

AUGUST 16, 1950.

To: Mr. Edward W. Barrett.
From: Charles M. Hulten.
Subject: Julius Epstein letter in the Washington Star re the Voice of America.

At your instruction I have made a thorough investigation of the charges appearing in the letter of Julius Epstein to the Washington Evening Star, August 7. This letter was placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 2 days later by Congressman Dondero of Michigan.

Mr. Epstein's first allegation was that Count Joseph Czapski was advised to omit any mention of Katyn from the draft which he submitted to the New York office of our broadcasting division. The facts concerning this incident are that when Mr. Czapski came to the United States last January, he visited Mr. Gidynski, the Chief of the Polish Desk of the Voice of America, and suggested that excerpts from his book, which had been published in Polish and French under the title "The Inhuman Land" and an English edition of which was to appear this winter, be broadcast to Poland. Mr. Gidynski explained to him that lack of air time precluded use of this book in its entirety, but that he would be willing to prepare a series of five scripts on his volume. As an act of courtesy to the author, Mr. Gidynski suggested that he personally write the first script, explaining the title of his book in terms of his experiences described in it. Mr. Czapski asked Mr. Gidynski about our attitude toward Katyn and was told that the Voice of America played every hard news item about Katyn; for example, the news of the formation of the American Committee for the Investigation of the Katyn Massacre, and the deposition by Judge Gunther before one of the congressional committees. Mr. Czapski inserted a few sentences about Katyn into his script. Mr.

Gidynski elliminated them with the consent of Mr. Czapski on the ground that it would not be wise to deal with so serious a subject as the Katyn massacre in a few brief sentences. The series of reviews of Mr. Czapski's book was broadcast on the following dates: May 24, 27, 29, 30, and June 14, 1950. All scripts were read by regular Voice of America staff announcers.

The second allegation by Mr. Epstein was that the Voice of America refused to broadcast certain material prepared for the American Committee for the Investigation of the Katyn Massacre, Inc., for which Mr. Epstein acted as publicity man. He alleges that he was told it would create too much hatred of Stalin among the Poles.

It is a fact that Mr. Epstein talked with several officers of the Department and urged them to give extensive coverage to a press conference announcing the formation of the above-named committee The best evidence of what Mr. Epstein was told at that time is contained in a letter, dated November 14, 1949, from Foy D. Kohler, Chief of our International Broadcasting Division. This letter follows in its entirety:

"DEAR MR. EPSTEIN: This will acknowledge the receipt officially of your recent letters addressed to Mr. Lehrbas of OII (Office of International Information), as well as to a number of individual members of IBD (International Broadcasting Division) including myself with regard to the press conference to be held by the Honorable Arthur Bliss Lane on Monday, November 21 at 4 p. m. at the Waldorf Astoria.

"As you were informed in our conversation on Wednesday last, the Voice of America will be glad to have a representative at this press conference and appreciates your invitation. However, as we also pointed out in our conversation, the usefulness of the work of the proposed committee to the Voice will depend largely on the seriousness and objectivity of its approach to the Katyn investigation and to the production thereby of new factual information and hard news."

In other words, Mr. Epstein was told that the Voice of America was prepared to carry any material developed by the committee as a result of its investigation. We refused to permit Mr. Epstein to say in his press release that the Voice of America was carrying anything specific about the press conference, just as we avoid advance commitments on all press conferences. A member of the VOA News Desk did cover the conference. The coverage given to that event in our broadcasts was roughly commensurate with that of the New York Times and the Herald Tribune. When Mr. Epstein called later to ask why more attention was not given to the story, he was told again that we were prepared factually to cover material developed by the committee. The memorandum on file indicates that he was ill-tempered and rude because we had not gone all out to help him in his promotional activities. The correctness of the decision by our editors may be judged from the fact that the investigation promised at the press conference was never carried out.

The Voice of America has had a consistent policy that when it tackles such serious matters as the Katyn massacre it does so with well marshalled facts and not in a flashy, superficial way. We would have been in a serious position had we made a great play of the formation of the committee and then had been unable to follow up with anything substantial to add to what had already been known about Katyn.

A careful checking of persons who talked to Mr. Epstein would lead me to believe that his quotation about causing "hatred of Stalin" is an unmitigated falsehood. Mr. Kohler's letter cites the reason given Mr. Epstein for our decision.

Mr. Epstein makes still another point. He asserts that there are too many of the employees of the Office of War Information still with the Voice of America and that this has led to a distortion of its output. Our records show that Mr. Epstein was employed by OWI as a German language editor from August 1942 to December 1944. At that time he was involuntarily separated from that organization by reason of a "reduction in force." Since that time Mr. Epstein has sought reemployment with our broadcasting division. His letter-writing attacks on the Voice include a letter in the New York Times of March 14, 1949, and another in the Washington Post on November 3, 1949.

As for the VOA personnel, Mr. Epstein's employment history is illustrative of the amount of screening, weeding out, and careful selection that has gone on. For example, a total of 849 wartime information employees were transferred to the Department in 1946 to conduct all phases of its international broadcasting operations; but as a result of various cutbacks, normal turnover, and new recruitment, there were only 134 of these employees among the total of 619 persons on the payroll of the International Broadcasting Division as of June 1950.

You will remember that, because of an appropriation cut, the entire International Broadcasting staff was reduced in March 1948 to 234 employees. The cutback was made only after the most careful screening process. All employees retained, and all who have been hired for the expanded operation since, have been subjected to full field investigations by the FBI, as required by section 1001 of Public Law 402, under which we operate. Our present staff is one which has been selected with extraordinary care. It represents the only collection of trained, experienced, professional international broadcasters in the United States, except for a small group working with the World Wide Broadcasting Foundation in Boston.

Johnson Won't Buy From Brannan

OF

HON. RALPH W. GWINN

OF NEW YORK

Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. GWINN. Mr. Speaker, the Department of Agriculture is selling surplus potatoes for 1 cent per hundred pounds for fertilizer. At the same time the Department of Defense is buying potatoes for Korea in the open market for $2.95 per hundred pounds. This is a typical, everyday example of the bungling and incompetence which characterize Federal administration in Washington today. Secretary of Agriculture Brannan and Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson work only 2 miles apart. One holds millions of bushels of surplus potatoes and the other needs thousands of bushels of potatoes for next week's food in the Army. Yet Johnson will not buy from Brannan.

Brannan uses up about $75,000,000 of taxpayers' money to induce farmers to raise these potatoes. He destroys them to make them scarce and keep the price up. Johnson spends another $75,000,000 buying potatoes and other surplus products in the open market. Yet Johnson will not buy from Brannan.

Secretary Brannan recently told the House Agriculture Committee, "Potatoes are being offered to all takers at the country shipping point. After supplying institutions, welfare organizations, school lunch and all other practical diversion outlets—free—the remainder is then sold back to farmers for livestock feed or fertilizer at 1 cent per hundredweight."

Senator JOHN J. WILLIAMS, of Delaware, said:

The Department of Agriculture has been buying U. S. No. 1 potatoes from the farmers in North Carolina at an average cost of $1.68 per hundredweight, and then immediately reselling them to the same farmers for 1 cent a bag, to be dumped as fertilizer or in the hog lots.

Of course, the farmers do not dump them all. Some they resell to the public.

At the same time the Armed Forces needed 23,500,000 pounds of potatoes. They paid $2.95 per hundredweight.

Thus the taxpayers pay for potatoes twice—once to get them raised and destroyed, and once when the Armed Forces buy potatoes in the open market.

Secretary Brannan reviewed the mid-July inventory of Commodity Credit Corporation for the House committee:

At present the CCC owns approximately 192,000,000 pounds of butter, and is accumulating more at the average rate of about 9,000,000 pounds a week.

Some of it is spoiling and wasted. This butter was purchased at 60 cents a pound. In a 4-week period the Armed Forces purchased 4,131,022 pounds in the open market at 60.7 cents a pound. So again the taxpayers pay twice.

Brannan also listed 80,000,000 pounds of cheese on hand, acquired at 31 cents a pound. The Armed Forces were buying 954,664 pounds at 34.8 cents.

In eggs, it is the same story. Brannan has 321,000,000 dozen in powdered form, at 32 cents. Yet Johnson will not buy from Brannan. He buys 4,910,350 dozen at 40 cents in the open market and forces prices up.

Senator WILLIAMS said these few items "represent an unnecessary expenditure during the past 4 weeks by the Armed Forces of approximately $6,000,000—every dime of which could have been saved to the taxpayers had the administration complied with the clear intent of the law."

The Delaware Senator estimated the withholding of food and fiber from the people at approximately $4,000,000,000. All this is to force prices higher. "Instead of accumulating additional inventories at this time, the Government should reverse its policy and begin unloading upon the market their huge inventories." This would bring prices down and stop pressure for the false remedy of price controls.

Last week I could not swallow the hypocrisy of a new price-control law proposing to give the President unlimited power to fix and control prices of food on the pretense that he would keep prices down. How could I do so while watching the President's Secretary of Defense and his Secretary of Agriculture double kick the prices up beyond the reach of millions of consumers?

Tribute to Mrs. Eugenie Anderson, United States Ambassador to Denmark

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 25 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, it is again with great personal satisfaction and a feeling of distinct privilege that I bring to the attention of the Senate another article paying tribute to the splendid services being performed by my very good friend and former associate Mrs. Eugenie Anderson, our Ambassador to Denmark. I know that I speak for the people of Minnesota when I say again we are proud of her record, her accomplishments, and the recognition which she is now receiving.

I ask unanimous consent that an article from the magazine This Week, for August 13, be published in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAMA IS AN AMBASSADOR—WHEN WE SENT OUR FIRST WOMAN AMBASSADOR, THE DANES EXPECTED A PLAYGIRL; INSTEAD THEY GOT A HOUSEWIFE—NOW SHE AND HER FAMILY ARE THE MOST POPULAR OF THOUSANDS OF ANDERSONS IN DENMARK

(By Stephen White)

COPENHAGEN.—The Kingdom of Denmark is well fixed for Andersens, Andersons, Anderssens, and all other variations that tickle the ear the same way. In sheer numbers, the Andersons are superseded only by the Jensens and the Petersens. The telephone books and the street directories are so full of them, you'd think one more wouldn't make much difference. But she has.

Mrs. Eugenie M. Anderson, the first woman ever to be appointed a United States Ambassador, arrived in Denmark on December 20, 1949, and proceded to capture the hearts of the Danes, who enjoy having their hearts captured but don't yield very often to the temptation.

A week after Mrs. Anderson arrived in Copenhagen and took a tentative look around, she was the most popular foreigner in Denmark. A month later she was the most popular Anderson. Today it's a fair guess that a popularity contest would find her near the head of any list you might choose to submit—not counting, to be polite, kings, queens and other assorted royalty. "Everybody," said a young Danish workingman, "wants to go up and shake her hand."

She has reached the acme of popularity in western Europe. In spite of the fact that she represents the United States, even the local Communist press denies itself the luxury of making personal attacks upon her. They printed one before she arrived but have held their tongues ever since.

Mrs. Anderson has achieved all this by adopting a very simple technique, which is no technique at all. A Red Wing, Minn., housewife when President Truman appointed her Ambassador, she has remained a Minnesota housewife. Although at receptions, everyone dresses formally and the bowing and the scraping can be heard a block away, she always manages to give the impression that Minnesota isn't far off. When you come right down to it and forget the climate and the ocean, Minnesota and Denmark are a good deal alike. So Mrs. Anderson manages to have a casual fellow feeling for the Danes, and the Danes share it.

Mrs. Anderson is the fourth woman to be appointed to a high American diplomatic post. The first, Ruth Bryan Owen, also came to Denmark. The second was Mrs. J. Borden Harriman, in Norway, and the third, Perle Mesta, in Luxemburg. But these appointments were ministers; Mrs. Anderson is the first to hold the higher, ambassadorial rank.

THE DANES WERE WORRIED

When the news first leaked out, more than a year ago, that they were to have a woman ambassador, the Danes weren't happy. They feared the post would fall to Mrs. Mesta, and their press made it clear that they did not feel Mrs. Mesta was taken seriously enough at home to fill so important a post.

Even after the Anderson appointment was announced, the Danish press printed an open letter in English, telling Mrs. Anderson that the Danes didn't want a playgirl.

"To you, Madame," the letter said, "is entrusted a great task. For the first time in our history, the United States and Denmark are allies. It sounds a little pompous. It may not mean much to the average American. But it is deadly serious to all Danes."

That same day the Danes got their first look at their new Ambassador. They saw a small woman who looked, at first glance, just about the way any man would like his wife to look when the children were entering their teens. A woman with brown hair and gray eyes and a warm look in her face—just good-looking enough to make most other women envious and not so good looking as to make them catty. They noticed that when she smiled—and she smiled often—she seemed to be smiling inside as well as out. They saw a well-behaved daughter and a well-behaved younger son, and a handsome, quiet husband.

And so the Andersons moved into the splendid house that had been made ready for them in suburban Copenhagen, overlooking the Oresund separating Denmark from Sweden. A few weeks later, she gave her first party in "Rydhave," as the house is called. The guests were 80 Danish workmen and their wives; the painters and masons and carpenters and decorators who had made her home ready for her.

TWO-INSTALLMENT PARTY

Next, the Ambassadress made plans for her first formal cocktail party. When she discovered that more people had to be invited than her home would hold, she calmly decided upon two parties on successive days and invited people whose last names began with the letters A to L to the first party, and the rest to the second.

The parties took place in the formality of the first floor, but Mrs. Anderson set up housekeeping in what is practically a separate apartment on the second floor, where she can really be at home with her family. She started on Danish lessons and plunged into the work at the Embassy. Daughter Johanna, 16, and son Hans, 11, were sent to a nearby Danish public school.

Mrs. Anderson began to accept invitations to address Danish gatherings and each time startled her listeners with a frank, down-to-earth account of some phase of American or Danish-American life.

She spoke to a group of Danish heroes of the resistance with a 3-hour summary of the relationship between American politics and American foreign policy, explaining why the American Government can't always do the things it seems so obvious it should do.

ADVICE TO WOMEN

She advised young ladies of a Danish students' league on how to rise to high public office: "Use your brains, but don't forget you have one great advantage over the men—your personal feminine charm."

Then, almost accidentally, she won the sweepstakes. She was asked to make a radio address on Mother's Day. A few days before the broadcast, she learned to her horror that she was expected to talk in Danish. "Well, a bargain is a bargain," said Mrs. Anderson.

Now, Danish is no ordinary language. Even the Danes have trouble with it.

But the American Ambassador closeted herself with her Danish teacher. Hour after hour she rehearsed her speech in Danish, and played it back on a recording machine to hear how it sounded. When Mother's Day came, Mrs. Anderson stepped to the microphone and delivered her address in—well, not exactly flawless—but at least understandable Danish.

The next day she could have run for president, if Denmark had a president.

All the time, Mrs. Anderson was working a 10-hour day at the Embassy, where the staff feels she is doing a good job, though her only previous officeholding experience was as a member of the school board in Red Wing.

She has not left Denmark since her arrival, and when she finally takes a vacation, she plans to go to Norway and Sweden, rather than to any of the fashionable resorts available to relaxing ambassadors, because she feels she should know the Scandinavians better.

Since our earlier distaff diplomats have all been widows, Mrs. Anderson is the first to take over her post accompanied by a husband. This creates complications—surmountable only because the Anderson family is what it is.

John Anderson is a handsome, quiet man who had the good fortune to be son and heir of the man who invented puffed rice and puffed wheat. His prime interest is his family; after that, modern art. In Minnesota, he did three-dimensional paintings in which he combined glass, metal, and wood with pigment.

A PARSON'S DAUGHTER

It was a common interest in the arts that drew him to Helen Eugenie Moore, the daughter of a country parson. They were married in 1930, at the end of her junior year in Carleton College. The first 2 years of their marriage they spent in New York, where she studied at the Juilliard School of Music. Then they returned to the comfortable Anderson family home in Red Wing.

When Eugenie became interested in politics in 1944, and set herself the task of helping revitalize the Democratic Party in Minnesota, Mr. Anderson was a source of encouragement. When her work led to an appointment to the national committee in 1948, and to an embassy in 1949, he took it all as a matter of course. He chose to remain an artist—in Copenhagen as in Red Wing.

There was some difficulty about protocol. Where, after all, does the husband of the Ambassador sit at formal dinners? Some of the more natural solutions would have placed him between two men; others would have had the effect of arbitrarily raising Mrs. Anderson's rank higher than her seniority in the diplomatic corps warranted.

A LADY ON EACH SIDE

The final solution gave her a rank directly behind the last male ambassador to present credentials, and Mr. Anderson became a "distinguished foreigner" and enjoys a lady on each side of him.

But most of the time, Mr. Anderson leads his own quiet life, avoiding all official functions where his absence will not be considered deplorable, and presiding over his family during its domestic hours when Mrs. Anderson cooks dinner and the two children show off their rapidly acquired fluency in the Danish language.

They plan to stay in Denmark for a while. An' afterward? A more important embassy? "Good heavens, don't talk about that," says the Ambassador. "I'm still learning this job. Anyway, I'm not looking that far ahead."

But the charmed Danes may be. A high-ranking member of the Danish Government said to a United States official recently, "You tell President Truman that if he has any more women like Mrs. Anderson over there, he can send them right over here."

The Heritage of Greed

OF

HON. ROBERT F. RICH

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 25, 1950

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent I include in the Appendix of the RECORD the following condensation of the remarks of James F. Byrnes to the Conference of Southern Governors.

James F. Byrnes was Secretary of State, Supreme Court Justice, and very interested and involved in all the undertakings of this New Deal-Fair Deal-raw deal administration. Evidently he has seen the error of his ways, and had a change of heart. It is too bad he was not able to stop this administration but instead withdrew to his home in South Carolina. To me his words today seem to be words of wisdom.

THE HERITAGE OF GREED

This week it was stated in Europe that our first line of defense is the River Elbe. I disagree. Our first line of defense is not the Elbe or the Rhine; it is a sound, solvent American economy. And that economy is now threatened.

The people who settled this country did not come here to establish a government. They were seeking liberty, not security. They were seeking an opportunity to enjoy freedom, the freedom of being let alone.

They believed that every human being possessed certain inherent and inalienable rights by the grace of God and not by the grant of any government. To secure those rights, the people were willing to endure hardships and, if necessary, sacrifice their lives. It is not surprising that when their numbers increased and it became necessary to establish some form of government they grudgingly yielded powers—even to local governments. They realized that if an individual lost his freedom, to him it was not material whether it was taken from him by an individual despot or by a temporary majority. History had shown that despots at times were beneficent, but mobs always were cruel.

But today is another day. The spirit of self-reliance that animated the early settlers and for more than a century inspired our people to exercise their initiative and develop this country, while preserving their independence, is unfortunately departing from the people.

Too many people are asking the Federal Government to perform the functions of State governments. Too many people want to lean upon the Government, forgetting that the Government must lean upon the people. Too many people are thinking of security instead of opportunity. They seem more afraid of life than of death.

We are engaged in a cold war with the Soviet Republic. It is a clash between two ideologies—our system of free enterprise and Russia's communism.

You cannot convince people who are inclined to communism of the superiority of our system of free enterprise merely by talking about a high standard of living. In this world there are millions of people who are more interested in liberty than in luxuries.

We must emphasize the freedom of the individual who by his initiative has made America prosperous. And we cannot very well boast of freedom under the American system if we are going to change that system and force the people to surrender more liberties to a centralized government.

When we see the states of western Europe and Great Britain, which have embraced socialism, unable to stand on their own feet and the very existence of their governments dependent upon the taxpayers of the United States, it would seem prudent for us to hold fast to our system of government that has proved efficient in war and in peace, and put our financial house in order.

Instead of that, we are threatened with the concentration in Washington of the powers of local governments, including police powers, and with the imposition of creeping, but ever-advancing socialistic programs. To pay for these costly programs we are going to borrow more money. It is well to remember that if we but stumble there is no lend-lease or Marshall aid for us.

Many people are disturbed. But those who look with fear upon the trend of political thinking, may as well be realistic. They should realize that if a proposal for the spending of money is authorized by the Congress as promoting the general welfare, the probability is that under the decisions interpreting the general-welfare clause of the Constitution, it will be sustained by the Court. Therefore, those who wish to preserve people's rights and prevent the gradual absorption of local governments by a big government in Washington, with resulting restrictions upon our liberties, should look to the people.

It will serve no useful purpose to argue to them about the repeal of Federal-aid laws which are in operation and to which operation the States have adjusted their budgets. But we can oppose their expansion until our budget permits it. And we can oppose the adoption of new and costly programs that other governments have tried and now wish to abandon. It will serve no useful purpose to spend one's time in criticizing the political parties or individuals responsible for the growth of the Federal-aid system. No party or individual is entitled to a monopoly of the blame or credit.

We would not have an over-expanding Government if the people were conscious of the taxes they are paying to the Federal Government. When the Government required employers to withhold income taxes from employees, the Government put the worker to sleep.

Ask any wage earner the amount of the wage he earns and he will tell you the amount he receives in his envelope or pay check, and not the amount his employer actually pays for his services before taxes are deducted for the Federal Government. The excise taxes are so well hidden that their burden is not appreciated by the average taxpayer. Not realizing that they are paying the bill, they are easily misled into clamoring for more Federal laws and more Federal aids. They are misled into regarding the United States Treasury as a Christmas tree, with the President and the Members of Congress playing the role of Santa Claus.

In the last fiscal year in peacetime, the Federal Government collected $38,000,000,000 in taxes. The Government did not live within its income. We spent $40,000,000,000 and had to borrow $2,000,000,000 to pay our current bills.

We are continuing to spend more than our income. Without adopting any of the various new programs urged by those in power, it is conservatively estimated that during the fiscal year, which will end June 30, 1950, we will spend $5,000,000,000 to $7,000,000,000 more than our income. If Congress adopts those new programs no man can tell exactly how much we will have to borrow, or from whom we will borrow it. We do know the next generation must pay it. All of us should think more of the next generation and less of the next election.

What a heritage we will bequeath to the children of this day. Our greed for welfare and security will deny to them the opportunities we enjoy. Instead of fighting freely for the future of their children, they will be forced to pay for the folly of their fathers.

The spenders, while deploring deficit spending, assert as an excuse that there was deficit spending during the Roosevelt administration. That would not necessarily make it right. But who can forget that in 1933 the banks of the Nation were closed, farmers whose mortgages were foreclosed were deserting the farms, factories were idle and the unemployed walked the streets hungry?

Only a spender with no sense of responsibility could fail to see the difference. Today the banks have more money on deposit than ever before in peacetime history. Farmers are reasonably prosperous. Few factories are idle. More men are employed than ever before and the people are better fed and better clothed. It is rightly said we have "unexampled prosperity." If our Government cannot now live within its income, what will it do should we have a serious recession in business?

To justify spending more than our income, some persons speak of what the Government is doing for the little fellow. Let me show you what the Federal Government is doing to the little fellow. The United States Government is making the small man smaller every day.

If the "little fellow" sends a message by telephone or telegraph he pays a tax. If he travels by railroad or bus he pays a tax. If he buys an automobile, the sale price includes a tax. When he buys gasoline or oil he pays a tax. If he buys cigarettes, he pays a tax. If he goes to a football game or baseball game, he pays a tax. If his wife buys a pocketbook or cosmetics, she pays a tax, and if his children go to a movie, they pay a tax.

The average workingman must work 47 days a year to earn the money necessary to pay his taxes to the Federal Government. This is almost one day out of every week. If the new programs now seriously proposed should be adopted he will have to pay in taxes the equivalent of his wages for an additional 20 days, making 67 days he will work each year for the Government instead of for himself and his family. That is what the Federal Government is doing to the little fellow.

If the spenders really want to help the little fellow, they should allow him to keep more of the money he gets for his labor to spend as he pleases, instead of having it taken from him and sent to Washington, to let bureaucrats spend as they think it should please him.

Men intoxicated with power will never voluntarily surrender the power to spend the money of other people. Human nature does not change. The Government will not repeal a single war tax now being collected unless forced to do so by public sentiment.

Preventing Sabotage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. M. G. BURNSIDE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 25, 1950

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post of August 23, 1950:

PREVENTING SABOTAGE

One virtue of the President's message to Congress on internal security is that it put first things first and concentrated on real and imminent as distinct from imaginary and potential dangers. In our view, the most pressing of the problems on which the President asked for legislative action is the protection of national defense installations from sabotage. These installations are so vital to national security and so obviously enticing a target to enemy agents that the utmost care in safeguarding them must be reckoned the first order of business in promoting the country's safety.

What the President seeks in this connection is a law similar to one which was in effect during the war but which expired in 1947. It would authorize the Secretary of Defense to promulgate, with the President's approval, regulations for the protection of airports, harbors, bases, laboratories, and other property or places in the custody of the National Military Establishment against the dangers of injury by accident or sabotage. In case of war or national emergency such regulations could be extended to all property and places designated by the President in the interest of national security and would govern, among other things, admission or exclusion of persons. Violation of these regulations would be punishable under the terms of the Magnuson bill, introduced to carry out the President's security message, by a $5,000 fine or a year's imprisonment, or both.

Such regulations make no intrusion upon personal liberties. They are aimed only at the prevention of overt acts inimical to the country's safety. There is no objection to them so far as we know, from any responsible source; authorization to issue them is provided in the McCarran bill as well as in the Magnuson bill. Since they constitute an elementary precaution about which there is no controversy, it would be wise, in our opinion, to deal with them in a separate piece of legislation which can be enacted speedily without the conflict bound to rage over other features of the McCarran and Magnuson bills.

The outposts of American defense are perhaps especially in need of the most rigorous security precautions. For it is these that an enemy would be most eager to cripple by sabotage before launching any frontal attack. They constitute at once the perimeter of protection for the country and at the same time the primary sources of the counteroffensive with which the United States would respond to any attack. No rational safeguard of these ramparts should be neglected. Congress should respond at least to this facet of the President's appeal without hesitation or delay.

Letter From a Potential Soldier

OF
HON. FRANCIS CASE
Friday, August 25, 1950

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I am inserting herewith a letter from a young South Dakotan addressed to the United States Congress. In it he gives his feeling of frustration about the war in Korea and expresses the hope that sacrifice will help to achieve peace. It is a beautiful and moving letter and should make the Members of this body realize the vast import and far-reaching effects of the legislation which they pass concerning the national defense. The letter follows:

EDGEMONT, S. DAK.,
July 30, 1950.

To the Congressmen of the United States:

GENTLEMEN: As I write this letter to you, young American warriors are dying in the conflict of battle. Young men like myself are laying down their lives for their country. Torn away from their homes, their loved ones, their peaceful environment, they are giving their all for an ungrateful public. Those who will return will find a spirit of indifference prevailing, and in many instances even open hostility. It is true now—there is no reason to believe it will be different hereafter. The maimed and injured are denied proper care because of snarling regulations and plain inefficiency. Those who fought on the battle front must now return to fight the home front.

Pearl Harbor, congressional investigations, talk, time, nothing accomplished. Now Korea. Green, hardly trained, inexperienced troops sent into battle to be shot down like diseased dogs. Who was to blame for the surprise move of the North Koreans? Who is going to give a satisfactory explanation—any explanation, to the mother who grieves for her dead boy?

Officers in the combat area from MacArthur down. Orders, commands, and more telegrams. One man speaks in error, a hundred men die for his words. What consolation.

These thoughts, gentlemen, and countless more pass through my mind and the minds of thousands of young men throughout our country.

Young men who will be drafted to serve, to die, to sacrifice immeasurably for what? To keep America free, to protect our homes and our loved ones from a more ruthless aggressor that we have ever known. Yes, for all this and more we will go to war. But for many, a simple cross will mark the end of the strife. And as the tears of those they left behind wash over it, a question arises. What is the net value of a human life, expendable as it is? The hopes and aspirations of youth lie in tattered ruins.

Thoughtful deliberate legislation inspired by an infinite trust in the Master will help make things easier for all concerned and will bring a speedier end to our frightful world conditions.

Each man who falls in battle must be directly connected with some particular goal. A life lost needlessly is a life lost nonetheless. Another boy who won't return to America. Each man wants to feel inwardly that his life means a step in the achievement of the ultimate goal—peace to his family—peace to his country—peace to the world.

Your humble servant and patriot,
REUBEN VALADES.

OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, August 25 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, on Tuesday, August 22, Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson, acting in behalf of the United States and the United Nations, formally accepted an offer by the Philippine Republic to provide 5,000 combat troops to serve in Korea under the United Nations flag. The Philippine Embassy has issued a brief description of the ceremony. I ask unanimous consent to insert this description in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the description was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

PHILIPPINE EMBASSY, August 23, 1950.

In a simple ceremony this morning, August 23, 1950, at 9:30 o'clock, in the Office of the Secretary of Defense, Secretary Johnson in behalf of the United States and of the United Nations tendered formal acceptance of the offer of troops by the Government of the Philippines consisting of one Regimental Combat Team, including a Field Artillery Battalion, of about 5,000 officers and men, to Ambassador J. M. Elizalde in representation of President Quirino, of the Philippines.

The Philippine Government will shoulder the expenses for these troops. They are fully trained and completely equipped.

The first contingent of approximately 1,200 officers and men are now ready for immediate departure to the battle area. Most of the officers and men are veterans and have seen service under General MacArthur in World War II.

In reply to Secretary Johnson's speech expressing the appreciation of the United States Government and the United Nations for the Philippine contribution, Ambassador Elizalde stated: "We hope that our boys will do a great service as they have before when they fought shoulder to shoulder with American soldiers. The loyalty, devotion, and courage of these Philippine troops in defense of freedom have already been tested in the last war and are not unknown to General MacArthur."

Conceived in Villainy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the author and moving spirit of the United Nations was Alger Hiss, the convicted traitor. It is evident that his fertile communistic brain realized fully the advantage that would inure to Russia by promoting the United Nations. All that United Nations has done has been to furnish a forum where the nations could assemble to call each other names. This does not make for peace and why our leaders surrendered their intelligence to the propaganda that this organization would promote peace is beyond my comprehension. There is no doubt that this organization was conceived not in the interests of peace but as an agency which could drag us into war whenever the nations which adhered to the United Nations decided to use our resources and our manpower to engage in their armed conflicts.

The bloody war in Korea, where our boys are fighting under a foreign flag, is an example of one of the many wars into which the United States will be catapulted unless the people in their wisdom divorce themselves from this menace to the peace of the world.

I am inserting as a part of my remarks, under unanimous consent heretofore granted, an editorial which appeared in the Washington (D. C.) Times-Herald under date of August 25, 1950:

CONCEIVED IN VILLAINY

Day by day, the futility of the United Nations as an agency of peace is being demonstrated at Lake Success. The orators continue to speak of UN as the best or the only hope of peace, but nobody who knows the origins of this outfit will be fooled by this hypocrisy.

UN is and always was a villainous fraud. Mr. Roosevelt, who thought he was smarter than George Washington, was swayed by two of the passionate attachments against which Washington warned in the Farewell Address. The nations which Mr. Roosevelt adored were Britain and Russia and for them he sent 300,000 American men and boys to their deaths.

Obviously, Mr. Roosevelt could not go to the American people and say, "I want you to give the lives of your husbands and sons for the salvation of Britain and Russia." That was the real purpose, but to have stated it openly would have defeated it. Instead, he introduced Russian sympathizers and outright Communists into the State Department and, at the Atlantic Conference, schemed with Churchill to get into the war by way of the Pacific.

To conceal his purpose and give it an appearance of nobility, the Atlantic Charter was issued, foreshadowing the United Nations. The Russians showed no enthusiasm for this bit of camouflage. Mr. Roosevelt had to pay a price for their adherence and it was a fantastic one.

In Europe they got Poland, Hungary, the Baltic States, the Balkans, and Eastern Germany. In Asia they got Manchuria, the Kurile Islands, Sakhalin, and the northern half of Korea; and, with this much to start with, they had no great difficulty in gaining control of China, particularly with the help that the State Department gave in undermining the Chinese Nationalist regime. As if all this were not enough, Stalin also got three votes in the UN assembly for no better reason than that he asked for them.

WHY UN EXISTS

UN exists, therefore, because Mr. Roosevelt and his successor had to have a plausible, though thoroughly fraudulent, excuse for demanding enormous sacrifices of the American people in a war from which they could gain nothing. An organization so conceived could be and has been of no service to the cause of peace. In fact, if Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Truman had not bribed Russia to join, there would be no war today in Korea because the Russians would have had no foothold in the country from which to operate.

UN has become a forum for making angry men angrier and for stimulating all that is bellicose in human behavior. It gives Asiatic, saturnine Malik the opportunity he craves to needle old man Austin, and it gives Austin the chance to retaliate as best he can.

This doesn't make for peace. It can stir up a new world war. The road to peace lies in abolishing an organization that was conceived in villainy.

Address by Governor Dewey

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. IRVING M. IVES
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, August 25 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the text of an address delivered by Governor Dewey at the luncheon of the Central Canada Exhibition Association, held in Ottawa, Canada, on August 23, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

It is a great experience to see this magnificent exposition and I am very happy that I have been able to accept your gracious invitation. While this is my first visit to Canada as Governor of New York, it is just the most recent of many visits going back over nearly half a century.

Those visits were prompted by the presence of uncles, aunts, great-aunts, great-uncles, cousins and other relatives in almost every part of Canada. The began about 46 years ago and I still have a dim recollection of the earlier ones that leads me to believe that I must have left an indelible impression. For example, there is a great house at 95 Ridout Street, South, in London, Ontario, I am sure that back in the early days of this century—before even the First World War—I dug up with my little shovel almost the entire backyard there during at least two or possibly three summers.

Having been born and raised in Michigan led to an ease and frequency of visits, so it is not unnatural that I feel entirely at home in the midst of your customary gracious and warm-hearted hospitality.

Certainly one of the most wonderful things about the relationship between our respective countries is the most trite—our historic 3,000 miles of undefended border. It is a truism to refer to it but it is unique in the world today when most nations find it necessary to be armed to the teeth at all border points.

Our border has been undefended because neither your country nor mine has ever been an aggressor nation. Neither of us has designs on the other, nor, for that matter, upon the peace or safety of any nation anywhere in the world.

As we jointly developed this great North American Continent, our common ideals and concepts of human dignity and freedom remained the same. The border is an invisible line, physically. It is also invisible spiritually and ideologically. The real reason our border is undefended is that neither of us has a reason for defending an invisible line which separates differences which themselves are almost invisible.

There is today a more modern reason why our border is undefended. This undefended border is actually indefensible. Under conditions of modern warfare it would be impossible to maintain a line of defense 3,000 miles long against any aggressor on this continent—if one existed. There can be no such physical defense over such great spaces and such varied terrain against either land or air attack.

In another and subtler way such a border is also indefensible because today the flight of ideas around the world is faster than the speed of sound. Ideas pass on the radio through the ether, and destructive ideologies can be as dangerous as force of arms.

As a result, where airtight borders used to exist in most other portions of the world, there is today no such thing as an airtight border. Not even iron curtains can protect people from the influx of ideas and ideals of freedom. And, on the other hand, from behind the iron curtain there is spewed forth a daily diatribe of hate and destruction over all the free world.

It is an ideology which is first seductive and undermining and then conquering. It is combined with great military power and places all the world in deadly peril.

In the face of the menace to the peace of the world which threatens all of us today, there is, in a military sense, no border at all between your country and mine. Any nation that attacks either the United States or Canada attacks both. We are by geographic circumstances and by loyalty to common ideals a single defense unit in a perilous world.

This hateful thing we know as communism is, of course, nothing but a new guise for the most ancient and cruel Oriental despotism. It differs only in technique. Its advance agents are dressed up today in idealistic garments. It is the face of the devil concealed by the mask of benevolence. It is a coiled reptile which has been feeding off the 200,000,000 people of Russia for 30 years, developing its strength to spring on all the world. It has now overrun 800,000,000 people, or one-third of the globe.

It has already succeeded in creating divisions among us of the western world. It has succeeded with the most devilish skill in turning the peoples of the Orient against the west.

You only have to talk for 5 minutes with anyone who has escaped from behind the iron curtain to know again—if you ever had any doubt—that we are imperiled by a system of savagery with modern skills the like of which the world has not seen in a thousand years.

It is well established that the Soviet leaders have purposely murdered some 20 to 30 million of their own people. It is now reliably reported that it is their fiendish plan to have the Chinese Communist government liquidate some 200 million Chinese for the purpose of having a supportable and thoroughly disciplined Communist society in China.

I have no special knowledge of the Soviet plans today; I am probably the last person in North America to whom the Kremlin would confide its program. But it is well known that the Soviet now has some 200 divisions in the Soviet Union alone. These 200 divisions compare with 20 to 30 divisions which might be opposed to them today by the west.

Since the Communists are doing so well for themselves without war, many of us wonder why they should bother with waging either their little wars or a big war. They have conquered much of the world very fast and are undermining the rest of it very successfully.

But dictators grow old and they grow impatient. Oppressed peoples are hard to hold in oppression, and a dictator must always move forward or else he moves backward. Then he dies. So he must press forward, he thinks, to conquer—and to stay alive.

With vast military power and unlimited slave manpower in central Europe and Asia, nothing holds the Soviet back today but fear of atomic reprisal. How long our atomic superiority will last, and therefore how long this deterrent will last, no one can know.

Since I hold no official position in the National Government of my country, I can speak entirely freely. A great many people are going around asking whether there will be a world war III. This is an entirely pointless question.

It is time we stopped living in a dream world and recognized the facts of life. One of the facts of life is perfectly clear—we are being warred against by the undeclared world war III of world communism. We are not at war in the traditional sense. But we are being warred against as surely as though the Soviet Union had declared war, unfurled its banners, blown its trumpets, and marched its troops off across all its borders.

It is equally clear that the desperate struggle in Korea is to the Soviets only a current and rather minor aspect of the Communist offensive. It is not difficult to forecast that Formosa is on the schedule. This threat to Formosa is peculiarly serious, and we should recognize it and get it right out on the table.

Because Great Britain and India have recognized the Communist government in China, this may imply recognition of Communist claims to Formosa. On the other hand, my own Government is committed to the defense of Formosa.

What will happen, therefore, when the Communist offensive is launched against Formosa? Will the Communists then have succeeded in splitting us apart? Will the councils of the free peoples in the United Nations then be divided? The oriental mind of our persecutors will delight to see the western diplomats engaged in the most difficult of decisions concerning United Nations action for the defense of Formosa.

The United States does not want one square inch of Formosa. We insist, however, that no other nation shall take that island by force of arms. We seek peace and peaceful solutions. This problem should be settled at the peace-treaty conference or, like all other points of tension, at the United Nations.

I say to you, with the knowledge that I am right, that it is Soviet Russia's clear purpose to divide the English-speaking people. They have proved this purpose, time and time again, at conference after conference. It is a standard part of their propaganda. Formosa is one of the biggest weapons in that arsenal it should be our common purpose to blunt and destroy that weapon. We can only blunt and destroy that weapon by finding some common agreement based upon our mutual necessities and our mutual purposes.

We must stop waiting for catastrophes to happen and then rushing in to the United Nations and to our own inadequate defenses, else we shall not live through many more crises. We should act now—all of us who have this common urge to save the cause of human freedom. We should not wait until Formosa is attacked and then find out whether we are united or divided. We should forthwith take the problem of Formosa before the United Nations or to the peace treaty council and find out where the free world stands.

I repeat the impending attack on Formosa is a dangerous and powerful weapon of our enemies. We should blunt and destroy it now, in public, before it becomes an effective weapon to disunite and destroy us.

Still more invasions resulting in more divisions between our not-too-united nations of the Western World are plotted. These include the stepped-up warfare in Indochina as an embarrassment to France. They include accelerated Communist trouble in Indonesia as an embarrassment to our friends of the Netherlands. They include continued and accelerated difficulties in Europe designed to contain and wear down British troops. They include accelerating the Huk campaign in the Philippines where the United States has great responsibilities and interests.

An invasion of Iran and then Iraq, through Israel to the Mediterranean, is also clearly on the Soviet agenda. This would cost Europe her absolutely essential supply of oil.

We are all in this leaky ship together. We are in the most acute danger the children of freedom have ever encountered. It seems to me too obvious for discussion that we should draw closer and closer together and do so at a greatly accelerated rate. This ideal must be practical, down to earth and, I am sorry to say, it will be very expensive. But there is no price tag on freedom and there must never be.

I have already pointed out that Canada and the United States are a single defense area. The threat of Soviet communism is directed against all North America at once, against our great agriculture, our mighty industries, our mines, our Great Lakes and our transportation. Elementary prudence requires that our plans for our military defense should be united. Our civil defense should also be jointly planned and jointly executed.

You, in Canada, are on the great circle air route over which Red bombers are presently able to attack, not only your country, but most of mine. We would be equally imperiled by a successful invasion of Alaska. Our interests are totally joined and I trust that our steps for joint protection will be closely developed and without delay.

Out of the dangers and misfortunes of this period, we are drawn closer than ever before. The scheming monsters whose design it is to separate us, will, I am confident, end up by bringing us closer together.

If we are to confound the other schemes of our enemies, we need a new and mutual understanding of the precise nature of the tactics being used against us. Today, it is Malik who is a symbol of hate spewn all over the world from the rostrum of the United Nations. He is the symbol of human degradation of whom everyone speaks, one who seems to combine all the evil and untruth in the world into one man. But it would be a fatal error to think in terms of personalities. Malik is only one of a long line of professional and highly skilled liars. He is just the current actor out of a stable which includes Molotov, Gromyko, Vishinsky, and many more to come.

It is essential to our action in a time of crisis, that we gain a strong and clear understanding that the Soviet program is bent solely on enslavement and murder. Whatever the Soviet does is conceived in evil and dedicated to human slavery; every Soviet attack must serve further to unite us.

The Malik propaganda line of the moment is that the defense of the Republic of Korea is a private adventure by the United States. The world knows this as another example of the great lie. One thrilling answer has been given by Canada. Already three Canadian destroyers are operating in Korean waters for the United Nations. Your Parliament is not in session and under your Constitution you cannot send troops without an act of Parliament. But already the call has gone out for volunteers. More than 2,500 have volunteered and it is expected that more than 6,000 will soon be ready. Canada has given a typical Canadian answer to the propaganda of the big lie that the defense of Korea is the private adventure of a single nation.

Canada has always given that kind of an answer and history has recorded in glittering pages the sacrifices of Canadians in defense of freedom. History has most recently recorded that in Lend Lease, both during World War II and in similar contributions to Great Britain afterward, Canada has been more generous of her substance compared with her national wealth than any other nation.

It is also worth mentioning that of all the nations in the world, Canada stands far ahead of all others in its alertness and skill in detecting the Communist spy ring while too many other countries were refusing to take the blinders off their eyes during the last war. For all of these achievements, every citizen of my country should be proud to be a neighbor of Canada.

As a member of a family of many Canandians, I speak bluntly of our common crisis here today, as I have often, through the years, spoken at home.

Our North American family has been large and close. But it is much larger today. Onrushing events have forged the whole free world into one family and nothing should be allowed to prevent us from acting as one.

Once we have faced and recognized the deadly nature and the colossal extent of the peril we are in, once we have organized our military and civil defense and taken stout action in the United Nations to bring effective working unity at the future peril ponits before they happen and not afterward, we still have two more great tasks ahead.

In the final analysis, a conquering dictator is held back only by overwhelming force. It is my hope that all of us will proceed speedily to build within the United Nations and the North Atlantic Treaty, the overwhelming military and productive force by which we can preserve the good that God has put upon this earth. To build and maintain such force will place a strain upon us all such as we have never faced before.

The final struggle is, therefore, political and economic. It requires high courage on the part of political leaders and all the people. It requires a willingness to surrender minor objectives, political advantages, and petty national differences. All these are engulfed in a struggle for survival which may continue throughout our lifetime.

We can win this fight for survival, but only if we bring the best we have to bear on these, the most difficult problems we have ever faced.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 25, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I wish to include a telegram that I have received from one of the leading citizens in my congressional district, which I think reflects the opinion of a great many of our people. It appears to all of us that every dilatory tactic in the book has been used to prevent the deportation of Harry Bridges. I for one sincerely regret the decision of the justices of the United States Court of Appeals, and I am satisfied that Mr. Donovan, the sender of this wire, knows whereof he speaks since he is an able and capable attorney with many years of experience in the courts of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and one who has served with honor and distinction in the public life of this city and State.

CHELSEA, MASS.

Hon. THOMAS J. LANE,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

The decision of two judges of the United States Court of Appeals to free Harry Bridges is a pronounced disgrace to the United States in view of the record in the case. It is further evidence of the weak compromising namby-pamby attitude of judges and officials in high places in our Government. It is a blow at the morale of the thousands of heroic troops now fighting in Korea and the thousands of others being readied for that engagement. It is about time that officials and judges became realistic instead of stupidly idealistic. If the established law can protect individuals like Harry Bridges then it is high time for Congress to change that law. I join with counsel for the Government who exclaimed when the decision was announced: "God help America."

JOHN F. DONOVAN.

The Secretary of State

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH S. WHERRY
OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 25 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, as our country passes through the present critical times, it is well to keep the record of events straight.

The Wheeling Intelligencer, of Wheeling, W. Va., carried an editorial on August 19, 1950, on current affairs, which contributes to an accurate record, and therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

IS IT CONTEMPTIBLE?

President Truman and Senator KENNETH WHERRY, of Nebrask. Republican minority leader in the Senate, have kicked up something of a national rumpus in their sharp exchange of comment over the fitness or unfitness of Secretary of State Dean Acheson to continue in office. The incident serves to dramatize one of the major issues to be fought out during the coming political campaign over the complexion of the next Congress. Only a truly great nation could wage a war in distant Korea and at one and the same time be engaged in heated political broils at home.

A truly bipartisan foreign policy long has been advocated by this newspaper, but when the administration in power refuses to participate in a bipartisan foreign policy—as was so lamentably the case in matters relating to Asia—there is little else the rebuffed party can do but to state its own position as clearly as possible.

This Senator WHERRY did in unmistakably clear language. The Senator said: "The blood of our boys in Korea is on his (Acheson's) shoulders, and no one else." Mr. Truman retorted, the next day, by declaring "it [WHERRY'S] was a contemptible statement and beneath comment."

The matter, apparently, will not die there. Mr. Acheson long ago forfeited public confidence when he exclaimed "I will not turn my back on Alger Hiss," after the latter had been convicted of traitorous conduct in the transmission of documents to a Communist spy network in Washington. This shocked the Nation as nothing else has since Pearl Harbor.

One of Mr. Truman's greatest faults is his stubborn refusal, on various occasions, to give way when some appointee is shown up as incompetent, or worse. On the other hand, as in the case of Henry A. Wallace, he sometimes acts with swiftness, as he did in kicking Wallace out of his Cabinet for exhibiting Russophile tendencies. Mr. Truman should long since have done the same thing with Acheson, for the same reason.

A nation cannot fight a war successfully when the people have no confidence in the Government's foreign policy The removal of Acheson would do more to restore confidence in United States foreign policy than any other possible action.

When Acheson charged off Korea in his last January speech he virtually gave an invitation for the Red invasion of Korea. That fact can scarcely be disputed. When the invasion came, Mr. Truman overnight reversed the Acheson policy. So much is history.

Far from being contemptible, we believe Senator WHERRY'S statement, however, disagreeable it may be to the White House, hits the nail squarely on the head.

Address by Former Representative Lloyd Thurston

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BOURKE B. HICKENLOOPER
OF IOWA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 25 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, on August 7, 1950, at Sioux City, Iowa, the Honorable Lloyd Thurston made an address before the annual convention of the Iowa Department of the American Legion. Mr. Thurston served in the Spanish-American War, the Philippine Insurrection, and World War I. He was a member of the Iowa Senate for 4 years and served as a Representative from Iowa for 14 years. He is a member of the United Spanish War Veterans, the American Legion, and the Veterans for Foreign Wars. I ask unanimous consent to have the address printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

It is a high honor for an individual to convey the compliments of one veteran group to a great veterans' organization. The Iowa Department of the United Spanish War Veterans, through its commander, greets the veterans of two world wars with the knowledge that history concedes the two conflicts mentioned were more extensive in every respect than any prior military contest among nations. The American forces alone in World War I numbered four and one-fourth millions, and four times that number in World War II, making an aggregate of more than 20,000,000 serving under our flag in these two great wars.

The Spanish-American War, including the Philippine Insurrection and the China Expedition, called out about 400,000, or one-tenth of those engaged in World War I, and one-fortieth of those mustered into the Second World War.

The Spanish American War resulted in liberating the oppressed peoples in Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the Philippines. Improvements in tropical medicine brought about sanitation and virtually eliminated yellow fever and malaria from the warm climates, which had claimed hundreds of thousands of victims annually. This conflict brought our Nation more into contact with world affairs, and it seems that world problems have multiplied since that time.

The Spanish War veteran salutes the service men and women of World Wars I and II. Words can not add to the glorious victories they won throughout the world. On every continent and on countless islands many of their comrades lie interred as mute evidence of their sacrifices. History does not record more bitter conflicts or greater victories. They fought for a free world.

The American citizen is proud of the unbroken chain of victories of our Armed Forces from the Revolution through the War of 1812, the Mexican, Civil, and Spanish Wars, and World Wars I and II, all being based upon the premises that freedom is the highest concept of man.

It was claimed that World War I was fought to save democracy; that World War II was fought to stamp out totalitarianism in Germany, Italy, and Japan. In most instances, royal families were routed out of political control; but the European philosophy of centralized power replaced royalty with bloodthirsty ursurpers, who had the same objectives in view: the enslavement of the people. Little, if anything, was gained to promote freedom.

The so-called Atlantic Charter was supposed to be an organic act of freedom for small nations. In reading, it sounded well, but the same individuals who conceived this altruistic declaration, at Yalta, betrayed these principles and thereby created the blackest pages in world history. A chain of events were set in motion in China which will envelop all of Asia, and may cause slavery and misery for generations. The Russians now have their Asiatic rear covered by their Red allies in China, who likely will do their fighting in that part of the world. Their satellite states in eastern Europe will act as war buffers in front. Our world dreamers planned it that way.

Have you taken time to consider the situation that has developed in our National Capital? Do you not recall that during the past few months when Alger Hiss, one of the principal advisers at Yalta, was on trial for perjury in connection with looting secret documents from the State Department, that the ranking member of the Cabinet, Acheson, took the stand in the trial, and later said, "I stand behind Hiss." That two members of the United States Supreme Court also testified in behalf of this person, who was convicted. If more members of the court had followed the precedent of the two members, obviously, Hiss upon appeal to that Court could not have been convicted. Do you favor retaining the highest appointive officials in our Government who support pinks and subversive fellow travelers?

Some of you may want to stand behind Mr. Acheson, who stands behind Mr. Hiss; a few of you may approve of the conduct of the two Supreme Court Justices. As for me, I prefer to stand behind the doughboys and the tars who have fought and who are now fighting to save this country of ours.

You will remember that the Congress passed an act to exempt the cooky pushers of the State Department and the foreign service from military duty. While you boys were in the trenches in France or in the jungles of the Pacific isles, these favored pansies lolled about the embassies of the world. Would not you and I like to have the entire State Department in the front line trenches in Korea?

We all have faith in the American veteran. Why not have a joint meeting of the representatives of the great service organizations, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the American Legion, the American Veterans, the Disabled Veterans, and the United Spanish War Veterans, and let them pass upon the loyalty or lack of loyalty of high officials who appear to be above public censure? The leading farm, labor, industrial groups, join for concerted action in seeking legislation or betterments; why not veterans?

May I inquire, what is the matter with America? Have we been unfair to the other nations of the world? Why are we always called upon for funds and help? We let the nations of Europe have about $25,000,000,000 after World War I, and they repudiated their obligations. Since World War II, we have donated about $40,000,000,000, or a total of sixty or seventy billions, to purchase good will. Strange, but other nations do not make gifts to us, or worry about our good will.

Why not base our policy toward other nations upon their vote in the United Nations to support our Government in Korea? I say no Korea support from them, no more support from us.

This beautiful, bountiful America of ours is the finest heritage ever handed down to a people. America's position in the world did not just happen; it was attained through the toil and sacrifice, yes, the sweat and blood, of thousands of men and women who were determined to prove that human agencies, through Divine guidance, could create and maintain a form of government which would provide free institutions for a Nation with the highest concepts known to man. It would seem that the results of their efforts would be patent to all, and it is almost unbelievable that in our midst traitors, some in public office, would destroy this Government which you and I love. Because public officials have been more interested in votes than the welfare of their land, real Americans must now stand on guard.

The speaker has traveled through Manchuria, and almost the length of Korea, and in a small degree can understand the tremendous barriers and uncertain terrain which our troops now face. We fervently hope and pray that sufficient men and supplies can reach the battlefront, to save our boys from a threatened Dunkirk. We want every last ounce of our national strength made available to them now.

The great American Legion is one of the principal pillars in the foundation of our Nation; its collective views, its counsel and judgment can do much in time of national peril. It is to be hoped that your committee on resolutions will have the courage to meet the facts and to suggest a course of action which will bring our ship of state back to the course of fearless, sound government.

A Masterpiece of Ambiguity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT C. HENDRICKSON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 25 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "A Masterpiece of Ambiguity," published in the Journal of Commerce on August 24, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

A MASTERPIECE OF AMBIGUITY

The firm of Brannan & Gillette is not easily discouraged.

For years Mr. Brannan has been trying to muzzle the country's commodity futures exchanges without getting Congress to go along with his ideas. Even the dodge of using the Korean war emergency as an alibi for slipping stricter commodity exchange curbs on the statute books did not work. First the House and then the Senate Banking Committee threw out the administration's request for Government margin powers over the commodity exchanges.

That should have been enough. But it wasn't. Blocked at the front door, Mr. Brannan, this time aided by Senator GILLETTE, tried the back door.

Senator GILLETTE, during the final voting rush on the Senate floor, succeeded in writing an amendment into the Defense Production Act which tries to accomplish by indirection what Congress repeatedly refused to do openly.

We are talking about the so-called Gillette amendment to the Defense Production Act, added to the bill as section 606.

At first glance, this amendment seems so full of sweet reasonableness that it appears quite harmless. But to take that view would be a dangerous self-deception on the part of the commodity exchanges. The Gillette amendment is dangerous to the point of viciousness. Make no mistake about that.

What the amendment purports to do is to prevent excessive speculation by charging the commodity exchanges themselves with this task. That sounds reasonable enough, particularly if it is remembered that the administration originally wanted to do this policing job itself, with the club of margin control.

The rub in the Gillette amendment lies in the fact that it would be one of the prerogatives of the Secretary of Agriculture to say when, in his opinion, excessive speculation exists or threatens. After he makes such a declaration the exchanges would have the choice of either doing the Secretary's bidding or getting involved in long-drawn-out court battles with the Department.

In such a fight the cards would be heavily stacked against any exchange or exchange official not seeing eye to eye with the Secretary of Agriculture, particularly since the amendment carries real teeth in the form of a possible $5,000 fine or a year in prison, or both, for any willful violation of the amendment. This threat may be enough to disrupt the functioning of any commodity exchange, and that, of course, is exactly what Senator GILLETTE and Secretary Brannan hope to accomplish in one way or the other.

For years economists have tried to define what "excessive speculation" is. Nobody has succeeded in writing such a definition. But that obviously does not daunt the good Senator from Iowa.

He came up with a definition of excessive speculation that is a real honey. He defines it as (1) speculative trading in a volume in excess of the volume reasonably necessary to absorb hedging trades, or (2) speculative trading of a character which causes or tends to cause unreasonable fluctuations or unwarranted changes in price.

To a tired Senate that was rushing through a flood of some 40 or 50 amendments before the final vote on the Defense Production Act last Tuesday, these words must have sounded very sweet and reasonable indeed. The trouble with them is that they are absolutely meaningless. They are so vaguely drawn that it would take long court controversies to define them properly and by the time such clarifications could be obtained the war emergency probably would long be over.

So here again it is quite obvious that the war is being used merely as an excuse and that what the administration and some of its friends are really after is the permanent crippling of the commodity exchanges.

Senator GILLETTE failed to say what he considers as a trading volume "reasonably necessary" to absorb hedging trades. Put any commodity expert on the witness stand and he will tell you that the trouble with the commodity exchanges today is not excessive speculation but not enough speculation. There is no way of arbitrarily fixing a percentage relationship between hedging and speculative transactions.

There is no doubt, however, that the broader the futures markets are, the better they will fulfill their functions. Moreover, price fluctuations in an active market usually are smaller, and not larger, than in a narrower market.

That is elementary economics, but obviously this is one of the economic laws Secretary Brannan and Senator GILLETTE have suspended—for political reasons. Commodities in which no organized futures markets exist frequently show sharped price fluctuations and more speculation than the ones with futures markets because the price-making process in the futures markets is being conducted in full view of everybody.

The Gillette amendment, to be quite charitable about it, is ill-conceived and poorly written. It would be useless in the fight against wartime inflation—but it would be extremely harmful to the continued functioning of the commodity exchanges. It should be eliminated from the Defense Production Act by the Senate-House conferees.

Disaffection in Red China

OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 25 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Disaffection in Red China," written by Rodney Gilbert, and published in the New York Herald Tribune of Tuesday, August 22, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

DISAFFECTION IN RED CHINA—GROWING DISCONTENT PRESENTS POSSIBILITY OF BLOW-UP IN MOSCOW'S FACE WITHIN A YEAR

(By Rodney Gilbert)

TAIPEH, FORMOSA.—It has been frequently reported, both from Stalinist China, via Hong Kong, and from Japan, that an army of something like 200,000 Manchurian troops has been assembled near the Korean border, ready to go into action in support of the North Koreans whenever Moscow gives the word. Since the Peking regime claims authority over all of Red China's armed forces, such action would commit Mao Tse-tung and company to open warfare against the United Nations and more specifically against those nations which are contributing men, ships, and planes to the effort to check the progress of the Stalinist Koreans. This would be such a serious commitment that, if it is really contemplated, Mr. Malik is simply throwing dust in the eyes of those who watch his forensic antics in the Security Council.

It would be a serious commitment because if Chinese soldiery were shooting at American ground forces and British ships in Korea, there could be no pretense that Chinese armed forces elsewhere were not at war with the British in Hong Kong, for example, or with the American Seventh Fleet and its planes in the Formosa channel. But there is no reason to believe that the Chinese Communist government in Peking would hesitate to obey Russian orders that would involve China in war with the civilized world as deeply as North Korea is now involved. The shelling of British and other ships at the approaches to Hong Kong harbor is a gesture in contempt of the consequences of such an involvement. So was the recent machine-gunning of an American patrol plane by Chinese Communist planes, if correctly reported.

There are many reasons for thinking, moreover, that bringing China into open conflict with the non-Communist world would seem highly desirable to Moscow. Great hordes of Chinese soldiery could be poured into Korea. Great weight of numbers would force the United States to do one of two things: to get out, with great loss of "face" and confidence throughout Asia, or to throw great weight into it at great expense. This would divert so much strength to the Far East that, to be prepared for an "emergency" in Europe and for home defense as well, the whole economy of the United States would have to be put on a war footing.

Feints at Formosa, Hong Kong, and Indochina, with submarine play off of the Japanese and Philippine coasts, would invite further diversions of strength to the East and more exhausting efforts to be ready for emergencies in Europe. All of this would be designed to promote the economic prostration of the capitalist world, at no extraordinary cost to Soviet Russia, and at no great risk of war.

The one great risk to the Soviet Union is that some important satellite would have a revulsion of feeling against this game and refuse to play its part. This is nowhere likelier to happen than in China. It is not because any top Communist has the will or the power to lead a counterrevolution that is likely to happen there; but simply because the revulsion of feeling among all classes is growing faster than the all-important police system.

There is much talk here of going back to the continent within a year that is based upon nothing but wishful thinking. But there is also a belief here, founded on real information, that China will blow up in Moscow's face within a year for the reason that discontent is growing at such a pace that it cannot be policed. Considering what a tremendous advantage in the cold war the Stalinist conquest of continental China seems to have given the Kremlin, the chance that the Chinese masses may be all but ready to wreck the whole Soviet establishment in the Far East should be a possibility of the greatest importance to the non-Communist world.

Mao Tse-tung said some weeks ago that there were still 400,000 guerrillas to be mopped up in China. The word for guerrilla in Chinese is unsatisfactory and misleading In the military terminology of 30 years ago it was used to describe regular army units functioning as flying columns. That usage is forgotten; and the word "yu chi tui" now describes a body of armed men with some organization and discipline, in revolt against authority. That is probably what Mao had in mind; for, when the Nationalist armies were retreating they left behind, throughout north, central, and south China, as many men, under officers and with their arms, as could find local cover from which to operate. There is constant communication between some of these bodies and a central command on this island, and occasional communication with nearly all of them. This chain of units extends from Manchuria to Hainan and as deep into the hinterland as eastern Hunan and Honan. These are what might be called the official guerrillas and their number is estimated at 300,000. But more or less loosely attached to these in all the same territories are bodies of outlawed farmers who have risen in revolt against excessive taxation and grain levies, deserters from the Red armies, usually trying to get back to their native places, and runaways from the cities who have run foul of Communist regimentation.

Mao's estimate of 400,000 would probably account for all of these in the eastern provinces. But in the western parts, notably in western Hunan, Kueichow, and Szechuan, there are still small armies of defeated soldiery, holding their own under no particular authority and making common cause with native bandits and rebel farmers, who are keeping big areas in chaos. About these no one here has as much information as the Communists, who advertise them by denouncing them. In Kansu most of the defeated Moslems, who were militiamen, have gone back to their farms, but from Communist publicity one learns that bands of these tough fellows are still harassing the conquerors. Even in Sinkiang a rebel element survives and in Inner Mongolia the same Prince Teh, who outlawed himself by submitting to the Japanese, is now operating against the Reds with a very effective little force.

All these are known as guerrillas in popular parlance; and nobody estimates the total number of armed men who have not submitted to the Communists as low as a million.

But that is not the end of it, for not only have Mao's beloved peasantry turned against the regime, but the workers whom Li Li-san came back to organize into the dictatorial proletariat are more bitterly disillusioned than the peasantry. Their exploitation is along classical Stalinist lines. Hours are longer, wages lower, and the speed-up is whooped along by labor heroes. When factories are moved, the workers are rounded up and herded along with the machinery, without any provision for the movement and housing of their families. To top this off there is very serious unemployment in every industrial center—with no slave labor camps as yet to take care of it.

Now Chinese labor has had just enough experience in organization to organize revolt—taking the form mostly of slow motion and scientific sabotage. This underground labor organization, which spread very slowly at first from Shanghai, is now reaching into every industrial community and, since it is less demonstrative where discipline is the best, "the fire is hottest under the Communists where they smell the least smoke," as one visitor to this island from Shanghai recently said to me.

That same condition is equally true too of concealed rebellion in the Communist armies. Where it is best prepared there is no evidence of disaffection. A regiment stationed in the town of Meihsien in Kuangtung, under Communist officers, was secretly pledged to the counterrevolution. But, being moved to wrath by the conduct of local Red officials, it held a lynching party, declared itself for the Nationalist Government and took to the hills.

This was a deplorable development because one such unit acting alone achieves nothing but the relief of the Reds from the cost of its keep, while 20, acting on a given signal at the right time, might seize a province and wipe out the whole Red set-up. But now there is a coordinating force of experts at work which is trying to bring every element in actual revolt, every underground force and all the potential rebels—all known as guerrillas in popular parlance now—under some sort of direction.

Several months ago Mr. Christopher Rand, writing from Hong Kong, told of the spread of disillusionment and discontent in Red China, but expressed the belief that the Communist bureaucracy was loyal. The indoctrinated fanatics are loyal; but the Communists took over such enormous administrative responsibilities in so short a time that the indoctrinated fanatics make up a trifling minority within the great body of technicians, administrators, clerks, and what-not whom they had to recruit from the middle class and the rural gentry—the elements in the population which they are systematically ruining.

Great numbers of their recruits, indeed, joined them for the very reason that their families or their employers were ruined and that they had to serve the Communists to eat. They attend all the indoctrination classes and become masters of the Marxist jargon; but bales of smuggled letters come through Hong Kong to this place to prove that the most intense haters of the Stalinist system are among the employees in its administrative system.

And then for the police system, upon which Stalinist regimes elsewhere rely for survival—that's really the worm at the core of the big Red apple.

Internal Security

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 25 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr KILGORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial appearing in the Washington Post of August 25, 1950, entitled "Internal Security."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INTERNAL SECURITY

Senator MCCARRAN'S bill on which the Senate is about to begin fateful deliberations is titled "A bill to protect the internal security of the United States, and for other purposes." Because protection of the country's internal security is now a matter of crucial importance, the bill deserves sobsr consideration in the light, first, of its contribution to this paramount purpose and, second, in relation to its other unstated purposes.

The McCarran bill is an omnibus measure dealing wih three distinct and essentially different problems: (1) The problem of espionage and sabotage; (2) the problem of seditious or subversive utterances and associations; (3) the problem of hostile alien infiltration. Respecting the first of these problems, the McCarran bill carries out, in much the same manner as the security bill introduced by Senator MAGNUSON, the President's recommendations for tightening the laws against spies and saboteurs. To this extent, it directly serves the purpose of protecting the country's internal security. In our judgment, however, the two other problems dealt with in the McCarran bill are not directly related to internal security, whatever may be their pertinence to the "other purposes" Senator MCCARRAN had in view.

The McCarran bill proposes to deal with the problem of subversive opinions through the complicated mechanism previously proposed by Senators MUNDT and FERGUSON; indeed, it takes over their subversive activities control bill in all its essentials. This is to say, in brief, that it would require the registrations of all Communists and Communist sympathizers as designated by an administrative board, it would substantially cripple their ability to spread their ideas, and it would make criminal "any act which would substantially contribute to the establishment within the United States of a totalitarian dictatorship * * * under the domination or control of any foreign government, foreign organization, or foreign individual." This is a definition so vague that we think it seriously threatens the freedom of expression guaranteed by the first amendment of the Constitution.

The premise on which this sweeping proposal rests is that ideas are dangerous to the internal security of the United States. But it has been a fundamental American premise for a century and a half—ever since the unfortunate Sedition Act of 1798 was allowed to lapse in 1800—that unhealthy ideas are best countered by healthy ones and that the gravest danger to the sources of national strength lies in the suppression of opinion.

The opinions of the Communists are odious. But they are not, as opinions, dangerous. There is no sign that they are contagious or that they have infected more than a tiny handful of sick Americans. Communists are nuisances. But they are not, as Communists, threats to internal security. They threaten security only if they engage in espionage or sabotage. And this is why it is wise to strengthen the statutory provisions against spies and saboteurs, as the President has recommended. The subversive control provisions of the McCarran bill would not contribute in the smallest degree to the detection and frustration of spies and saboteurs. They would not protect internal security. They would serve only the other purposes of the bill—particularly the dangerous and essentially totalitarian purpose of punishing men for the holding or expression of disloyal thoughts.

We have dealt in an earlier editorial with the immigration and naturalization features of the McCarran bill. These, too, are punitive rather than preventive. Insofar as they are addressed at all to the protection of internal security, they embrace the totalitarian technique of quarantining hostile ideas, of shutting this country off from contact with the outside world. We need to strive, of course, to keep outside our borders the agents of communism who would attempt to injure our military defenses. But it is craven folly, peculiarly Communist in character, to bar all who disagree with us.

Security is not promoted by panicky fears; it calls for rational precautions. The bulk of the McCarran bill is aimed at shadows and serves purposes which have nothing to do with security. Yet in the name of security it threatens freedoms which have been the historical sources of American strength.

The Responsibility and Duty of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH S. WHERRY

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 25 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, the New York Times yesterday carried an article by Mr. Arthur Krock, which makes sound observations on the responsibility and duty of Congress.

It is with the thought that Mr. Krock's observations should be preserved in official form that I ask unanimous consent for insertion of the article in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN THE NATION—THE SENATE PROVES IT LEARNED A LESSON

(By Arthur Krock)

WASHINGTON, August 23.—Until the House and Senate conferees on the defense production bill (the economic controls measure) have reported an agreement to the two branches of Congress, and this agreement has been approved, the legislation will remain unfinished business. But the form in which the bill passed the Senate contained two provisions which proclaim the fact that this branch at least has learned a lesson from the recent past.

The lesson is that temporary loans of power by Congress to the Executive are very difficult to recall if the President wants to keep them longer than Congress thinks the situation of the country requires. It was brought home to Congress by experience during the administrations of Franklin D. Roosevelt. Then also it was discovered by the legislators that, even if Congress put a terminal date on loans of authority, Executive influence could operate to have that extended if the President were made a part of the terminating process.

SENATOR AIKEN'S PROPOSAL

When, therefore, the Senate Banking and Currency Committee began consideration of the defense production bill as passed by the House, certain members determined to profit by that experience. After private discussions in which Senators ROBERTSON, of Virginia, and AIKEN, of Vermont were prominent, the latter proposed in committee that at any time Congress could withdraw the full delegation of emergency powers to the President by concurrent resolution. Unlike a joint resolution, this legislative process is completed wholly by congressional action; the President is not a part of it and against it he cannot apply the veto.

Advocates of the method pointed out to the committee that the proposed delegation of powers was vast, that they were to be loaned in a situation far short of full mobilization and without careful study and full hearings. It might well develop, they said, that some of the loans were unwise and would do more harm than good. Therefore, they argued, it was only fair to the people and to the President to arrange that they could be terminated before June 30, 1952, the date of their expiration — by Congress through concurrent resolution or by the President's own decision that he did not need them any longer.

THE PARTIAL REPEAL PLAN

The force of this argument, as applied to the specific legislation, combined with memories of the congressional experience previously referred to, was sufficient to persuade the committee to include the concurrent resolution feature in its original draft. Then came a discussion of what safeguards should be furnished for the body of the bill if a section or sections were held unconstitutional. The usual proposal was made that the legislation should explicitly state that judicial invalidation of any part of it would not affect the remainder, to which there was no dissent.

But this set Senator ROBERTSON to thinking that the same safeguard could be erected for the body of the bill in the event any section or sections turned out to be unwise or unworkable. Accordingly, he suggested that Congress, by concurrent resolution, might also at any time repeal any part of the legislation. Once again Republican members of the committee were available as sponsors, and the original draft was amended to include this equally important provision.

A SALUTARY ACTION

With these two reservations on the loans of authority, the bill passed the Senate, 85 to 3. If they are retained in the final draft that goes to the President, and if he signs that, Congress will have taken a very salutary action. It will have protected its domain under the Constitution and the popular interest while at the same time delegating powers to the Executive which it believes the emergency requires. It will have assured that the terminal point fixed for the loan of power cannot be exceeded and may be shortened, and by these provisions the Senate also made it possible for Congress to retain its function as a full partner in the triune Government of the United States.

BALANCING VETO POWER

These vital considerations were often neglected by Congress throughout the Roosevelt administrations. Beginning with the emergency laws of 1933 to combat the depression, Congress developed the practice of surrendering vast authority to the Executive which the Constitution had reserved to the legislative branch without protecting itself from the Presidential veto power in case Congress should want to reclaim what it had delegated. It takes a two-thirds majority in both branches to override a Presidential veto; a strong President can usually prevent that from forming; and Congress, unless it takes the precautions it did in writing the defense-production bill, often has found that this is the history of surrendered authority.

From the viewpoint of the constitutional division of powers, the safeguards written into the defense-production bill are equally as important as the Senate's approval of the Wherry-Bricker amendment. This linked wage with price controls and required the dual application to the entire economic structure instead of selected parts of it, for, as Senator WHERRY said by way of example, to control meat prices the system must be extended to corn, wheat, cereals, and poultry—must "go clear across the board to be effective."

Counterrevolution in China

OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, August 25 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Counterrevolution in China," written by Rodney Gilbert, and published in the New York Herald Tribune of Wednesday, August 23, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COUNTERREVOLUTION IN CHINA—TIME LEFT TO REST OF WORLD TO FORESTALL REDS AND TAKE ACTION MAY BE VERY SHORT

(By Rodney Gilbert)

TAIPEH, FORMOSA.—In yesterday's contribution from "this island bastion of liberty and democracy," as my Chinese friends here describe Formosa when on a rhetorical flight in English, I had a good deal to say about the way in which a mass Chinese revolt against Soviet tutelage could and might spike the Kremlin's cold-war guns. I said that many well-informed persons here felt that this could happen within a year. This writer probably gave the impression that he thought so, too; and he does, conditionally. If all the different kinds of guerrilla and underground movements could be coordinated, and if a high-pressure propaganda campaign were to exploit the growing revulsion of feeling against communism in practice and against the subservience of the Chinese Red dictatorship to the Stalinist dictatorship, there could be a genuine mass rising which the armies would first refuse to suppress and would then support.

Whether these conditions can be quickly met or not, this writer is not sure. With adequate financing, some help with organization and international encouragement, they could be met in a hurry. But whether it will be quickly realized in Washington and elsewhere that such relatively cheap encouragement and help could be far more disconcerting to the Soviet Union than massive American rearmament is at this long range an unanswerable question. Yet, if there is to be succesful Chinese counterrevolution, it is exceedingly important that it should get going in a hurry. This is because of the psychology of the Chinese soldier—maybe any soldier's psychology.

It used to be a common saying among the Chinese military chiefs of the civil-war era that, though the average recruit joins the army to eat, and though he is true to his salt ("favors those whom he eats," literally), an army must have a "t'i-mo." In literary parlance this means the theme of an essay. In this connection it means a motive for fighting, a cause. The "theme" may be wholly specious, and a defeated army may find it so in retrospect, as several millions of Hitler's former soldiers now profess to find the Nazi theme. But when an army is rolling into action it is not inclined to examine its theme with a critical eye; and in that exciting hour not 1 soldier in 10,000 is receptive to an enemy propagandist's suggestion that its theme is phony.

Except for the heavily indoctrinated little nucleus of about a hundred thousand effectives which Mao Tse-tung and Chu Teh controlled at the end of World War II, the millions of "grain eaters" who subsequently conquered the Chinese mainland were recruited like any other Chinese army in history. Like every other Chinese army, they were recruited from the poor peasantry who overman the land. They joined to eat. But the Communists then supplied them with plenty of themes. The theoretical Marxist appeal was to a trifling minority, of course. The major theme was that of liberating China from the ruthless, exploiting dictatorship of the fat bourgeoisie.

An important corollary to this was that this bourgeoisie was traitorous to China because it had sold exploitation rights to the American imperialists. Even while this last line was being worked to the limit, the Nationalist armies were denied any theme at all by General Marshall's peace-making teams, because it was esteemed that anti-Communist political education among the Nationalist soldiery would overheat their passions and make it difficult for the opposing forces to be brought into a coalition.

Well, while the Red armies were rolling, the themes supplied by the Stalinist stooges did the trick. But once the northern hordes settled down in South China to what is to them a most uncongenial peace environment, they began to examine the themes and found them phony. Being peasants, they did not like what was being done to the peasants in their own northern home districts, and they did not like what was being done to the people among whom they were quartered. They might be "straw-sandaled southern barbarians," speaking an atrocious travesty on the Chinese language. Their food might be an abomination, and their country might be a foul malarial swamp; but still they are poor, undernourished Chinese farmers, subject still to rapacious official exploitation—under whatever doctrinal authority.

And as for the war having been a holy one for China's liberation from American imperialism, where was it, and where is it? And who are these arrogant Russians from whom the officers take orders with more or less grace and to whom the political commissars are so abjectly deferential? Isn't it probably true, they wonder, that they have been cajoled by traitors into winning China for the Red Russian empire?

Now that is the state of doubt that is known to prevail in many Chinese Red units, and the line of suggestion that is influencing the thinking of some of their highest officers at this moment. If mass discontent were at this writing to start one or another army rolling northward, with the expulsion of the Russians and the extermination of traitors as its theme, it could become a tidal movement and the great propaganda machinery of the Stalinist regime would be powerless against it. But if Moscow can first get a substantial Chinese force into action against the United Nations forces in Korea, and get that army in action to shouting for the obliteration of the American imperialists, the army theme throughout China, from the hour of actual conflict, may only too readily be the expulsion of the Americans from the East. Then it would be next to impossible to get a hearing for the actual fact that China, the satellite, was fighting Soviet despotism's war against civilization and democracy.

Once the existing armies were set on the wrong course and engaged in conflict at any point, it would be easy for the Kremlin's agents in Peking to raise as big additional armies as Russia could equip and train. Eighteen months ago this writer tried to contribute an article to a magazine with a Nation-wide circulation on the uses that Russia could make of China's enormous manpower if the Stalinist conquest of that country were not checked. This was rejected as a gross exaggeration of the possibilities.

A little over 2 months ago few occidental military authorities would have believed that masses of Orientals could be trained and disciplined to fight as the Northern Koreans have fought for a wholly unworthy cause—the enslavement of their whole nation to the Kremlin. But though they may not have taken much stock in the theme supplied them when they started rolling—the liberation of Korea from the agents of American imperialism—no effort to persuade them that their southern kinsmen were fighting for a worthier cause has had the slightest effect on their fighting spirit.

So it would be with an equally well equipped, well disciplined and well found Chinese force; and if Soviet Russia saw fit to equip and train 10,000,000 men, the 10,000,000 men could be recruited; and with an antiforeign theme the 10,000,000 would fight. And under those conditions the masses would be cowed and docile, even though the maintenance of the 10,000,000 meant grinding poverty for 100,000,000.

There is no reason to think that Moscow contemplates any such gigantic effort to set Red China on an anti-American course. It could not be organized in time to anticipate a tidal anti-Russian movement, if such a movement were to start in the near future. But no such effort would be needed to start a greater mass of well-equipped Chinese soldiers than the whole Northern Korean army on the anti-American warpath and have millions chanting the anti-American theme song in a very short time.

So the time left to the rest of the world to forestall such action and supply fuel to a counterrevolution may be very short indeed.

America Can Win the Peace

OF
HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, August 25 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, the July 1 edition of the Saturday Review of Literature, a very responsible and stimulating publication, contains an article entitled "America Can Win the Peace," by Mr. Louis Fischer. This article was called to my attention by Mr. S. Spencer Scott, president of Harcourt Brace & Co., Inc.

The article is so well-written and so timely that I ask unanimous consent to insert it in its entirety in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICA CAN WIN THE PEACE

(By Louis Fischer)

The other night, following a lecture, a member of my audience asked if anyone really understood our foreign policy. There were so many contradictions in the things we said and the things we did, we went on, that he had given up the attempts to comprehend America's purpose in the field of foreign affairs.

Another questioner at the same lecture wanted to know why it was that so few books were available which attempted to explain to the responsible American citizen what our foreign policy was or should be. Back in the thirties, he said, scarcely a month passed without the publication of several important books interpreting or analyzing America's world role. Yet today, when the stakes are infinitely larger, there are few books which contribute to an informed American public opinion on our foreign policy.

Both these questions, it seems to me, reflect a general confusion and uncertainty in America today over our relationship to the rest of the world and our responsibility in meeting the threats to the peace. This article is an effort to examine the foundations of an American foreign policy. It is also an effort—perhaps presumptuous—to present in rough outline some ideas that might go into dealing with this general subject.

What should be the purpose of the foreign policy of the United States?

Should it be anticommunism? We combat Stalin and bolster Tito. Both are Communists.

Should it be procapitalism? We subsidize capitalist countries and we also reinforce the Socialist governments of Great Britain, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Burma.

Should it be prodemocracy? We support many democracies as well as the dictatorships in Portugal and Yugoslavia. Some of those who bridle at American aid to Tito would help Franco, whose one-party tyranny is as tough as Tito's.

American foreign policy today is thus pro- and anti-Communist, pro and anti-capitalist, pro- and anti-democracy. Does this mean that the right hand of the State Department does not know what its left hand is doing? Does this reflect confusion in Washington?

I think not.

American foreign policy is attuned to national security rather than to class interests and ideology. The only situation which could drag the United States into war or endanger its safety is Soviet aggression, and the State Department, therefore, devotes its major effort to the frustration of Moscow's expansionist tendencies. It does this, at the moment, by strengthening all those countries that lie athwart the path of a possible Soviet push. The nations strengthened may have different social systems and political ideologies but if they form a barrier to Soviet imperialism they make a contribution to world peace and thereby earn Washington's blessing and bounty.

Individual Americans, including men high in the Truman administration, may shrink from the idea of pouring American money into the exchequers of Socialist or not-too-democratic States. But they know that if for want of American dollars the Laborite and reactionary regimes of non-Soviet Europe collapsed, Russia would have Europe and a Russo-American war would become inevitable.

The United States went into the First and Second World Wars and England fought Napoleon, the Kaiser, and Hitler for the same reason: to prevent one nation from dominating Europe. If today the Soviet Union threatened to conquer Europe (which in present circumstances would mean Asia, too) the national defense of America would be menaced and the United States would feel compelled to go to war with Stalin as it did twice with Germany.

To build a wall against Soviet expansion is thus to stop a third world war. But it is not always possible to choose one's building materials; you accept what is available. Some stones are pink, some red, some gray, some black. The question is whether the stones can be integrated into a bulwark.

Everybody agrees that the Second World War started when Japan invaded Manchuria in 1931. The great powers should have resisted Japan, it is now said. But in 1931 Manchuria was ruled by Chian Sueh-liang, a ruthless dictator. Yet the defense of China might have stopped Japan and thereby stopped the landslide which led to the attack on Pearl Harbor.

Similarly, Abyssinia was a backward, slave-holding kingdom when Mussolini assailed it in 1935. Yet democratic action on behalf of Abyssinia would have checked the forces that made the Second World War.

To abandon an area to totalitarian aggression because it has little or no freedom is to condemn it to protracted slavery and, in addition, to hasten the coming of war. Irrespective of the nature of a regime, therefore, it must be shielded from a foreign assault. The marked victim of aggression, however, should not only be saved; it should be led toward freedom. The two processes are related, for democracy is relaxation (dictatorship is tension) and relaxation comes with peace. In Greece and Turkey the alchemy of Truman's gold-transfusions is converting reactionary systems to liberalism; the trend in Greece began after the civil war was ended; it could not have started during the fighting or when the country expected the struggle. Likewise in Turkey American subsidies have given the population an inner confidence in the face of undisguised Soviet designs. And aid from the big Atlantic democracy creates a democratic noblesse oblige.

Thus a foreign policy dedicated to antiaggression and peace promotes democracy and undermines communism. On the other hand, a policy vociferously avowing its anticommunism may defeat itself and for this reason:

When the United States declares that it is engaged in an ideological battle to stem world communism it conveys the impression abroad that this is an American struggle for the survival of private capitalism. Europeans and Asians often draw the conclusions that they can be neutral in this contest, which is primarily, they gather, a clash between the class philosophies of Bolshevik Russia and conservative America.

Emphasis on anticommunism suggests to the outside world that America has launched a crusade to exterminate an enemy of the economic status quo. That theme is then expertly embellished by the Communists to prove that Wall Street is on the warpath against the Kremlin and wants Europe and Asia to pull its ideological chestnuts out of the cold-war fire.

But if the stress of Washington's propaganda were on American detestation of aggression because it leads to war the people of the Eastern Hemisphere would quickly and easily see that this is their fight, for they will be the first targets of a Soviet attack. They would also see that in opposing Russia America is helping them, not using them. This would allay widespread suspicion of and hostility to the United States in countries which have received hundreds of millions of dollars from the United States Government and from generous American individuals.

Neither the past nor present conduct of the masters of Europe and Asia has taught those continents to believe that any government behaves unselfishly; they are accordingly easy converts to the facile Communist thesis that America is building them up for slaughter in another war to be waged for the preservation of American capitalism.

Yet the truth is that in reinvigorating the nations imperiled by Soviet imperialism the United States is saving those nations from death while at the same time legitimately safeguarding its own security and preventing the third world war.

Europe and Asia and part of Africa have known war at its bloodiest and the word peace exercises a potent magic over them. The Communists have captured the word and misshaped it into a mask to conceal the expansionist proclivities and activities of the Russian State and its foreign Communist puppets.

The facts, properly explained, would make America the synonym of peace. But the strident anti-Communist Voice of America gives the Communists and their collaborators a golden opportunity to say that America refuses, because it is capitalist, to live amicably with the Communist third of humanity. The stigma of belligerence is thus pinned on America instead of on Stalin's breast, where it belongs.

The hand helping numerous nations threatened by Russia is the hand of peace but the voice can be misinterpreted to sound like a call for war.

The anti-Communist Voice, moreover, can, if beamed homeward too shrilly, become a cry against domestic civil liberties. In this way anticommunism blunts the weapon that will defeat communism, for the best antidote to dictatorship is liberty.

There are actually indications that Moscow is pleased by the anti-Communist furore in the non-Soviet world. The Cominform, which means the Kremlin, has been prodding the Communist parties of all continents to be more militant and violent and to undertake political campaigns in the national interests of Russia (such as strikes to hamper the landing of American munitions in France and Italy) even though they hurt those Communist parties. On numerous occasions since the Comintern was established in 1919 the Soviet authorities have sacrificed foreign Communist parties to what they thought were Russia's needs, and today Stalin appears to favor the suppression of the Communist movements outside the Soviet Empire because in the illegal underground his agents could control them more effectively and exploit them more completely for the greater glory of Russia uber alles.

Above all, anticommunism, which may be a completely convincing slogan in the United States, is negative and ineffective in many other countries. It has no appeal for Tito or for the numerous Communist-nationalists in the Soviet Empire to whom Muscovite imperialism is irritatingly irksome. Among the hundreds of millions inhabiting the old colonial areas around the Indian and Pacific Oceans, the existing economic order is identified with hunger, while communism, if they have ever heard of it, comes as a promise of an additional bowl of rice per day. Communism does not give them the instantaneous shock of horror it evokes in most Americans. Even in western Europe, at least among the working people and the intellectuals, capitalism would run communism a close race for the unpopularity prize.

American policy makers should understand that not every country has had the fortunate experiences of the United States, where capitalism stands for an extremely high standard of living and considerable personal freedom. Capitalism in Asia, for instance, is reminiscent of foreign rule. It is the bleak past and the black present. It stands for slumps, misery, usury, illiteracy, disease, and domination by a thin upper crust of business barons and political bullies. Anticommunism in the mouth of capitalist America, therefore, arouses little enthusiasm; on the contrary, it arouses the fear of an alliance between the mighty capitalist system of the United States and the unenlightened, predatory, unimaginative domestic class of loan sharks, feudal landlords, and sweat-shop employers. Meanwhile the Communists proclaim themselves the wave of the bright future and paint Russia as the underdog's paradise. As a result Moscow, though totally counter-revolutionary itself, benefits from the revolutionary mood of the East.

Similarly, Russia, though aggressively imperialistic itself, benefits from the widespread anti-imperialist mood. The rise of Slav imperialism is not fully realized in many areas of the globe. After its birth in November 1917 the Bolshevik Revolution anathemized Czarist land grabs; Port Arthur and Dairen were restored to China; Poland and the Baltic states were granted independence; the absolute monarchy's designs on the Turkish Straits, the North Persian oil fields, and Manchuria were renounced and denounced. At the same time Lenin and his lieutenants attacked British imperialism in India and Burma, Dutch imperialism in Indonesia, and all European and American imperialistic adventures.

Today the British are out of India and Burma, the Dutch are out of Indonesia, the United States no longer lands Marines in Latin America, whereas Russia is back in Port Arthur, Dairen, Manchuria, Poland, and the Baltic countries, and has revived Czarist strivings toward the Dardanelles and Iran.

Nevertheless, millions of minds, especially in Asia and even in India and Burma, do not understand this epochal reversal of roles; they still think England and America imperialistic and the Soviets anti-imperialistic. The memory of Lenin's anti-imperialistic renunciations survives all of Stalin's robberies.

Material to support charges of Soviet imperialism is close at hand and will win credence in China and eastern Europe because of the obvious resemblance between Stalin and his political ancestors, the Czars of Moscovy. The Kremlin's sizzling hate and remorseless persecution of any Yugoslav or Pole or Czech who puts his country's interests above those of Russia (this is the chief reason for all the purges and trials in the Cominform colonies) would make the picture of Soviet domination of subject peoples unmistakably clear were it not for the blurring effect of another image or mirage: America's wish to spread its own type of economic system The focus, therefore, must be on Russian imperialism and on all other imperialisms. Asia, Africa, and Europe would then be less inclined to believe the anti-Americanisms of the Communists.

Except as opposition to Stalin's new imperialism, American hostility to Russia is unintelligible to many outside observers. Literate persons everywhere recall without difficulty the wartime alliance between capitalist United States and the Soviet Union. America, they remember, sent more than $11,000,000,000 worth of lend-lease material to Stalin's Communist dictatorship. This gift, unprecedented for size and made without conditions or strings, helped to save the Communist dictatorship from destruction. It also helped the democracies win the war, but it was not pure expediency. Although the Kremlin in May 1939 had dismissed Maxim Litvinov, the champion of collective security and peace, and signed the Nazi pact and immediately thereafter launched on its present career of imperialism, the democracies did not yet realize the scope and intensity of Moscow's expansionist drive. Until the Soviet-Nazi pact of August 1939, in fact, Soviet Russia had annexed no territory. The subsequent annexations, by arrangement with Hitler, in Poland, the Baltic region, and Rumania, were not universally recognized as the foundation stones of the New Soviet Empire. "We couldn't forsesee," Vice President BARKLEY said recently, "that one of our partners in that war * * * would become so selfish and so domineering. * * *"

It was only in 1945 that some heads of democratic states commenced to see the danger of a bear roaming wild in the vacuum created by the defeat of Germany, Italy, and Japan, and by the weakness of France and England. Nevertheless, with a purblindness unmatched in the annals even of modern diplomacy, the west continued to appease Stalin. Not until 1947 did Washington, London, and Paris become adequately alarmed by the mounting ambition of the Moscow dictator.

Then began the cold war of resistance to further Soviet expansion. The expansion is the reason for western resistance to Russia. The expansion threatens world peace and human freedom. It is a much more convincing argument in Europe, Asia, and Africa than anticommunism.

Today, especially in Europe and some parts of Asia, American materialism and class consciousness are equaled by Soviet materialism and class consciousness. A number of politicians and intellectuals in those areas accordingly favor a third or neutral position. But if they were made to see that Russian expansion is the enemy and that it menaces them more than it does the United States they would recognize America as their protector and Russia as the warmonger. They would not fall into the Communist trap of neutrality.

America can win the peace. The cold war can be won and the hot war prevented by rallying the largest number of people to our side. This should be the purpose of American foreign policy and from the purely practical point of view it would be well to realize that more of the 2,300,000,000 people on this earth will respond to the call of peace and anti-imperialism than to any other banner.

The conflict between dictatorship and democracy is undeniable; so is the conflict between communism on the one hand and capitalism and the British Labor type of social democracy on the other. But wars and rumors of war help communism (the Bolshevik Revolution was the child of the First World War and the Red regimes in Eastern Europe and China sprang from the Second) whereas peace, plenty for the lowly, progress, and national freedom create a climate in which the poison plant of communism must wither and die.

Dilemmas and Solutions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

Friday, August 25, 1950

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, while a student at Furman University in my home city of Greenville, S. C., not too many years ago, I met a young fellow student by the name of William C. DeVane. I well remember young DeVane because, like me, he had to earn his own way. We had adjoining newspaper routes. Through the years which have came and gone, William has continued to take advantage of every opportunity and now, for some years he has been dean of Yale College. This is but another example of the fact that there are still opportunities in this great country for those who are willing to work.

Attached hereto is a copy of Dr. DeVane's address delivered at the recent Furman University commencement exercise:

DILEMMAS AND SOLUTIONS

To anyone connected with American education, this pleasant month of June provides all the necessary materials for a nightmare. Especially is this so if one is put in the unenviable position of being a speaker at a commencement exercise, or perhaps the even more painful position of having to listen to the speaker. Two weeks ago as I lay abed with a fever, I had such a nightmare—induced, no doubt, by my effort to provide a speech that would be worthy of the honor which you have done me in inviting me to be your speaker on this occasion. In my heated dream I seemed to see the whole breadth and length of our sunlit country, and in every city, village, hamlet, and whistle stop, speakers were haranguing with eloquence and gesture our innocent and defenseless youth. The noise was appalling. Elderly gentlemen with upraised arms were making fervid appeals, shaggy-haired statesmen were beating their breasts, and now and again I heard ministers at prayer informing the Lord in passionate terms of what was happening at that time in that place. In my fever, I am sure I heard echoes of the speeches we used to make when we were young—Spartacus to the Gladiators, The Cross of Gold, and I am not sure I did not hear faint echoes of Casey at the Bat. Before a blessed and complete unconsciousness overtook me. I was granted a view of the victims of all this—those who had to listen—and to my astonishment they seemed utterly unmoved—not surprised, but stolid, peaceful, unmoved, even cheerful and enduring, but almost completely unaffected. They had the air of knowing that the storm would blow over, that soon the clamor would cease, the sun would shine again, the seasons would march in their accustomed round, and they would go about the familiar business of the world in the way their fathers and mothers had gone before them—earning their daily bread, raising their families, suffering and rejoicing, failing and aspiring again, in short, living the life of our passionate kind as it is given to us to live.

Now I submit that it is not propitious for a speaker at commencement to have such visions and dream a short time before he is to perform. But it has its good side. It certainly undermines the speaker's confidence in the effect he is to have, but it also tends to shorten his speech. If there is something ludicrous in the sight of all the commencement speakers across the land at this season—as the French cynic remarks, "Old men like to give good advice when they can no longer set a bad example"—there is also something pathetic in the situation. For behind all the speaking and the gestures, and behind the well-deserved congratulations there is a valiant attempt to pass on to our youngsters the wisdom that life has taught us. There is the noble desire to save them, if possible, some of the mistakes and pains that we have blundered into. There is the real yearning to prepare you as you set out for the rough journey you are about to undertake. It is of this love and care of the generations, each for each, that makes our civilization permanent and strong. Blest be the tie that binds.

It is customary on occasions like this for the speaker to say something weighty and of public importance, and to this end I shall address myself. I want to speak for a little while of some of the dilemmas that confront us at this time as individuals and as a Nation, and I want to offer (as my good advice) a solution. Since the world in our time is compelled by its problems to think so persistently in international, political, and economic terms, I must step out of my character as a literary scholar and attempt for the occasion to speak in those terms, though my solutions, as you will see, will be primarily moral solutions, offered in literary terms.

For rather more than two decades the leaders of thought and action in our country have divided into two great and opposed parties—parties which have little relation to our formal political designations as Democrats and Republicans. These groups habitually think of themselves as idealists, on one hand, and realists, on the other. Each group is passionate in its opinions, and utterly convinced that it, and it only, has the answer. Between them we are constantly being asked to make a choice—to choose this or that horn of the dilemma. The unicorn, we are informed, had only one horn, but cows and dilemmas have two. Back in the thirties in our economic and political distress we were told by these groups very sternly and very persistently that we had to choose—the road had only two forks—we had to be Communists or we had to be Fascists. We know now, with the hindsight of history, that the choice was a false one—that we had to be neither, that we had a good road of our own that only needed recognition, care, and improvement. Nationally, we had the good sense to refuse both horns, and take our own way, though many of our impassioned and injudicious individuals went this way and that, even to the point of conspiracy and betrayal. Our way was and is the way of democracy—of majority rule and minority concurrence, of a constant striving for more economic and social justice, and an abhorrence of violence. Let us take to heart the lesson which that time of stress provided for us.

But now again our idealists and our realists, to grant them the titles which they think they merit, are presenting us with a fictitious dilemma which is not less dangerous for being false. The idealistic schemes for world peace insist that we must either achieve world government now or resign ourselves to an inevitable third world war—that is, we must in some way reach an understanding with the Soviets or face a global war. Our realists have become convinced that we cannot attain a world government or even reach a working understanding with the Russians. They accept the fact that a war with the Russians is inevitable, and move immediately to the logical idea of a preventive war. Their reasoning is that if we must fight the Soviets why should we not choose the time that suits us best.

Now these matters are of such absolute and final importance to us that we must look with the utmost care at the alternatives we are offered, and we must cast about to see if there are not other possibilities. Does history teach us that events are inevitable? Has human will abdicated to the point where it is ready to accept a doctrine of historical destiny as its final answer? Can we give up our judgments and our responsibility in the stress of crisis? I cannot believe it. We are not wise enough to know, nor strong enough to control, the forces which operate in any particular historical event. Nor can we predict what will happen if we start so tremendous an action. We must be very deliberate indeed in accepting any idea of inevitability, and we must take twice as long, at least, before we move from the notion of the inevitability of war to the idea of a preventive war. I need hardly remind you that the next war, if it comes, will be total and atomic. Even the wiser of our military men have abandoned the idea that modern war can give us anything but destruction and death. That way, more than madness lies.

On the other side, let us look at the expectancies of the idealists who believe that we must have a world government or reach a working agreement with the Russians or a world war will be inevitable. To anyone who has studied profoundly the Communist doctrines from Marx to Lenin and Stalin it ought to be clear that the Soviet oligarchy will never come into a world government that the rest of us could tolerate, for such a world government would have to be a democracy implying majority rule and minority concurrence. The United Nations has already met this fact. Moreover, in the Communist logic of history—to which their minds are prisoners—a war between communism and capitalism is inevitable. Nor shall we appease the Russians by soft words and promises or by failing to prepare ourselves for the worst—in their logic these will be taken as signs of our decay and weakness.

Some of our idealists think we can allay the fears of Russia by practicing more liberty and equality here at home. That is a good cause in itself and should be done for its own sake and also because it will make some of the wavering nations trust us more and may cause them to aline themselves with us. But it is idle to think that such moderate actions would impress the Politburo. Only their own revolution will satisfy them.

The simple truth is that the idealist cannot bring himself to believe in the reality of the evil which we face in the fanatic creed of communism. What we confront is a political religion so consistent in its dogmatism that it is able to discount in advance any approach which varies from its doctrine. The hope of peace of the whole world is thwarted by this evil. But there it is, and we will serve no good or useful purpose by blinding ourselves to it with sentimental hopes and illusions.

Must we then come to the Communist conclusion that war is inevitable? I think not. We cannot change the minds of the Politburo, but we do not need to do so. We need only to convince the nations of Europe and Asia which are wavering. If we can contain the Russians we shall be strong enough to frighten them from aggression. Such a moral defeat will not change their minds, but their doctrine will be greatly sapped of its virulence. Tito's rebellion in Yugoslavia against the religious and political authority of the Kremlin has already had a great effect. Will Stalin be forever able to hide the fierce Russian will to power in the false panacea of orthodox Marxism?

In searching for a historical analogy to communism, that wise man, Reinhold Niebuhr, finds it in Mohammedanism. Like communism, the Mohammedan dogma was both political and religious, and the head of Mohammedanism was both sultan and caliph—like Stalin, dictator and high priest. Taking advantage of dissensions in Spain and in the Near East, the great crescent swept into France in the west and to Vienna in the east. In time the tide receded. The creed did not change; the Mohammedans still believe in a holy war, but Mohammedanism does not believe in itself enough today to challenge the world. Must we, then following the historical analogy, fight centuries of bloody wars to contain and drive back communism?

If necessary, yes, but it is not inevitable that we shall have to do so. Communism will certainly use military force to maintain its positions, but its subtler weapons are political revolution and conspiracy. These have been so successful so far that there is no immediate necessity for the Russians to resort to arms. Political penetration is safer and more successful, since it captures a country undestroyed. To meet this subtle war, our defense must be moral, economic, and political. Unless we become desperate we may never have to fight with arms. Our weapons are justice and understanding, economic help, and political wisdom in Asia and Africa as well as in Europe. The idealist must realize that nothing but a superiority of ready power in the non-Communist world can preserve peace in our time; and the realist must realize that our greatest power in this struggle lies in the unity and the moral and economic health of ourselves and our friends. We need not succumb to illusion on one hand, or desperation on the other.

But now, with your permission, I wish to move away from this huge national and international dilemma to one that has particular reference to the South—a dilemma that is not yet clearly seen as a problem of choice by most of us. A person coming back home to Carolina after living elsewhere for a third of a century is struck by the change which has taken place in his absence. I first saw Greenville in the summer of 1913, and I think I saw it for what it was, and without illusions. It was a pleasant little city with very friendly people. It had enough home-owned industry on its margins to keep it alive economically, and enough children to make it happy. Its roots were deep in the country, and one knew that the rivers and the mountains were not far away. There was occasional violence on Saturday night, and there were reported to be one or two wealthy families. The relative poverty of the city did not trouble us much, nor for a while did the great agonies of the nations in the First World War. The little city, like a hundred others in the South was largely home-minded and self-contained. To the boy's mind it was a fine place to grow up in, and he hardly saw the anxiety and poverty, material and cultural, which lay so close below the surface. If people had little to get along with they got along with that little as cheerfully as possible. If the meagreness of life was cramping to our elders, as it must have been, they could and did lull themselves with illusory and romantic talks of ancient grandeur before the War Between the States had destroyed the South. Indeed, it is not too much to say that the old dream of former greatness had paralyzed the will of almost all of the South for present and future action. Our whole society was the helpless and hypnotized victim of the soporific illusion and dream. It was the easy way to lay all our social and material short-comings to the charge of the tragedy which overtook us in the War Between the States and its ghastly aftermath. But the growing youngster saw little of the poverty, the shiftlessness, and casual injustices of that world; what he saw, and remembers with nostalgia, was the easy-going kindliness of the people, the leisure of moonlit summer evenings, and the graces and comforts of home.

But now a change has come over many of the cities of the South. They are no longer small, and they are no longer languid and sleepy. They boast of their progress and their energy; they bustle and bristle with industry and commerce. They are full of enterprise. They begin to be prosperous and wealthy. They cut the trees down to make through streets, they crowd the past out of of their way in the name of progress. The violence and injustice still are very near the surface, but the old friendliness and leisure seem to have disappeared from our ways. Our cities have no character of their own, with a few exceptions, but do their best to imitate New York, Chicago, Detroit, and Pittsburgh. They will succeed only in imitating some of the ghastly, and now almost ghostly, towns of New England—Fall River, Lowell, and Lawrence.

Now to what end is all this? Is it to make life happier? Is the South so hungry for material goods after a long starvation that it must sell its soul?

Here are the two horns of this dilemma: The sleepy, impoverished South of half a century ago; and the aggressive, noisy, and ugly country which we seem to be creating. The first horn has already slipped from our grasp; but we do not need to be impaled upon the second. Here as in the other dilemmas which I have posed there is another way—a way between the sentimental idealism of the past and the fierce and short-sighed realism before us.

But to refuse to embrace either, and to choose and make our own way requires awareness, brains, character, restraint, integrity, courage, and indeed all the virtues that make us an individual and different society. It is for you young men and women to make the South of the future. Take the best of the old and the new. Remember your gracious heritage, and know that you have a way of life which is unique. In keeping life gracious and beautiful and leisurely, there is no objection to using your brains, and even your muscles. There is no command or destiny that condemns you to poverty. Wisdom and conscience demand that you be intelligent, restrained, and just. This, then, is a plea that once again we reject both horns of the dilemma, and find a way for ourselves. None of us would wish back the pinched and narrow life of the old days; and few of us would desire the crude and ruthless society which has overwhelmed certain other parts of America. The South has something to teach the rest of this country about the good life. It will be a tragedy for the country if the South should lose its own character, and have nothing to say of its very own in the shaping of our national life.

At the beginning of this speech I threatened you with good advice. It is now delivered. Like most good advice it may be reduced to some very threadbare platitudes: "To your own self be true"; "Keep your shirt on, but your sleeves rolled up"; "Use your heads and your hearts"; and "Don't take any wooden nickels"—and since I now come from Connecticut you might add "Don't buy any wooden nutmegs." All this prudential advice makes me feel like Polonius giving counsel to his son. I need not add that beyond prudence are wisdom and justice—austere virtues which are nonetheless the best terrestrial guides we have.

It will be less than gracious to end on the bitter pill of good advice, however well intended. These young men and women graduating today have earned and deserved our congratulations—and with the congratulations go best wishes for a long, prosperous, and happy life. A hopeful country looks to you for better days than we have yet seen in this much-loved country. Those days will come if you will only be true to your best selves.

The Foresight and Unselfishness of Kentucky Women

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. WHITAKER OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 25, 1950

Mr. WHITAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.

On several occasions I have placed in the RECORD editorials from newspapers published in the Second District of Kentucky, because I believed the statements therein were food for thought and would be of some benefit to those who might read the RECORD. As a young Member, for the standpoint of service, I have yet to attempt to speak on any subject with the intent of trying to influence Members of the House to vote for or against any legislation, and I shall never be so presumptuous unless I sincerely believe that I can give my colleagues food for thought.

In 1946 I walked into the office of the Congressman who at that time had the honor to represent the same district that I have the honor of representing today, Governor Earle Clements, of the Second District of Kentucky. After passing pleasantries, Earle handed me a letter from Elkton, Todd County, Ky., which is in the Second Congressional District of Kentucky. It was signed by 28 ladies of Elkton who were asking Earle to vote for national military training. Most of these ladies I had the pleasure and privilege of knowing personally. The first signer of that letter was a good woman by the name of Mrs. Louie Weathers, who had lost her son just a short time before. He was a pilot in the United States Army Air Corps. I was so proud to know that in our district there are patriotic, sacrificing citizens who, regardless of their personal losses, had the foresight of what the policy of our national administration should be at that time.

I do not know how our foreign policy is formulated; I do not know how the State Department gages public opinion. I do know that public opinion is something everyone wants and wants it to be favorable. Of one thing I am certain, public opinion is that which even Russia, Stalin, and the Soviet Government seeks to formulate in the world today. I am also convinced that certain persons and organizations and political parties would like to know how to gage and formulate and mold public opinion. All that one has to do is to read the advertisements in the newspapers, and read the mail with the elaborate brochures and pamphlets sent out under every conceivable name, listen to the radio—public opinion is a very precious thing.

As I said before, I believe that what few remarks I have the privilege of making and placing in the RECORD should be food for thought for those who might read the RECORD. I am certain of one thing with reference to Washington and those who operate from an official standpoint, Congressmen up, that the old adage which has often been heard is very applicable, that is, "We can't see the woods for the trees." I do not believe that there is a leader, Republican or Democrat, in the House of Representatives, in the United States Senate, in the State Department, or in the Pentagon, or in, as some of my colleagues at times have sneeringly, unwisely referred, 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, now or at any other time, who did not, or now does not, from the bottom of his heart want to do everything he can to bring about the peace of the world, and that any mistakes made by these leaders are of the head and not of the heart, and that there is nothing they personally would not sacrifice to bring about peace.

My colleagues, it is so easy to criticize, so easy to point out the errors of just yesterday. It is easy to stand back and see errors after having time to look here and there, and when we listen for constructive criticism oft times we are given an answer which is cheap, political demagoguery, blaming this person and that person and the other person for apparent mistakes that they made. The true test in my mind that each man who occupies a position of trust can give to himself and receive his own answer—just what have I done, just what help have I tried to give? Have you offered to give any advice or counsel? Have you written and used a 3-cent postage stamp to those who have to make the decisions? Would you envy the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, or our President, our President, yours and mine, when they make decisions whereby if these decisions are wrong, the youth of our country shed blood and die? It would be so easy to just write a note and say, "I know in a small way the burden that is on you to make these decisions, and you forget personalities, and you forget politics, and just let me tell you that I pray for your success and I wish that your every decision shall be correct, because I love my country and I too wish peace for the world."

I received a letter this morning from the best congressional district in the United States of America—a letter which was signed by 100 women of Morganfield, Ky., in the Second Congressional District of Kentucky, and I am asking the privilege of placing it in the RECORD in order that those who read the RECORD may see that mothers, wives, sisters, and daughters of men who have served their country in times of war are farsighted enough patriotic enough, and sacrificing enough, to offer the most precious thing which they possess, their sons, their husbands, their brothers, their fathers. As true Kentuckians they offer that precious thing because of the love of their country and for the peace of the world:

AUGUST 17, 1950.

MY DEAR MR. WHITAKER: The 100 members of Griggs-Alvey Unit, No. 48, of the American Legion Auxiliary, believing that a prepared nation is the best insured nation, respectfully urge—when the bill for universal military training comes up, that you please vote "Yes."

We sincerely believe that now, while the dangers of unpreparedness are so evident, is the time to begin the foundations of an orderly reserve training program.

As mothers, wives, sisters, and daughters of men who have served their country in times of war, we ask your support of this bill.

Very truly yours,
MRS. W. F. GREENWELL,
Legislative Chairman, Griggs-Alvey Unit, No. 48.

Bacteria for Sale

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RAYMOND W. KARST
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 25, 1950

Mr. KARST. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I would like to include the following article taken from the August issue of the Butcher Workman. Under no circumstances should we attempt to economize where the welfare and health of our American people could be placed in jeopardy. I wholeheartedly support these expressions:

BACTERIA FOR SALE

Again, in House bill 7786, an outrageous effort is being made to reduce the number of Federal inspectors in meat-packing plants through a cut in appropriations for this health-guarding governmental agency. The laws providing for Federal meat inspection, along with the Food and Drug Act of 1906, are among the greatest congressional acts in the history of our Nation. Bacteria attacks animal flesh perhaps more quickly than any other substance. Without rigid Federal inspection of meat, it is very probable that death would be the reward of hundreds of innocent victims in consuming it. We need only to look at the record to review the slime and filth which prevailed in meat-slaughtering plants prior to Federal inspection.

An inadequate force of Government agents carefully examining animal carcasses before and after slaughter would be almost as bad as no inspection at all. There still exists in the sale of meat to the public some very shameful and shocking practices. While such practices may be isolated, they, nevertheless, do exist, and we can prove it. We make the open charge that in some meat-packing plants without Federal inspection animals which are either diseased or dead in the pens are still being processed by disreputable owners and sold to an innocent buying public. In some areas badly crippled animals which could not possibly pass Federal inspection are bootlegged even across State lines by blackguards who should be driven out of the industry.

Instead of the law being weakened, as House bill 7786, if enacted, will do, the whole process of inspection of meat for human consumption should be strengthened. The Senators or Congressmen who vote for a cut in appropriations for Federal meat inspection, which would automatically reduce the number of inspectors necessary, should be driven out of Congress by their constituents back home.

Let's keep our Nation's meat-packing plants clean. Federal inspection has accomplished this. Let's not destroy it.

The Awful Responsibility

OF
HON. FRED MARSHALL
OF MINNESOTA
Friday, August 25, 1950

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the Members of the House to an editorial appearing in the Independent Review, of Litchfield, Minn. This editorial says clearly the very things that need to be said today. It fixes the responsibility for the present international crisis squarely where it belongs—on the shoulders of each of us. Peace is not the work of any one man; it is a responsibility that we must share in common.

THE AWFUL RESPONSIBILITY

How many of Meeker County's 19,000 people have done anything during the last 5 years to help prevent the present Korean conflict?

The war is now striking at the lives of each and every one of us as more men are being called up, more names appear on the casualty lists and war hysteria grips us and we begin to fear the relatively petty discomforts of higher taxes, shortages, and economic controls. It is all very distasteful to us. The last thing we want to see is another full-scale war. And yet, if you and I have done nothing to help prevent it, we have very little complaint coming.

It's hard to see the relationship between Meeker County and the world affairs. The natural tendency is to feel that the United States Government is beyond our individual lives and that our thoughts and actions can have no bearing on what our country does in international situations. It is so easy and natural for us to have that attitude that probably 9 out of 10 of us are in that condition of mental stagnation.

And yet, that attitude is defeatist in a land where defeatism is scorned and it is undemocratic in a country filled with political critics of undemocratic and un-American actions.

It is defeatism because it says, "I can't." It is undemocratic because the very essence of our democratic constitution is that each citizen shall have a voice in the Government.

What could you and I have done to help prevent the outbreak of conflict against communism? We could have used our tremendous advantages as citizens of the strongest and most influential country in the world to exert some influence toward true world peace. That sounds like a big order. But it was no bigger, perhaps, than that facing the Thirteen Colonies in 1776 when they set out to win their independence from Great Britain. That job took optimism against overwhelming odds. It took action from individuals like you and I to gain from the several colonies the united action that was needed to bring the strength of public opinion to bear.

Since 1945 there has been a United Nations organization set up for the purpose of keeping world peace. The United States has been one of the main driving forces behind the United Nations. But our Government's policies, inside and outside the group, have not been backed up by informed public opinion. United States foreign policy has been either nonexistent or inconsistent.

Further, it was obvious that the UN never has had the strength needed to back up its decisions. We all knew this, but only a small percentage of Americans have tried to do anything about it. One group that tried to arouse public opinion in a democratic manner is the United World Federalists who called for a UN police force and some lessening of national sovereignties to the world organization. But UWF efforts fell mostly on deaf ears. People regarded such pleas as "idealistic" and "unrealistic." There was defeatism and an apparent loss in faith in the democratic manner of winning action. Everything was left to the leaders of the country, and most of us withdrew into our own small lives, trying not to notice the troubles of the world and trying not to notice the finger of responsibility that was pointing at us.

We failed to face the fact that it was up to America. While we realized that Europe had lost her power and prestige we didn't see that in the eyes of the world we had taken Europe's place as a leader. The Norwegian farm woman in 1947, the French newspaperman in 1948, and the west German school boy in 1949 all looked to America for leadership through the troubled waters of international confusion. They looked with searching eyes at their American visitors, wondering if there was the wisdom needed to act as world leaders. America was the country with enough power to exert some world influence.

The way it's turning out we haven't been wise enough. We are like a small girl holding a rifle while a big smart guy tries to sneak up behind and take the rifle away. We failed to provide the stimulus to our elected representatives to carry out a wise and consistent program of world leadership.

If the Korean war develops into a major conflict, then it has been too late. But if the Korean trouble is settled and we are given a pause to take another look at our world situation, America will have another chance to lead the ideological fight to a successful, peaceful conclusion, and the people of Minnesota, along with the rest of America will have a chance to unite behind a policy of wise internationalist action.

Under the Sheepskin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDGAR A. JONAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 25, 1950

Mr. JONAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following editorial from the Times-Herald, Washington, D. C., Thursday, August 24, 1950.

"UNDER THE SHEEPSKIN

We have in the United States today a state of things forecast by the late swamp-water Mussolini, Senator Huey Pierce Long, of Louisiana. Long was a shrewd exploiter of human credulity and one of his greatest talents was that of recognizing a brother from afar.

HE KNEW HIS KIND

That is why he was so quick to identify the motives and practices of F. D. Roosevelt in the presidency and to tangle with him for control of the Democratic Party, the New Deal and the economic and political vitals of the United States.

Long was not in Washington for many years. He came here with the November 1930 election. He was erased by assassination, still not to this day fully explained, on September 8, 1935, as he walked with bodyguards along a corridor of the Louisiana State capitol.

But while he was here, he devoted himself so wholeheartedly and efficiently to wrestling for power with Roosevelt that none could have regretted his passing less.

You get an insight into Long's understanding of political behavior in our time from his famous statement that "when fascism comes to the United States it will come as antifascism."

The essential character of fascism was its socialism. Indeed, its inventor, Benito Mussolini, was a Socialist Party hack in Italy who saw the necessity of switching labels in order to sell his poison to a people already onto the corrupt character of socialism, formally identified.

He did this so cleverly that an Austrian paper hanger named Hitler imitated him in Germany with fearful success, but without even concealing the source of his inspiration. "Nazi," is just a contraction of "National Socialist Party" in German.

THE NATURE OF THE BEAST

In the same year that Hitler rose to power, 1933, so did Roosevelt. In the United States as in Germany and Italy, the central idea of socialism was that government should run everything, and that whoever objected to that would get his lumps.

In Germany and Italy, the lumps were delivered simply and forthrightly at the precinct station house. In the United States, the torture was more silent and clever.

First, it was called "NRA," then, "antitrust law," which latter, under the administration of Assistant Attorney General Thurman Arnold, caused the criminal prosecution of numerous highly respected and invaluable American industrial geniuses.

In all cases, the object was the same: to make the citizen bow his neck in the presence of the flunkey sent by government to command him in his conduct and the use of his private property.

Now, you may ask wherein that differs from communism. Is not Truman denouncing Stalin in the same language that Roosevelt used on Hitler and Mussolini?

Secretary of State Acheson bristles his mustache at the Communists' "slave-labor camps." Mr. Roosevelt's pliant tool in office, Cordell Hull, used to maunder on with the same language, but lacking the stagy thunders, about the same monstrosities in Germany. The only change that need be made is to insert "Russia," where we used to read "Germany." Or "Italy." Or "Japan."

COMMUNISM COMING AS ANTI-COMMUNISM

Thus it is that the American people have absolute need to be wary of communism coming to this country under the guise of anti-communism.

Let us look well and carefully for the wolf under the sheep's skin, friends.

For what is discovered by Truman, Acheson & Co., respecting communism that has not always been so? Socialist Mussolini and Socialist Hitler looked to the United Soviet Socialist Republics of Russia in the 1920's for their handy guide to organization of human society.

They professed to be great anti-Communists, but communism was their real goal.

Now comes Truman demanding that the United States give up the last vestiges of its character, allegedly to withstand communism in Europe and Asia.

We are to accept here without murmur rising war and taxes, price control, production control, consumption control, wage control, and finally, absolute, unquestioning obedience to the dictates of men in office.

The political watchword is that we must keep America strong by screwing down ever tighter socialistic restraints on peaceful private usage of wealth.

That is the device by which masses of citizens all over the world have been persuaded in this century to hand to politicians the keys to the kingdom. None has yet safely delivered the people involved anything better than war and ruin.

Now we are getting it all here with a vengeance, as communism is thrust upon America in the disguise of anticommunism.

If Huey could see us now.

My Friend, Mary Norton

OF
HON. CHARLES R. HOWELL
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 25, 1950

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to add my bit to the many fine tributes which have been paid to our illustrious colleague, Mrs. MARY NORTON, of New Jersey. We in New Jersey have long been conscious of the fact that our entire State is honored by the outstanding representation of this great legislator. Mrs. NORTON has been for many years my personal good friend and the good friend in need of the people of New Jersey. In our State anyone with a problem knew that he could turn to Mrs. NORTON and his cause would be met with sympathetic understanding and helpful consideration. Mrs. NORTON has a rare combination of fine qualities; she has the forceful and effective determination of a great statesman, combined with the sympathetic understanding of a gracious woman. It has been an honor for me to serve in the same Congress with MARY NORTON and it is with profound regret that we now accept her decision to retire to the quiet and leisure of private life, which has been so well earned.

I wish to insert here an editorial from the Trentonian, published in Trenton, N. J., expressing the high regard in which the people of New Jersey hold MARY NORTON. The editorial follows:

FLOWERS FOR THE LIVING

Retirement of that grand old lady of Congress, Representative MARY T. NORTON, Jersey City, at the end of the current session will leave her fellow-lawmakers and attachés of the House, regardless of their political affiliations, genuinely saddened. Leaving the familiar scenes where she has worked for 26 years as an honest, courageous, and fair legislator also will tug at the heartstrings of this gracious lady now facing the sunset of a useful life.

Three Congressmen, one of them a Republican, this week paid an unscheduled tribute to Mrs. NORTON, who was moved to tears by the sincere words of those members. Representative E. E. COX, Democrat, Georgia, called her "a faithful and diligent public servant." A Republican, Representative K. M. LECOMPTE, Iowa, said, "the House has been honored by Mrs. NORTON'S long service."

An even finer tribute was offered by Representative JOHN W. MCCORMACK, Massachusetts, Democratic leader, who said Mrs. NORTON was "one of the outstanding persons of either sex that I have ever met." Surely they were deserved bouquets for one who has served her constituents well.

MARY NORTON has received many honors and some "firsts." At one time because of a committee chairmanship, she was for several years, the unofficial "mayor" of Washington, D. C.

Early in her career Mrs. NORTON was the first Democratic woman to be elected to the Hudson County Board of Freeholders. She also was the first woman in the East to be elected to Congress and the first Democrat of her sex to be elected from the entire country. She was the first woman to be appointed chairman of a House committee, the Committee of the District of Columbia.

In her own native State, Mrs. NORTON was the first woman to be elected Chairman of the Democratic State Committee. Here in Trenton, Rider College, in August 1937, awarded her an honorary degree, making her the first of her sex to be so honored by that institution.

MARY NORTON could have continued to be reelected to Congress. It is true her health has not been too good, but that did not cause her to take a "I do not choose to run" attitude. Her reasons, and we respect them, go much deeper. Republicans and Democrats alike will join in wishing her many more years of health and happiness.

The Late Frank Phillips

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DIXIE GILMER
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 25, 1950

Mr. GILMER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to pay tribute to the memory of a great Oklahoman, a genuine American, Frank Phillips, retired president of the Phillips Petroleum Co., of Bartlesville, Okla., who passed away August 23, 1950, at the age of 76.

A narrative of the rise of Frank Phillips from an obscure beginning as a farm boy, then barber and banker, to a position of fame and fortune is like the pages from a story book, and his achievements in the boom days of the flush oil fields of Oklahoma are a chapter in the saga of the oil business which has become one of the Nation's greatest industries almost entirely within his lifetime. He saw the industry advance from doodlebug and pure hunch wildcatting, with coal oil as the principal product of oil refineries, to its present position where almost every form of scientific knowledge is employed in the many phases of the industry. He knew the excitement of the gamble in buying oil leases and experienced the disappointment that comes from drilling a dry hole when the last dollar has been staked on the venture. When at last success crowned his efforts he expanded his interests to practically every oil field in the two Americas, and the Phillips Petroleum Co., which he organized, has become the world's greatest independent petroleum company, and its products are known throughout the world.

From the great wealth he accumulated he made generous philanthropic contributions to youth movements, particularly the Boy Scouts of America, in which he was greatly interested. He gave liberally of his wealth to churches of all denominations and to many Oklahoma civic organizations. He was particularly active in preserving the Indian, pioneer, and natural history of Oklahoma. The Woolaroc Museum and Wildlife Preserve at Bartlesville, founded for this purpose, is one of the show places of Oklahoma. He gave more than a million and a half dollars to the Frank Philipps Foundation, Inc., to enable it to carry out a charitable and educational program.

The great multitude, from every walk and position of life, who mourn the passing of Frank Phillips are consoled in their grief with the knowledge that his was a full life, rich in the receipt and disbursement of many blessings, and that his extensive contributions to the economic, cultural, and spiritual betterment of his fellowmen make the world a better place because of his having lived.

ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS IN BANNED UNITED STATES METAL SLIPPED TO REDS IN BRITISH PORT

A shipment of more than $100,000 worth of strategic molybdenum from the United States was transferred to a Russian ship in a British port on July 1, officials reported today.

Commerce and State Department officials said they were investigating fully to determine responsibility for transshipment of the steel-hardening material, which is banned from direct export to the Soviet Union.

A State Department official said this Government wants to make sure that this sort of thing does not happen again.

It was understood that the first report of the transshipment to reach American officials came from British sources. It could not be learned exactly how the British found out about it.

Officials said investigation so far had determined that the molybdenum cargo did not go through British customs and therefore did not require a British export license. The British ban export of such strategic materials to Russia.

The cargo was reported to have been shipped from the United States in May after an export license had been issued to an American firm, presumably to send the molybdenum to Britain. But it was reported transshipped to the Soviet vessel steamship Beloostrov in a British port on July 1.

Men For High Office Should Be Chosen for Their Ability

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, these are trying days for the democracies and the democratic system of government. The world is eagerly watching every step we take in the direction of safeguarding the principles of human dignity and free government according to the wishes of the people. At this time we must set an example to the world at large, the free nations as well as those suffering under the yoke of iron curtain dictatorships, by showing that we are practicing good government for the welfare of the people.

I am deeply concerned over the current development in the political situation in New York State where the major parties are giving undue consideration to the selection of so-called balanced tickets based on religion, national origin and geography, instead of choosing the men best fitted for office. Loyalty, ability, and character should be the criteria for high office, otherwise we lower our standards of good government. By resorting to religious or racial balancing of our political tickets we set dangerous precedents which some day may result in widespread corruption and deterioration of our true democratic system of government.

Several years ago the Democratic Party of New York State nominated HERBERT H. LEHMAN for Governor, and Irving Lehman for chief judge of the court of appeals—both of them members of the Jewish faith—and no one raised the question of a "balanced" ticket. On numerous other occasions the State ticket had two or more Irish Catholics. The Democrats won State-wide elections with an Italian on the ticket and at other times lost with one on their ticket. No one used their racial background for or against them. They were Americans who were selected on the basis of competence and unquestioned character. We should continue that practice today. That is the American and the democratic way.

The following editorial from the New York Times of August 23 is very much to the point:

THE PARTY CHAIRMAN AT WORK

Because of the sudden rush of events that adds an election of a New York City mayor to the November calendar, the chairmen of the political parties are seized with a greater responsibility than usual, it seems to us, in the naming of slates. The great majority of our citizens can take no direct part, at this preliminary stage, in choosing the candidates for major city and State offices.

The field in both major parties for the offices of governor, United States Senator, and mayor of New York seems to be fairly wide open, except as to the Republican candidate for governor and the Democratic candidate for Senator. Many possibilities are mentioned. This is all to the good. Too early a foreclosure of choice is detrimental. Delay can do no harm. It may even make its contribution to good government, which is, after all, the citizen's goal in the democratic process, whatever the politician's aim is.

The Republicans have a fresh and unexpected opportunity thrust upon them, with the withdrawal of Mayor O'Dwyer from office. We might have expected that this would be received with rejoicing. On the contrary, if we read the signs correctly, the event seems to have spread something very much like dejection. Yet this picture might be changed almost overnight, we would surmise, if the right man could be brought forward to run for mayor. There appears to be a Republican tendency to avoid alliance with the Liberal Party on the city race, and yet one need only look back at the figures of the 1949 election to be newly reminded how essential such alliance is for success against a Tammany candidate.

Newbold Morris received 570,713 votes on the Republican line at the last election; he had 373,287 on the Liberal line. Mayor O'Dwyer polled 1,266,512 as a Democrat. Vito Marcantonio of the American Labor party received 356,626 votes. It is obvious that only a fusion of the Republican, Liberal, and other independent elements can win the coming election for mayor, if the office is to be taken away from the Democratic Party, and it would appear to us to be lesson No. 1 in the political primer to look for a candidate who would encourage the Liberal Party to turn in the Republican direction. To fail to do so is to write off New York City automatically and to place a heavy liability against Republican chances for carrying the State as well.

As firm believers in the two-party political system we can only view with concern an attitude of resignation or defeatism this year that would tend to confirm New York City as almost permanently in the Democratic column. If the prospect at the moment is for only a half-hearted effort by Republicans to win the city election, it must be deplored by all those who are interested in good government. We hope that the present appearance of apathy is deceptive, and that with the final choice of a candidate and the defining of issues a constructive, two-sided contest will emerge. The independent voter would then have a real choice.

There are various aspects of the current situation that must cause concern in those whose only desire is to see fitness for the office as the criterion for choice of candidate. Among these is the frequently mentioned necessity, as the Democrats particularly seem to see it, of picking a "balanced" ticket. This means that the choice places must be nicely rationed out, to avoid hurting anybody's feelings, as to religion, race, and borough. It means that if the best three men for Governor, Senator, and mayor all happened to be of one faith, that wouldn't do at all. It means that we would have to go down into second and third best, if necessary, to be sure that Protestant, Irish Catholic, Italian Catholic, and the Jewish faith were somehow taken care of. But even that would not be enough, because Brooklyn, Manhattan, the Bronx, and Queens must also have their cut in the political pie. If this seems, to the layman, to make the game of New York politics a little complicated, the assumption is correct. There is no indication, however, that it makes for better government.

A Citizen Speaks Her Mind

OF
HON. EDWARD H. JENISON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 25, 1950

Mr. JENISON. Mr. Speaker, in these trying days it is extremely helpful for a Representative to have the benefit of the thinking of the people back home. Altogether too few of our people take the time and the trouble to express themselves by writing their Representatives It is encouraging to note the increase in the number of letters from those who are thinking seriously concerning the course their Government is taking. It has been my privilege to receive this week a communication from a constituent I know personally, who expresses with clarity a feeling typical of the reaction of many with whom I have been corresponding recently. Her views, as a housewife and as a citizen, are worthy of the attention of every Member of the House of Representatives. Under permission granted by the House, I am including the text of her letter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It reads as follows:

AUGUST 18, 1950.

Hon. EDWARD H. JENISON,
Paris, Ill.

DEAR MR. JENISON: I know that you are only one of the many lawmakers we have at Washington, but since you are from our own fair city, I would like to express my views about the excessive amount of spending that is going on in Washington. I know that it requires a lot of money to operate a Government such as ours, but I cannot help but feel that it should be operated on the same basis that we as individuals have to use to balance our budgets. We cannot just go out and secure extra money for the things we all want but are not within our reach, and I do not feel that our Government should do this either.

I hope the time will come, in the very near future, that when a vacancy occurs among the Federal civilian employees, that, if at all possible, someone else take over some of the duties of that person, and start eliminating as many as possible of these jobs.

I also hope that something can be done about a reorganization of our postal system.

I would like to live to see the time that Government employees will receive only 2 weeks vacation with pay, and their sick leave with pay be eliminated, like the majority of the average American family have to do.

I know that you agree wholeheartedly with me that the United States Government should live within its means, just as we all try to do. I realize all of the benefits they are trying to make available to us would be grand, but if we cannot afford them, let's just pass them by.

Anything that you might say or do in Washington to promote these views of mine would be greatly appreciated.

Cordially,

LOUISE SPROULS (Mrs. D. L.).

Bethlehem Is Opposed to Internationalization of Jerusalem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I believe that many of my colleagues will be very much interested in reading an account of present conditions in the ancient city of Bethlehem, the cradle of Christianity, and the current thinking of its inhabitants. This account was published in the Christian Science Monitor of July 29, 1950.

Several points stand out in this report from Bethlehem: First, that its people are opposed to internationalization of Jerusalem and the immediate vicinity, including Bethlehem; second, that the people of this ancient city realize that they cannot survive economically if they are separated from Israel and from the Jordan hinterland; third; that as Christians they seem to feel closer to Israel upon whom they depend for straightforward news of the world, for their electric current and other needs. The problem of Jerusalem's future is scheduled to come up before the United Nations Assembly meeting in September. Delegates of the various member-nations should be informed of the Bethlehem situation, as well as other considerations, and should reject outright all internationalization schemes for the Jerusalem area.

The article from the Christian Science Monitor of July 29, 1950, is as follows:

BEWILDERED BETHLEHEM GROPES FOR A LEAD

(By Ray Alan)

BETHLEHEM.—Alongside the main Jerusalem-Bethlehem highway stand notices in red Hebrew characters before which Biblical travelers along this ancient route would have shaken their heads in bewilderment. The austere elegant script is older than Christendom—its idiom distressingly twentieth century: Danger minefields.

The Israel Army lifted most of the mines last December to allow Christians to make their annual pilgrimage to the Saviour's birthplace, but it is still unwise to stray into the gardens and olive groves bordering the route.

Israel holds the first 3 miles of the road and King Abdullah's Arab Legion the remaining five as well as Bethlehem itself. The town's normal contact with Arab-held Old Jerusalem and the rest of Abdullah's kingdom is now by way of a rough emergency road.

Five times as long as the main road, it passes through wild country in which armed hold-ups are frequent, especially at night. Some of the bandits are former Arab League mercenaries and pro-Mufti irregulars abandoned, since their defeat, by their commander, Fawzi el-Kawukji, who is now enjoying considerable, if somewhat mysterious, wealth in Damascus. Others are refugees and local peasants, resentful, in their poverty, of the opulence of the Jordan merchants and officials who flash daily along the road in glittering American cars.

The farmers of eastern Palestine and Jordan have suffered almost as much as the refugees from their leaders' war on Israel, since they are now unable to export their produce to Jewish New Jerusalem and the coastal towns.

Like every other Arab town in Palestine, Bethlehem has its share of depression, lawlessness and refugees; yet, somehow, it stands out, as ever, different from the rest. Its unique significance seems to have blessed both place and people with a happy individuality.

Ninety percent of its 12,000 permanent inhabitants are Christians. Its mayor is the only Christian mayor in the country. A major part of the town's revenue comes from emigrants in America and, in normal times, Christian tourists. Its women are among the most nearly emancipated in the Arab lands.

"By a strange chance," wrote Kinglake, over a century ago, "alone of all places in the land this Bethlehem escaped the moral yoke of the Mussulmans and heard again, after centuries of dull oppression, the cheering clatter of social freedom and the voices of laughing girls. * * *"

There is less laughter in the town today and some Bethlehemites fear that with King Abdullah the Mussulman yoke may return. But Bethlehem has preserved its individuality by losing its traditional status as a political backwater.

The Egyptians were the first to occupy the town after the British withdrawal in May 1948, but when the Jews defeated the Egyptian army, the Egyptian area commander, Wakid Bey, informed the mayor of Bethlehem off the record that his troops could not be relied upon to maintain order.

Mayor Issa (Jesus) Bandak, although hitherto anti-Abdullah, went at once to the Jordan monarch's winter palace at Shuneh and invited him to take over Bethlehem. Arab legion troops poured into the town the following morning. After months of bickering, that reached its climax when Egyptian bombs were dropped near Abdullah's winter palace, the Egyptians were frozen out of Bethlehem.

Consequently, both Egyptian and Arab League circles are hostile to Mayor Bandak; his life has been threatened. But the townsfolk give him credit for taking Christ's birthplace out of the war. King Abdullah has shown his appreciation by overlooking the mayor's political past and by entrusting him with missions to Rome and Athens aimed at persuading the Vatican and the Greek-Orthodox hierarchy to oppose internationalization of Jerusalem.

Mr. Bandak's negotiations were not completed until after the United Nations vote on Jerusalem had been taken. He found the Vatican cautious but not unwilling to negotiate with Abdullah if events at UN did not go according to plan. In Greece, on the other hand, Mr. Bandak succeeded in persuading both Foreign Minister Tsaldaris and Archbishop Spiridon to reverse their support of internationalization at the earliest opportunity.

The townsfolk appear to have been won over to his and the King's views, though many of them admit their dislike of Abdullah and their distaste at being governed from that dirty village, Amman, Jordan's capital. Ideally, the Christian population of Bethlehem would like to see the town administered directly by some western power, preferably France—popular mainly as a result of the activities of the French hospital and charitable missions there—or the United States. Britain is not yet forgiven for abandoning the country to chaos and war.

But the Christians realize that economically Bethlehem could never survive separation from the Israel coastal plain and the Jordan hinterland, a compelling argument against internationalization, too. Union with Jordan appears, therefore, the only path open, though Arab League and Communist sympathizers unite in explaining to the cafe crowds that this is equivalent to a return to British rule.

There are now 12,000 refugees in Bethlehem, not all from battle zones. Many are Hebronites who have transferred their entire households, afraid the Jews may one day attack their district and take reprisals for the hideous 1929 pogrom there which destroyed one of the oldest Jewish communities in Palestine.

The poor of Bethlehem are angry that they too are not eligible for relief, but there have been no incidents such as I have witnessed in Lebanon where Red Cross stores have been attacked and supplies stolen by local villagers. The wealthy of the town are still wealthy, their main annoyance being the lack of electric lighting: The power came from Jerusalem. The Israel authorities are willing to "export" current to Jordan-held areas, but Arab peasants and merchants have cut down all the power cables for sale as fencing, and in a dozen different roles.

From dawn to dusk cafes are packed with idle crowds of men playing "triktrak" to while away the hours between news bulletins from every medium-wave radio station within reach. Cairo, Damascus, and Jordan-controlled Ramalla (the former mandatory broadcasting service) spend much of their time abusing and contradicting each other, and Bethlehemites say they often have to rely on Israel's powerful Arabic service to straighten out their impressions of the news.

The visitor who comes here to ask these people their views is himself surrounded by questioners. The bewildered hordes around the loudspeakers seem, vaguely, to be groping for a lead—without knowing where to look.

Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me by the House, I present for insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a newspaper release prepared by the Bureau of Labor Statistics in the United States Department of Labor titled "One Hundred and Forty-four Thousand New Dwelling Units Started in July":

July was the best home-building month in history, according to the United States Labor Department's Bureau of Labor Statistics. Preliminary BLS estimates indicate that 144,000 new permanent nonfarm dwelling units were started in July, bringing the total for the first 7 months of 1950 to almost 839,000. Each month this year home builders have broken records for comparable months of previous years. By the end of July new housing activity was 54 percent above last year's January-July volume, as measured by new dwelling units begun.

Included in the first 7 months' total for 1950 are 13,100 publicly owned dwelling units. For the same period in 1949, public housing totaled 25,800 units.

Complete reports for April boosted the figure for that month to 133,400, a gain of 7,400 over the Bureau's preliminary estimate. Although rental housing (units in two-or-more family structures) showed a gain of 32 percent when the first 4 months of 1949 and 1950 are compared, the 1950 volume of single-family starts was greater by 68 percent.

Reports from the Bureau's regional offices indicate that the housing boom has been sustained in part by builders' efforts to get scheduled construction under way before any further rise in prices and before pressure on building materials supply becomes more severe. The immediate impact is increased housing starts. The delayed effect may be a more-than-seasonal downtrend in later months of the year. Despite peak production of building materials, price indexes have been climbing steadily. Lumber prices reached an all-time high in June, pushing the wholesale price index of all building materials to 202.2, 6 percent above the June 1949 figure. By August 8 the wholesale price index of all building materials had risen to 212.7.

On the basis of preliminary reports of local building permits issued during July for new residential construction, some leveling off appeared in the western and most northern sections of the country. However, substantial gains occurred in southern regions. Among the cities showing marked increases in the number of new dwelling units authorized were San Diego, Calif.; Miami Beach, Fla.; New Orleans and Shreveport, La.; Tulsa, Okla.; and Memphis, Tenn.

Brooklyn Boy Awarded Highest Honors in Korean War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 25, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, Brooklyn is very proud these days of its newest war hero, Pfc Marvin Koppelman. This lad was recently awarded the Silver Star for knocking out two enemy roadblocks in the Korean fighting, and he has now been cited a second time with an oak leaf cluster for another act of bravery against the North Korean Communists. These are the highest honors yet to be awarded in the Korean war.

I am particularly proud that a boy from my home borough has proven himself to be such a gallant fighter for democracy. Those who are prone to reach hasty conclusions regarding the merits or demerits of so-called minority groups, who together make up the entire population of this country, should realize that these boys know what they are fighting for. There are many more like him on the fields of battle.

I urge all my colleagues to read the following editorial from the Brooklyn Daily Eagle of August 24, 1950:

A BROOKLYN WAR HERO

Brooklyn may well be proud of another of its sons whose fighting courage and high determination in the face of overwhelming odds have brought honor to himself, the United States Army, and his native borough. Although only a private first class, Bazookaman Marvin Koppelman has already won the Silver Star, highest honor yet awarded in the Korean war, and, further, has been cited for an oak leaf cluster, by which the Army signifies a second award of that high honor.

Private First Class Koppleman, whose home is at 513 Christopher Avenue, won his first Silver Star for knocking out two enemy roadblocks with a light bazooka. Now he has been cited for the second award for equally effective and even more daring action. His unit almost overrun, he took a 3.5 rocket launcher and held off the enemy until his comrades pulled out. Knocked down a mountainside by a mortar explosion, he recovered in time to lead the men of a surrounded battery to an ambulance which he drove to safety despite heavy machine-gun fire.

Men like Marvin Koppelman, unconquerable even in the face of overpowering attack, have kept this country's democracy safe in the past. Now they are proving again that while a dictator's slave soldiers may win the first battles, they can't win the final, all-important one.

Fat Fees to Lobbyists Contingent on Passage of Certain Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK BUCHANAN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 26, 1950

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities, of which I am chairman, has just mailed to all Members of Congress copies of part 3 of our hearings entitled "Contingent Fee Lobbying."

In contrast to the 1,411-page volume we issued recently on the housing lobby—a virtual encyclopedia of organizations, methods, techniques and financing involved in the effort to influence Congress on housing, rent control and related legislation—our printed record on Contingent Fee Lobbying is quite tiny, only 39 pages.

It is, nevertheless, a most valuable document from the standpoint of the morals and ethics of this particular lobbying practice, and some of the material it contains will, I believe, come as a surprise to some Members of Congress.

CONTINGENT FEES INVOLVE PRIVATE REWARDS FOR CONGRESSIONAL DECISIONS

There are more than 2,000 registered lobbyists, not all of them active in each quarter, but most of them take a continuing interest in legislative issues involving their employers. Most of them work on a salary basis, or on a retainer, in the case of lawyers. For many, if not most, of them, lobbying is just one of several duties. It may be their most important duty, but if they are officials of trade associations or of unions or of other organizations having representation down here, they are not engaged exclusively in lobbying activity. They are paid according to their value to the organization, or by some such standards, and they receive, generally speaking, the same income whether the legislation they support is enacted into law or not. Of course if they roll up a good record of success in getting their proposals enacted, I imagine their salary or retainer would rise accordingly.

However, a lobbyist working on a contingent arrangement has an altogether different situation. A contingent fee is one based upon the lobbyist's effectiveness in having a course of action adopted by Congress.

We are all familiar with these arrangements where they involve private claims against the Government. Every private bill which is introduced carries a clause to the effect that no more than 10 percent of the award of money made by the bill shall be paid to any lawyer or agent for services in having the legislation prepared, introduced and passed. So that kind of fee is recognized in all claim cases and when we pass a private bill making an award of money we know that up to 10 percent of that award will go, probably, to an attorney.

It is on public bills, public laws, involving questions of national policy, where contingent fees may be dangerous. Usually they are not generally known about by Members of Congress in voting on the legislation involved.

Under those circumstances it will frequently come as a surprise to a Member of Congress to learn that his vote in favor of a particular bill has resulted in the payment to a contingent fee lobbyist of a fat fee.

SOME EXAMPLES OF CONTINGENT FEES

For instance, in connection with the excise tax bill passed earlier this year by the House, there is a provision exempting reconditioned, repaired and rebuilt automotive parts from the 5 percent excise tax. This amendment was proposed by the Committee To Remove Discriminatory Automotive Excise Tax. This committee has as its registered lobbyist a Chicago attorney, Mr. Harold T. Halfpenny. When he registered as a lobbyist on April 14, 1949, he said his fee, including expenses, would not exceed 10 percent of the actual tax paid for this purpose during 1947, and that he would receive this fee if the tax on reconditioned, repaired, and rebuilt automotive parts were removed. Passage of the act, as approved by the House of Representatives, could, it is estimated, bring Mr. Halfpenny a total fee of as much as a half million dollars.

The Twenty Percent Cabaret Tax Committee has a lobbyist registered as their agent, one Samuel P. Haines. He received a retainer of $10,000 when he was engaged early in 1948. He was also given an expense allowance of $15,000 for the purpose of helping him call to the attention of Congress the need for reduction or repeal of the 20 percent tax on cabarets or dine and dance establishments. The moment a bill was introduced to repeal or reduce this tax, Mr. Haines was to receive an additional $25,000 for expenses. He has thus received altogether about $50,000.

If the tax were reduced from 20 to 10 percent, Mr. Haines would be paid a bonus of $35,000. If the tax were reduced to the prewar level of 5 percent, Mr. Haines' fee would be $50,000 instead of $35,000, making a total return to him of $100,000.

The national fur industry tax committee engaged Mr. Paul A. O'Bryan as its Washington representative during most of 1949. He was paid an annual retainer fee of $12,000. However, if the 20-percent excise tax on furs were reduced 10 percent, he was to receive a bonus of $10,000, and if the tax were removed entirely, his bonus would be $25,000 rather than $10,000.

The associated fur coat and trimming manufacturers engaged Mr. Thomas J. Downs as a lobbyist in the Eightieth Congress. He was to be paid $10,000 as a retainer as Washington counsel on all matters affecting the fur industry plus a fee of $15,000 in the event the excise tax on furs were cut from 20 percent to 10 percent. If the entire tax on furs were repealed, and if this were done on or before July 1, 1948, he would have received an additional fee of $25,000.

There is pending now before the Congress a bill to limit the number of taxicabs in Washington. A Baltimore judge, Joseph M. Wyatt, was engaged by about seven different cab companies in Washington to represent them in having this bill passed. Judge Wyatt was advanced $1,500 for expenses. If the bill to limit the number of taxicabs in Washington is enacted, Judge Wyatt will thereupon receive a fee of $16,000.

ARE ARRANGEMENTS OF THIS SORT IN THE PUBLIC INTEREST?

There is nothing illegal under present law about any of the arrangements cited above. In conformance with the provisions of the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act, these and similar contingent fee lobbying contracts have been reported to the Clerk of the House. Presumably all of the committees of Congress dealing with legislation in which these lobbyists were interested knew of these contingent fee arrangements. I say presumably, because that is the theory of the Lobbying Act— that is, the act requires that these arrangements with lobbyists be reported to Congress and the presumption is that Congress would inform itself about them from the public records. Actually, however, I do not believe that these arrangements were generally known by the committees handling the legislation.

For instance, following a hearing by the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities on May 18 1950, on the subject of contingent fees for lobbyists, the House Ways and Means Committee on June 2 reversed an earlier action and rewrote the excise tax bill. This action, if ratified by the Congress, would deny Samuel P. Haines the bonus for which he had been working for several years.

Haines appeared before us at our hearing on May 18 and the deal under which he was to receive either $35,000 or $50,000 as a bonus, depending upon whether the excise tax on cabaret bills was reduced to 10 or to 5 percent, was widely publicized. This arrangement had been written up before and presumably was well known—particularly since Haines himself had reported it to the Clerk of the House earlier in 1948—but after our hearing on this matter, many Members of Congress expressed amazement and concern over the Haines contract. The House Ways and Means Committee had already voted to reduce the cabaret tax from 20 to 10 percent. This would have meant a $35,000 fee to Haines if the bill had become law in that form. However, at its meeting on June 2 the Ways and Means Committee reconsidered its action on the cabaret tax and voted to make it 15 percent. Haines thus would get no bonus.

I am not prepared to say or to claim that our publicizing of Haines fee arrangement was the major factor in persuading the Ways and Means Committee to revise this section of the excise-tax bill and make the tax 15 percent instead of 10 percent. But I do believe and I am personally convinced that the action of the House Ways and Means Committee was influenced by a reluctance on the part of the members of the Ways and Means Committee to follow a course of action which would automatically result in the collection of a fat contingent fee by a lobbyist.

THE DANGERS INVOLVED IN CONTINGENT FEES

A lobbyist whose pay depends upon delivery by Congress of a specific legislative proposal certainly has an incentive to go to any lengths to earn his fee. Lobbying in America today is not, generally speaking, the sinister and corrupt force it used to be. It cannot succeed through bribery. We know that. We know that the Congress of the United States cannot be purchased. But a lot of people, Mr. Speaker, do not know that. Finding it sometimes fairly easy to bribe some local officials, some of our citizens mistakenly have the idea that politics and government in the United States rest on the same corrupt principles as we know they have in some other countries. Even some otherwise intelligent businessmen in America believe that money strategically used can buy legislative or governmental decisions. Wherever that has occurred it has been truly scandalous because it is so rare.

But when a lobbyist is engaged to seek to influence congressional action, and when he offers to make his fee contingent upon the successful carrying out of his assignment—that is the passage of the law—and where the fee is sizable and the expense is sizable, the employer of that lobbyist would, I am almost certain, be under the impression that money talks in lobbying as it does in so many things.

Now as a matter of fact, the Congress of the United States passes the laws it does because a majority of the Members of that Congress sincerely believe that those laws are in the public interest.

We know that, but a surprisingly large number of Americans do not know it. Therefore, when lobbyists receive fat fees resulting from the passage of certain legislation the inference must be for a great many Americans that the lobbyist is being paid for using his influence on Members of Congress or perhaps even for bribing Members of Congress. It is a bad thing, I believe, for lobbying to have this taint. It is bad in a representative form of government for the Congress to be under the unjustified suspicions resulting from this kind of lobbying arrangement.

It is my own personal feeling that contingent fee arrangements for lobbyists should be prohibited.

MOST STATES WITH LOBBYING LAWS PROHIBIT CONTINGENT FEES

In our volume on contingent fee lobbying which has been distributed to the Members of Congress appears the verbatim provisions of all State laws prohibiting contingent fee lobbying. There are 21 such States. The printed hearings also contain a great deal of legal background on the issue, much of it supplied by the Legislative Reference Service. I think all of this material can be most useful to us.

Mr. Haines, the contingent-fee lobbyist for the Twenty Percent Cabaret Tax Committee, testifying in defense of the contract under which he has been working, made an interesting point which may be quite valid, even though I personally believe contingent fee arrangements should be prohibited in lobbying.

He said, on page 15 of our printed hearings:

I would say that if the law strictly prohibited a contingency fee it probably would be done on the side anyway and the Government would never know about it; but where it is completely disclosed, and where the people have nothing to hide, operating for a committee such as I am operating for, a very legitimate business, for people all across the country, the committee would stand, and the Congress would stand, to find out more about the operations of a lobby if they permitted a contingency, but required that it be filed in detail, such as we have done.

Mr. Haines may possibly be right. With all of the State statutory provisions against contingency fee lobbying, the fact remains that there have been very, very few prosecutions and convictions under these State acts. I think Mr. Haines and the other lobbyists who acknowledge their contingent fee arrangements when they registered were very forthright and aboveboard in doing so. I think our reporting form should perhaps be revised to ask specifically about contingent fees.

But in any event, whether these fees are prohibited or not, I think it is obvious to the Congress that such fees have their dangers. I don't think the Congress likes to be put in the position of having someone collect a fat fee as a result of a congressional decision. Congress acts in its wisdom and in its judgment, and it is poor policy, it is damaging to the prestige of representative Government, to have lobbyists collect on the basis of that judgment. Frequently the lobbyist who receives a contingent fee might have been totally lacking in any influence upon the Congress; he may have had absolutely nothing to do with persuading Congress to take a particular step. But when he collects his fee his employer may not know that; his employer may believe that the large sums of money paid to this lobbyist may actually have been the factors involved in the decision made by Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I commend to the attention of Members of the Congress this hearing booklet we have issued entitled "Contingent Fee Lobbying," which is part 3 of the hearings of the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities.

Spoon-Feeding Europe

OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 26, 1950

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Sunday Oregonian of August 6, 1950:

SPOON-FEEDING EUROPE

This is to accuse the administration of having permitted the American people to drift into a position of greater jeopardy than they ever before have known.

It is not new for America to be in danger. Our people could have suffered defeat in the Revolutionary War, the War of 1812, or either World War. They could have been fragmented by the Civil War. But no fundamentally comparable hazard has existed in these past troubles—not even in World War II. In the past there always have been modifying conditions. We have been too remote for ultimate conquest, and until World War II our opponents were never so far away from our thinking that we were compelled to look on defeat as identical with cultural annihilation.

Now, however, science and human organization have made war truly universal. And this coincides with the rise of Russia as the challenging force—a country which would restore all of civilization to dictatorship and which disavows the Christian principles of decency—which looks on the individual as a lost dot in the formation of the state, with the state devoted to those who operate it.

If it can be agreed that the penalties of defeat would be far beyond anything they ever could have been in the past, let us examine our proposition that we have been allowed to drift into a situation where we could suffer these penalties.

Most important of all—and little observed—is the fact that the great powers of west-European civilization—France, Britain, Germany, Italy, and latterly Japan—have now virtually washed their hands of responsibility for world developments.

This of course is readily recognizable in regard to Germany, Japan, and Italy, where the tentative peace conditions fix the picture. But few people seem to have observed the degree to which Britain and France have abandoned their roles in history. France makes no pretense whatever of having military forces capable of importance in the military future of Europe—an astonishing situation for the land of Napoleon. And we should not blind ourselves to the reality that Britain under socialism is making convenient use of pacifism. It costs less to be pacifistic, and a domestic program is involved. Britain is definitely doing the minimum in regard to the Korean war and in regard to the defense of Europe.

So here we are. The great and decisive nations of the history books have abandoned the field to an America which did not want the responsibility in the first place and which is miserably unprepared for it.

What are we doing with the responsibility? And that is where the pinch comes. This page feels that except for the Marshall plan—a plan which itself was more or less accidental—the administration of our country has fallen tragically short of meeting the problems which confront it. The Communist sweep of China and the threatened debacle in Korea have forced us to face our failure in Asia, but we are still generally unaware of how exposed we are in Europe.

Consider this from the London Times of a few days ago:

"The message given in the House of Commons by both the Defense Minister, Mr. Shinwell, and Mr. Churchill, was that, apart from the atom bomb, western Europe has almost no immediate defense against Russian attack. The only time left to the west is that between now and the moment when the aggressor may himself have large numbers of atom bombs."

The purpose is to emphasize this recognition by Europe's best-informed and most influential newspaper that, from the practical standpoint, the formerly great powers of western Europe have done little to prepare against the ground threat of Russia. And of course the American occupational forces in Germany are little more than a token force.

It boils down to the reality that western Europe lies virtually helpless before the huge Russian armies of Russia, if these can operate without destruction by American atomic bombs.

That is a situation which is ridiculously unfair and which those directing our country never should have permitted. The United States does not owe prosperity to western Europe so much as western Europe owes military service to our common future. France, for example, is quite capable of again becoming a great military power, equal or even superior to the Russians. What did it lose in the late war except moral stamina? Yet here we have the factual picture of formerly decisive France relinquishing western Europe to whichever opposing force may happen to get there first with the most.

Probably the accurate answer is that a moral sickness lies on western Europe. The frustrations of the two World Wars, and the shift of power from France, Germany, and Britain to the United States and Russia, have created an atmosphere which one cannot judge by reading history.

Western Europe remains the center of much of the earth's material resources, and its trained manpower. But western Europe seems to have lost its will power. It is just taking what comes.

And in the face of this most complicated world problem, we have a not-too-smart American administration trying to get along.

Obviously, it hasn't done too well. The dimensions of its failures in Asia remain to be written. China was lost; and in Korea, whether or not our troops are driven from the peninsula, our humiliation has been extreme. In the rest of the continent the Communists are certainly on the offensive. And in Europe, where the final test is likely, we have got ourselves into a decidedly thin situation, with little help from the formerly important states. These now leave it all up to us.

Under the circumstances, this page can only suggest that the administration reform itself, and soon. Overnight, perhaps.

The United States has been expending and exhausting its resources to rebuild the Western World. Let the Western World begin some sacrifices of its own to protect what we are trying to build for them. There is one thing certain, that we do not have the manpower to police the earth.

Resolution of Mature Americans, Inc.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. USHER L. BURDICK
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 26, 1950

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present herewith a resolution passed by Mature Americans, Inc., of Washington, D. C. This organization has for its purpose the insuring of greater economic, physical, psychological, and social security for retired men and women, and the conservation of their capabilities, intelligence, and judgment. This organization is trying to break down the barrier of age that excludes many able Americans from obtaining employment. Today, after the age of 60, an applicant finds all employment books closed to him.

The fact remains that there are literally thousands of people beyond the age of 60 who could fill many necessary positions as well as they ever could, and an artificial limit to age is a pretty hard blow to the 17,000,000 people in the United States over the age of 60. All of them are voters and it is evident that this organization of Mature Americans is not speaking for a limited few but an almost overwhelming body of the voters in this country.

In this resolution the Mature Americans are merely asking Congress to take into consideration the ever-changing costs of living that make inadequate tomorrow the funds which help them exist today. If the whole business world wants to cast from work all citizens who have reached the age of 60, the Federal, State, and municipal governments have a much greater burden to bear. I am glad to include this resolution with my remarks and I intend to follow it up with continued efforts to bring justice to the aged of this country. They not only have the right to life but to live above a condition of beggary. The resolution follows:

Whereas world conditions indicate that the American people are face to face with a situation which will cause a sharp new spiral of commodity price increases which will raise the cost of living in America; and

Whereas it is recognized by all authorities that payments to the aged and unemployed under the present and currently proposed social-security laws are woefully inadequate for healthful and dignified living: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States is urged to amend the social-security laws to the end that payments in the future, under the law, be tied to the cost-of-living index of the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor of the United States Government, or to some other designated, flexible index, so that as the prices of the necessities of living increase during the years to come the beneficiaries of this act shall be assured of at least that minimum of financial assistance which it was intended they should have by the Congress when the law was given approval. It is further resolved that copies of this resolution be put into the hands of all Members of Congress of the United States, to the press, and that it be reproduced in the next issue of the bulletin issued by Mature Americans, Inc.

Resolved unanimously by the officers and members of Chapter No. 1, Mature Americans, Inc., at a regular meeting of the organization in the District of Columbia, August 3, 1950.

President.

Letter of Art Watson, of White Sulphur Springs, Mont.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WESLEY A. D'EWART
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 26, 1950

Mr. D'EWART. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a letter to the editor of the Meagher County News, White Sulphur Springs, Mont., by Mr. Art Watson, a cattle rancher of that town whom I have known as a friend for many years.

Mr. Watson's letter attracted so much favorable comment that it has been reprinted in pamphlet form by the editor of the newspaper, Mr. Fred Ward, and has received wide circulation in Montana.

The letter follows:

DEAR FRED: Many times you and I have gone across the street and, over a cup of coffee, cussed and discussed conditions of the Nation, State, and politics. Again, with 1,250 miles between us, and minus the coffee, I want to talk with you.

I am fast becoming a man without a party. A study of the deceptionist spineless Democrats and gutless go-along Republicans leaves them no attraction for me. That leaves only the Communists. One outstanding feature of the Communists is, we know what they are trying to do. Their avowed objective is the destruction of our way of life and form of government. While the Democrats and the Republicans are preaching democracy and freedom they are in reality marching us into socialism, communism, or what have you, faster than "Good Old Joe" or the "Ghost of Lenin" ever dreamed it could be done.

When government sinks to the low level of taking the majority of your money away from you, then offers you half of it back in exchange for your vote, then takes half of that back in order to complete the vicious circle, I am wondering what a definition of communism that would emanate from Washington could read like.

Workers are docked a percentage of their wages for a social-security fund and the deception that is held out to him is a life of ease with plenty in his or her old age. If you attain old age (65) you have a meager income that would not buy your soup, but wait a minute. The reward is only for those in a bee colony who would be called the drones. If you still have some pride and a little ambition and through a combination of both earn over $14.99 per month, you are a plutocrat and not entitled to any compensation. Now, what becomes of this enormous social-security fund? Is it set aside for God's chosen people who can qualify for it? Oh, no! It is dumped into the general slush fund and used for any one of the million legerdemain, financial schemes that have become so numerous and complex that even the eagle on a dollar, after 1 hour of circulation through the New Deal, Fair Deal, vote buying, sausage grinding machine, never again finds its nest.

Instead of the money being left in the social security till, it is thus pilfered out and a bond inserted in lieu thereof. I am informed that we have commitments for over $8,000,000,000 against this fund and slightly over sixty million with which to meet it. Oh, well! That's easy. Under this sleight-of-hand financing we'll just write another check and throw in another bond. Another headache for our posterity if they aren't bled to death before birth.

A party told me the other day that he thought the Brannan plan for agriculture was the most workable and simple plan yet devised. I told him I agreed as to the simple part, but what amazed me was to think we had anybody in our midst who could be so simple as to think it up.

We are told that the budget must be over $40,000,000,000 per year, mostly on account of national defense. Yet our bigwigs tell us and continually warn us that we are wholly unprepared. Have we become so simple that we dare not know the truth? It appears that little effort is being made to keep the Russians from knowing the facts, so why is it so necessary for us to remain in ignorance? I'll admit that ignorance is of vast importance if we are going to stand on the deck smiling while the ship sinks.

I am afraid, Fred, that I will be labeled a reactionary. I am somewhat hazy as to the meaning of that word. Is a man a reactionary who believes in the Constitution and the Bill of Rights? Who believes in free enterprise and the principle that the majority of the fruits of a man's labor belongs to him? Who believes in a government of the people and not a people of the government? Who believes that the principle of charity to your more unfortunate neighbor is your inherent responsibility and cannot be usurped by government without serious injury to the concept and standard of Americanism?

Who believes that the officers of government are servants of the people and not their dictators? Who believes that anyone or any group who advocates the overthrow or abolition of our way of life is a traitor and should be so dealt with?

Who believes that deception by legislation is the greatest type of anarchy? Who believes that children should be taught from the cradle that the right to vote and the duty of guarding that right and the duty of exercising it is the guardian angel of freedom?

Who believes that man prospers by the sweat of his brow and not by the decadent dust of his idleness? Who believes that economic stability of our Nation is vastly more important than the political expediency of our party?

If a firm belief in the return to these principles brands me a reactionary, then I am proud to be the greatest reactionary of our time.

May God Almighty in His infinite wisdom awaken the American people to what is being done to them.

Sincerely,

ART WATSON.

EDITOR'S NOTE.—This letter written by Art Watson, a cattle rancher in the lower valley of Smith River in Meagher County, has created wide interest. Many calls have come in for copies of the issue of the Meagher County News of March 29 which cannot be supplied. For that reason the letter is reprinted in pamphlet form, in the hope that its thoughtful message may reach a wider circle than the limited circulation of this country newspaper.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, the people of the country are very much aroused and concerned over what is going on in Korea. Call it what we will, it is war, and our military is doing its utmost to carry out the policy of the administration.

The average citizen does not know what that policy is; in fact, I doubt if there is anyone in the Congress who can succinctly state what the administration's foreign policy in the Far East has been and is at the moment. In these circumstances, politics should not be charged every time a question is asked or a criticism is offered of so vague a thing as our foreign policy.

Mr. Speaker, my attention has been called to an editorial in the Adrian (Mich.) Daily Telegram which is well worth reading. This is an independent newspaper and certainly cannot be accused of Republican partisanship. The editorial reads as follows:

DEMOCRACY AT WORK

Before the four active Republicans of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee issued their manifesto, it was evident that American foreign policy toward Asia was apt to be an issue in the congressional election campaign. The manifesto made foreign policy the major campaign issue. For the statement of the four Republicans, approved by Senator VANDENBERG, who was unable to be present, holds the administration responsible for having left the way open for Communist forces to invade South Korea.

With America fighting a war and needing to present a united front, there is a natural disposition to deplore a partisan battle over foreign policy. This disposition is the stronger because so much has been said and written these last few years about bipartisanship in foreign affairs. But the Republican statement cites the United Nations, the Greek-Turkish aid program, the Marshall plan, and the North Atlantic Pact as achievements of strong bipartisan leadership and cooperation. It contrasts these achievements with what has happened in China, Korea, and elsewhere in Asia. There, it declares, the policy followed has been purely administration policy.

Sharp retorts have come from the Democratic side. Senator TOM CONNALLY, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, declared the Republicans are making a "petty-fogging attack." Senator MCMAHON says they are trying to get votes by claiming a share of the credit where policies have succeeded, and disavowing responsibility where policies have failed.

But the Democrats cannot brush aside the fact that foreign policy toward Asia is strictly a Democratic product. Only for Europe has American foreign policy been a bipartisan product. The administration has reserved for itself the making and carrying out of American policy toward the Far East.

Three years ago Senator VANDENBERG declared that bipartisanship in foreign affairs was confined to quite narrow limits. He declared that it applied to the United Nations and to the peace treaties in Europe. Then he added, "I have had nothing to do with China policies, or Pan-American policies, except within the United Nations." And in subsequent statements he made clear his position that the Republicans could not be held responsible for far eastern policies because the Democrats had refused to permit them to share the responsibility for drafting them.

America's policy toward Asia has never been bipartisan. Therefore, there is no break with the concept of bipartisanship in what the four Republicans on the Foreign Relations Committee have said. As a matter of fact, President Truman in the 1948 campaign minimized the Republican contribution to foreign policy. He proceeded to break off bipartisanship almost as soon as the election returns were in. Meanwhile things went from bad to worse in China. Early this year the President began trying to bring about more bipartisanship. John Foster Dulles was brought into the State Department. But the administration moves were late and too little. They left the uncomfortable feeling that they were dictated not by statesmanship but by partisan political reasons.

They were the moves of a politician of the ward level, not those of a world statesman. Mr. Truman owes his political career to the fact the he was elected to the Senate by the help of a political machine efficient in ward-level politics. Thus we have as President a politician of obscure qualities in a position that requires vision, leadership and a vast degree of selflessness.

To what extent our far eastern policies might have been different if the Republicans had helped to fashion them nobody can say. But certainly they would have been different. For with both parties fashioning them they would have been examined critically. But this was not done. Now the policies will be debated in a congressional campaign.

This can lead to highly constructive results. The chief defect in our far eastern policy has been that it was never clearly defined. It has been negative in character, twisted and changed to counter new developments. It is not too late to salvage something from the mistakes and errors. But this can only be done if the country is fully informed as to where the policy was weak and why.

Only by locating and appraising the errors of the past, can responsibility be fixed, public opinion informed and a sound course chartered for the future. Thus in the debate we shall have an outstanding example of American democracy at work.

Hon. J. Hardin Peterson, of Florida

OF
HON. JOHN SANBORN OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 26, 1950

Mr. SANBORN. Mr. Speaker, I was unable to be present when my colleagues joined in tribute on the floor of the House to the Honorable J. HARDIN PETERSON, of Florida, who is retiring. It has been my happy privilege to serve on the Committee on Public Lands with Mr. PETERSON since coming to the Congress. I most heartily wish to join with my colleagues on the committee and in the House in expressing admiration for Mr. PETERSON and in voicing appreciation of his outstanding record as a Member of Congress and a member of the Public Lands Committee and especially as the efficient and accommodating chairman of that committee.

Although I can appreciate his viewpoint and I realize that he has earned the right to retire and be closer to his family than is possible here, I regret very keenly his leaving his activities here. It is men like J. HARDIN PETERSON that our country cannot afford to lose when statesmanship is so needed in Congress. He has made a great chairman of the Public Lands Committee. He has been patient, considerate, understanding, and always helpful. Although the Public Lands Committee handled a great number of bills, some of them of great importance, such as the statehood bills for Hawaii and Alaska, reclamation projects, and mining legislation, he gave each subject personal attention and was helpful to the members regardless of which side of the committee they belonged.

Yes; the committee and Congress are going to sorely miss him but I want to say to my friend, PETE, that we all wish him well and our hope is that he and Mrs. Peterson will enjoy relaxation from strenuous duty to the full. He must know that we will cherish in our hearts an abiding affection and a deep respect for him. Our good wishes go with him.

Get Ready To Back It Up

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD H. VELDE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 26, 1950

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Peoria Journal of August 20, 1950, entitled "Get Ready To Back It Up."

GET READY TO BACK IT UP

Harold Stassen made a very interesting proposition the other night when he suggested that the United States notify Soviet Russia that the next act of aggression on the part of a Soviet satellite would bring war to the territory of the Soviet Union.

It is a proposition that, if we could carry it out, would bring an end to the cold war and insure peace for a considerable length of time. It is a proposition that we imagine most citizens of the United States would like to see put into action.

It is, however, a proposition that we are in no position to employ The war in Korea has demonstrated the sad fact of our unpreparedness to back up any such statement of intentions. If we served notice on Soviet Russia today that the next aggressive act by a Soviet satellite would bring an invasion of Russian territory or the dropping of a bomb within her borders, she would only laugh at us.

The Russians know as well as we do that we have our hands full with so insignificant an opponent as the North Koreans, and that we could never in our present state challenge so huge and well-equipped a nation as Russia herself.

The Russians know that most of our assertions of intentions to defend the free world against aggression have been bluster similar to the ridiculous assertions of Secretary of Defense Johnson. Once, years ago, it was the policy of the United States to speak softly and carry a big stick; now we blurt loudly about what we are going to do, but have only a popgun to back it up.

We should like to see Mr. Stassen's suggestions put into operation. It would save the world from the threatened war. But before we can put anything like it into effect we have to be prepared to back it up.

We should start now doing what Secretary Johnson and the Truman administration should have been doing all these years since the end of World War II. That is, building a strong Defense Establishment that will be able to take care of itself.

We had better put politics aside, forget about the November election and the effect preparation wil have on it, and go all out for military preparedness. We had better begin doing something about building the Defense Establishment Secretary Johnson told us we had.

Then, when we have the power to back up our statements, we can tell Russia we mean business and not have her laugh in our face. Then, and only then, can we expect to have our words carry force and bring about results for the good of the world.

Concurrent Resolution To Seek the Establishment of a United Nations International Contingent Under an Autonomous United Nations Police Authority

OF
HON. JOHN DAVIS LODGE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Speaker, out of suffering and evil many of man's noblest institutions have been born. The tragedy in Korea underscores the fact that the independence, the safety, the very survival of the free nations of the world depends upon collective action. It emphasizes what has been true for some time: that a threat to freedom in Poland, in Hungary, in Italy, in Korea constitutes a threat to our freedom here in America. As Benjamin Franklin remarked:

If we do not hang together then we shall hang separately.

The Korean war has pointed up the necessity for effective international efforts to preserve the peace and to protect freedom.

Establishment of a United Nations military contingent would be a tremendously heartening step forward in man's effort to achieve a world based on law rather than on force. Even though limited in size and scope this force would give dynamic backing to the persuasive principles on which the United Nations was founded. It could well be the beginning of an international police force of such power and influence as to deter future aggression. The important thing now is to establish the practicability of such a contingent as a nucleus for further expansion. A real international police force, functioning on an accepted and unquestioned basis and acting with national armed forces under a joint high command, can create world conditions favorable for the establishment of a dependable peace with freedom.

Editorial Tributes to Hon. Mary T. Norton, of New Jersey

OF
HON. EDWARD J. HART
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 26, 1950

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, under extension of remarks, I am glad to submit herewith the following editorials from the Jersey Journal and Jersey Observer, both published in Hudson County, N. J., eulogizing Hon. MARY T. NORTON and referring to the tributes paid her on the floor of the House a few days ago. The editorials follow:

[From the Jersey Journal]

NEW TRIBUTES FOR RETIRING MRS. NORTON

Not so long ago Mrs. MARY T. NORTON, who will close 26 years of continuous service as a Member of Congress when the present session shortly adjourns, was honored on the floor of the House of Representatives, where women Members presented Mrs. NORTON with a gold and diamond bracelet and men Members, regardless of party, extolled her.

Yesterday afternoon there came a new and unexpected ovation when Jersey City's woman Representative, while busy handling bills for the House Administration Committee, was suddenly interrupted by new tributes that emanated from various Members of the House and that touched Mrs. NORTON so deeply that she was soon in tears.

What the Republicans and Democrats said about Mrs. NORTON yesterday afternoon was but an echo of the sentiments of New Jersey voters who have marked with pride for a quarter of a century the outstanding record of New Jersey's woman Member in the House of Representatives.

[From the Jersey Observer]

A FEW WORDS ABOUT AN ELDERLY LADY

A few days ago in the House of Representatives in Washington there was a scene so unusual that it deserves to be set aside in the memory as one of the things to recall, even to repeat to grandchildren.

Representative MARY T. NORTON, of Jersey City, had obtained the floor to introduce several bills approved by the committee of which she is chairman. After she had performed this duty, another of the Members of Congress, a Republican, asked and received permission to speak to the membership.

He said that he realized that this session of Congress is nearing its end, and that he and others had known of Mrs. NORTON'S illness recently, and of the fact that she is not seeking reelection to the House after 25 years of service. He thought, he said, that it was fitting to pay tribute to Mrs. NORTON, since it was possible that the Members might not see her on the floor of the House again.

Of course no sooner had the Republican spoken than a Democratic Member sought also to speak of his party's gratitude to the 75-year-old Jersey City woman Member. After that the heartfelt tributes came thick and fast.

Representative NORTON was deeply affected. She soon made no pretense of hiding her feelings. She wept openly in the presence of all of these friends, with great sincere tears rolling down her cheeks, as a lady may when she feels that a good cry is best. In words she said some simple thing, like, "I thank you sincerely." But it is to be noted that the House of Representatives probably never before witnessed tears so genuine, and probably it will be many years ere they are privileged to witness the like.

It is vividly impressed to observe a collection of ambitious and vigorous young men and a few women, many of whom most likely fought tooth and nail against Mrs. NORTON at one time or another, so completely captive at such a time.

We are so happy to know that in the House of Representatives, variously described in heated debates of their own making as a place most unlikely to harbor any humane feelings, that the Members can be wholly gentle and well bred when the chips are down. We are perhaps too ready to think of Congress (Senate and House) in terms of a thundering Daniel Webster, a horse-trading "Little Matty" Van Buren, a bulging-browed Borah.

Of course, in all soberness, we shall not have lost the services of Mrs. MARY NORTON. She might fold her hands now, and still her work would go on for several generations. Such services as she gave, such examples as she set, do not end abruptly. They have an aftermath of men and women trying out her footsteps long years after.

How can a congressional tribute be supplemented? Words seem so inadequate when they are required to be heroic. But we are glad there is a heaven. If there were not, we should have to create one for MARY NORTON.

The Politics of Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT HALE
OF MAINE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 26, 1950

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Stewart Alsop:

MATTER OF FACT—THE POLITICS OF PRICE CONTROL

(By Stewart Alsop)

The level of hypocrisy is rarely low in Washington, but it is now reaching a new high watermark. This is best illustrated by the current wrangling between Congress and the administration in the matter of economic controls. All concerned are aware that rigorous and painful controls are going to be necessary. And all concerned are chiefly interested in unloading any unpleasant political consequences on the opposition.

On the one hand, the Truman administration is, as usual, talking out of both sides of its mouth. Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson has now said publicly what he has been saying privately—that defense costs will go up to the $50,000,000,000 level in the near future. This Johnson policy means something like total mobilization. And no sensible man has the slightest doubt that if defense spending really goes up to this level total economic controls, including rationing and price and wage controls, will be absolutely essential.

Yet, while Johnson is attempting to conceal the tragic consequences of his economy program by outbidding everybody else on rearmament, the official administration line on rationing, price and wage controls still is that "the President doesn't want them." Thus, the Johnson policy on defense spending and the Truman policy on economic controls neatly cancel each other out.

This is precisely the sort of messy nonsense which has been causing the political stock of the administration to slump steadily ever since Korea. In the meantime, the conservative coalition in Congress is also indulging in sly political shenanigans. For example, the Wherry-Bricker amendment to the defense production bill is quite obviously designed to put Truman on the spot by handing him totally unworkable legislation.

This amendment provides that if the administration wants to control anything, it will have to control everything. If it becomes desirable to hold meat or steel prices in line, for example, it will also be necessary to freeze the price of morris chairs or the wages of beanpickers. In the meantime, no administrative machinery is provided to enforce this legislation, which goes further than OPA ever did in wartime.

The explanation of this sudden apparent thirst for controls in men like WHERRY and BRICKER is really very simple. The administration is to be confronted with the alternative of attempting to enforce the unenforceable, or of having no controls at all. The latter is, of course, the real objective of many who voted for the amendment. But these statesmen will then be able to answer the anguished protest of the hard-pressed voters by saying, "We voted for controls, but Truman won't use them."

This kind of petty political maneuvering is nothing less than tragic in these times.

And the tragedy is compounded by the fact that, in the view of those best qualified to judge, this country, is perfectly capable of supporting a very high level of defense spending for a very long period, without wrenching the whole economy out of shape.

Even before Korea the national economy was moving rapidly toward the level of output of $300,000,000,000 projected for 1954 by Chairman of the Economic Advisers Leon Keyserling. Indeed, the expansion has been so rapid that the economic advisers have now raised their sights to a fantastic $350,000,000,000 level by 1955.

This means that the astonishing fecundity of the national economy should supply enough for all, even with a high percentage of the national product going into guns instead of butter, tanks instead of automobiles. The best estimate of sensible men, who, unlike Johnson, do not have to cover up frantically for past errors, is that defense spending can be held to a level of about $35,000,000,000 a year. This is only about 13 percent even of the present national product of $270,000,000,000.

This sort of spending need by no means spell economic disaster. About 40 percent of the national output was going to the military during the last war, and the real standard of living actually improved. This miracle cannot be repeated, of course, without a sensible control program. To prevent a ruinous inflation, painful measures will be necessary—very high taxes, tough allocation, commodity credit and farm price measures, almost certainly some selective price, wage, and rationing controls, for which stand-by administrative machinery should be authorized immediately.

With a sensible control program, the garrison state which this country must now become can be that apparent contradiction in terms—a reasonably prosperous and comfortable garrison state. But if the Truman administration continues indefinitely to talk out of both sides of its mouth, while the opposition in Congress slyly maneuvers for political advantage, the economy will go smash, and our garrison state will be very far from comfortable. This now seems rather likely to be our well-deserved fate.

Why Are We in This Mess?—Editorial No. 1

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 26, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I believe it is important that the memory of the American people be refreshed as to the tragic consequences resulting from our arming Japan. It will be recalled that we furnished the scrap iron and oil and gas and much armament to enable Japan first to butcher the Chinese and later to kill and maim our boys. This furnishing of war materials to Japan finally resulted in Pearl Harbor. It is a well-known fact that at the present time we are furnishing war materials to foreign countries, which we call our allies, and which are now transshipping these war materials to Russia. There is little doubt, if any, that much of this material is now enabling the North Koreans, under Russian leadership, to murder and maim our poorly equipped boys fighting in South Korea. It would almost seem as though the policy which has been pursued over a long period of time by the administration has been the result of communistic influences within our own Government. The facts seem to point unerringly to this conclusion.

Under leave to extend, I am inserting in the RECORD as a part of my remarks an editorial from the Cleveland Plain Dealer entitled "Why Are We in This Mess?":

WHY ARE WE IN THIS MESS?

Five years ago Japan surrendered, ending the biggest war in history, and the world entered upon an era of peace, or so everyone believed. The United Nations had been organized, it would deal promptly with any future aggression and war was to be a thing of the past.

What has happened in five crowded years to bring the world to the brink of another war, one which promises to be more terrible and destructive than the last one and which threatens the very existence of modern civilization? People everywhere are asking themselves this question as they watch the war news from Korea and wonder what will happen next.

The obvious answer is that the United States has lacked the kind of leadership it needed to cope with the ruthless Soviet dictatorship whose objective is to subjugate the world. But there is more to it than that. Even the wisest of leaders would have been hard pressed to find a solution to the problems which arose as a result of decisions made at Tehran, Yalta, and other conferences during the war.

The Plain Dealer believes the real explanation for the state in which the world now finds itself goes back to 1940 when Franklin Delano Roosevelt maneuvered himself into another Presidential nomination and broke the third-term tradition. For if there had been no third term, there would have been no fourth, no Tehran and no Yalta.

The idolatrous worshipers of Roosevelt will be quick to condemn this conclusion, to denounce it as the desecration of the memory of a dead man. Let those who criticize ask themselves whether they have any regard for the memories of the dead at Pearl Harbor and Bataan, at Kasserine Pass and Mount Cassino, Guadalcanal and the Normandy beaches and the hundreds of other battlefields of World War II. What about the memories of those who are presently dying in Korea and those who may be called upon to give their lives on some other far-flung battlefront of world war III?

No one can say what would have happened if Roosevelt had not insisted on breaking the third-term tradition in 1940. Whether Wilkie or some Democrat designated by Roosevelt had succeeded to the presidency, it is unlikely that the United States could have kept out of the war in Europe. But the circumstances of our entering the war might have been different. It is scarcely possible that a new President and a new set of advisers would have hit upon the device of inciting the Japanese to attack us by laying down conditions which we knew the Japanese militarists could not and would not accept.

It may be argued with some plausibility that the world might be in a worse mess than it is today if Roosevelt had not been elected to a third and fourth term. But another President might not have hit upon the unconditional surrender slogan which prolonged the war and made victory more difficult, or have adopted the program of reducing Germany to an agrarian economy, which multiplied postwar problems. And Communists might not have found the Government such a happy hunting ground under some other chief executive.

But it was at Yalta that Roosevelt gave Stalin what he wanted and made the secret agreements that have plagued the postwar world, brushing aside the uneasy forebodings of Winston Churchill. And we know now that Roosevelt was not in good health at the time of the Yalta conference. Some other President might have gone to Yalta, too, but there is a good chance he would not have taken Alger Hiss along as one of his principal advisers. And there is a good chance that a President who was mentally and physically vigorous and alert might have listened to Churchill's warnings.

If there is any point in raking over the dead past, it is this: That the American people must be on their guard against any future leader, be he politician or statesman, whose overweening ambition and conceit beguile him into the belief that he is the indispensable man.

Why Are We In This Mess?—Editorial No. 2

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 26, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the mere fact that we are at war is no excuse whatever for not criticizing the events which have led to this debacle. This might not be true if the administration had shown any inclination to correct its errors and had adopted a sound foreign policy for the future. Much of the difficulty might have been avoided had the President cooperated with the American public in ridding the Government of its Communists instead of crying out red herring whenever an attempt was made to drive the Communists out of key positions in this Government. This failure on the part of the administration to formulate a sound foreign policy is inimical to the future security of this Republic. It is only by reviewing of the mistakes of the administration that the public can take a firm hand in correcting what if continued will greatly weaken if not destroy our form of government.

Under leave to extend, I am inserting in the RECORD as a part of my remarks an editorial which appeared in the Cleveland Plain Dealer entitled "Why Are We In This Mess?" This is editorial No. 2:

WHY ARE WE IN THIS MESS?

In a preceding editorial the Plain Dealer attributed much of the blame for the plight in which the United States now finds itself to events which took place in the latter years of the Roosevelt administration. We pointed out that when Roosevelt broke the third-term tradition in 1940 he paved the way for the fourth term and the disastrous appeasement policy which has made Russia a major threat to world peace.

But while we are convinced that Roosevelt's failure to appraise correctly the motives and objectives of the Soviet Union, or his conceited notion that he could handle Stalin, laid the foundation for the expansion and strengthening of the Communist dictatorship, the mistakes of his successor cannot be overlooked.

As we have said, President Truman inherited many of his problems. He was not responsible for the concessions made to Stalin at Yalta by a sick man, nor for the Communists and Communist sympathizers who were in the Government when he took office and who undoubtedly influenced some of the Government's policies.

But the fact is that Truman did not have a consistent foreign policy, nor did he provide the Nation with the kind of leadership that inspires confidence. He was slow to become aware of the menace of communism. He appears not to have recognized it until March 1947, when he asked Congress for military aid for Greece and Turkey. Since then we have had the Marshall plan, the North Atlantic Pact, and the military aid program, all designed primarily to check Communist expansion and forestall Russian aggression in western Europe.

In Asia, however, the President appears not to have recognized that there was any danger in Communist expansion. His administration had no policy for combating communism in that part of the world; on the contrary, such policy as there was actually aided the Communists to take over China and practically invited them to take over all of Korea and Formosa.

To begin with, the President sent General Marshall on the abortive mission to Nanking, with instructions to persuade Chiang Kai-shek to form a coalition government with the Communists. This mission was doomed to failure, as the State Department must have known. It gave the Chinese Communists the opportunity they needed all through 1946 to regroup and restrain and to obtain captured Japanese military supplies from the Russians.

When the plan to form a coalition government was finally recognized as impossible, the Truman administration then withdrew military aid from the Nationalist government, which paved the way for its downfall. Another mission headed by General Wedemeyer resulted in recommendations which could have saved China from the Communists, but the Truman administration rejected them and suppressed the Wedemeyer report.

Did Truman do all these things personally and deliberately? We make no such accusation. But the fact remains they were done by his administration, for which he was responsible.

As for Korea, we knew in 1946 that the Russians were training a North Korean army. But we withdrew our forces from South Korea in 1949, leaving an inadequately armed South Korean defensive force. Our policy there coincided with the recommendation of Owen Lattimore that "the thing to do, therefore, is to let South Korea fall, but not to let it look as though we pushed it."

At home the President was apparently oblivious for a long time to the Communist menance and even hostile to attempts to expose it. During the 1948 campaign he charged that the investigation of Alger Hiss by the House Un-American Activities Committee was a red herring to distract the attention of the voters from other issues. When the Hiss case was before the grand jury he ridiculed the committee and suggested it should be abolished. And in June 1949 when the trials of Hiss, Judith Coplon, and the 11 leaders of the Communist Party were in progress, and Harry Bridges had just been indicted for perjury, the President described the spy trials and loyalty investigations as a form of typical postwar hysteria which eventually would die down.

At one time the House Un-American Activities Committee filed a report accusing the President of obstructing its investigations. And this was long before Senator JOE MCCARTHY got into the act.

Thus, prior to the Korean incident, the administration's policy was to resist communism in Europe, to help it along, or at least to do nothing to impede its progress in Asia, and to belittle efforts to expose the Communist menace in the United States.

During this 4 years the administration has been hell bent on spending more money for its civilian, domestic, and give-away programs. In the current year it is proposing to spend $5,000,000,000 more for nonmilitary purposes than it spent in 1948. That is one reason for the neglect of the military establishment.

For example, the Air Policy Commission appointed by President Truman reported in 1947 that a 70-group Air Force was an absolute necessity to provide the United States with adequate defense. But the President rejected the findings of his own Commission. He first called for the 55-group Air Force, later one of 48 groups. Even when Congress authorized more money for the Air Force, he ordered it not to be spent. The country couldn't afford it. But the administration had plenty of money for its various socialistic experiments.

On January 11, 1949, the Plain Dealer said editorially: "If the reports by Secretary Symington and the President's Air Force Policy Commission are to be believed, the only conclusion that can be reached is that the administration is playing fast and loose with the national security. Congress might properly inquire whether service jealousies and the desire of the administration to embark on a program of social welfare expansion will result in the Nation being ill prepared to defend itself against any possible attack in the future."

Thus, one reason for the plight we are in is that the Government did not maintain an adequate Defense Establishment. Another is the strange course we pursued in the Far East. Take the case of Formosa. A State Department bulletin dated June 3, 1945, stated that "with the exception of Singapore, no location in the Far East occupies such a controlling position."

But on December 23, 1949, the Department circulated a secret memorandum explaining that the United States has no interest in Formosa and that it was of no strategic importance. When Senator TAFT urged that we send a fleet to the Formosa Strait to prevent a Chinese Communist invasion of the island, the suggestion was ridiculed by Dean Acheson and President Truman and another State Department bulletin was issued stating that "the United States Government will not provide military aid or advice to the Chinese forces on Formosa." This, coupled with Acheson's omission of South Korea and Formosa from what he announced was the America line of defense in the Far East, gave the North Koreans all the information they needed to justify the expectation that we would not intervene if they invaded South Korea.

The record, then, is one of bungling, indecision, contradiction, carelessness, and misrepresentation, either deliberate or inadvertent.

The administration is now trying to rectify its past mistakes. The effort to do so deserves the support of all of us. We hope there is still time.

Why Are We in This Mess?—Editorial No. 3

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 26, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I know that the people of this Nation must be not only startled but stunned by the disclosure that more than $50,000,000,000 had been appropriated for a Defense Establishment only to find that our Armed Forces of young, inexperienced, and almost untrained men had to face the North Korean Russian-led Communists in what will prove to be one of the bloodiest battles in recent history. In view of this situation it may be well to remind the American people of the extent to which they have been misled as to the true situation regarding our national defense and security.

Under leave to extend, I am inserting in the RECORD as a part of my remarks an editorial from the Cleveland Plain Dealer entitled "Why Are We in This Mess?" This is editorial No. 3:

WHY ARE WE IN THIS MESS?

Before South Korea was invaded the cold war had been going on for 4 years. During that period we spent $50,000,000,000 on our Defense Establishment. We not only had a right to believe we were getting our money's worth, and adequate defense, but we were assured by the Truman administration that such was the case.

Last February 2 Defense Secretary Johnson said: "There is one nation in the world that would start a war. We seek to have a Military Establishment sufficient to deter that aggressor and to lick hell out of her if she doesn't stay deterred."

Again Johnson said: "Joe Stalin will know that if he starts something at 4 a. m., the fighting power of the United States will be on the job at 5 a. m."

On March 2 President Truman said that never in the history of the United States had its defenses been in such good shape except when actually at war.

Testifying before a Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on March 13, Johnson said that the Army was stronger then and the Air Force was in the highest state of combat readiness since the end of the war.

On May 5 the President told his news conference the cold-war situation was better now than it was in 1946 and that he was not alarmed over the possibility of a shooting war with Russia. He backed up this optimism with the disclosure that next year's defense budget would be smaller than the current one.

And on June 1 the President said that the world is closer now to permanent peace than at any time in the past 5 years.

We know now how poorly prepared we were to meet the crisis of a little war in Korea, much less the possibility of warfare on the global scale. It is apparent now that the vast sum we spent for defense in the past 4 years did not purchase us the security we had been led to believe we had.

Why Are We in This Mess?—Conclusion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 26, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend, I am inserting in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the last editorial in a series of editorials which appeared in the Cleveland Plain Dealer entitled "Why Are We in This Mess?" I feel that every American should know these facts to enable all right-thinking citizens to act accordingly to preserve the greatest heritage of freedom ever bequeathed to a people:

WHY ARE WE IN THIS MESS?

President Truman's decision to use armed intervention when the Communists invaded the Republic of South Korea marked a turning point in American foreign affairs and a complete reversal of the policy previously promoted in the Far East by his administration.

The administration had made it clear it was not interested in what happened in Korea or Formosa. The State Department had anticipated the fall of Formosa to the Chinese Communists and Secretary Acheson had stated publicly the United States would not use the veto to prevent the admission of Communist China to the United Nations. Congress appropriated $10,500,000 for military aid to South Korea on October 28, 1949, but 8 months later only $200 worth of signal equipment had been delivered. The South Koreans had only the arms which the American occupation forces left behind, just enough to enable them to deal with border raids and to preserve internal security.

In the harsh words uttered by Senator MCCARRAN Monday, the course we pursued in the Far East was "statesmanship at the level of the psychopatic ward." The Communists must have been greatly surprised when Truman reversed both himself and Acheson by sending American forces to Korea and ordering an American fleet to prevent the invasion of Formosa.

Why did he do it? There were two reasons. One was that the administration came to a belated realization that the Communists were willing to use armed force to attain their ends, and that if they once got away with it, no place on earth would be safe from similar aggression. The other was that the Republic of South Korea had been established under the authority and guidance of the United Nations. If we had allowed South Korea to become a victim of Communist conquest, the United Nations would have lost all prestige and it might as well have disbanded.

Besides these reasons, the United States had a special responsibility for South Korea, since it was at this Government's suggestion that the United Nations undertook to supervise the establishment of the South Korean Republic after it became apparent that the Communists would not permit free elections in North Korea.

Accordingly, when the North Koreans invaded South Korea, the first action taken by the United States was to secure the adoption in the Security Council of the United Nations of a resolution calling upon members of the United Nations to aid South Korea. The Russians could not veto this resolution because they were boycotting the United Nations at the time.

The Truman administration responded to this call by giving air and naval support to South Korea, followed by ground forces. This action met with overwhelming approval in Congress and out, even thought its legality was questioned.

Senator ROBERT A. TAFT pointed out that section 6 of the act to implement the United Nations Charter provides that agreements with the Security Council for the use of American Armed Forces "shall be subject to the approval of the Congress by appropriate act or joint resolution."

In a speech on the floor of the Senate on June 28, just 3 days after the invasion of South Korea, TAFT pointed out that no such act or resolution had been submitted, and that the sending of troops to Korea seemed to him to be "a complete usurpation by the President of authority to use the Armed Forces of this country."

TAFT said he felt this subject should be discussed because "if the incident is permitted to go by without protest, at least from this body, we would have finally terminated for all time the right of Congress to declare war, which is granted to Congress alone by the Constitution of the United States."

In the same speech, however, TAFT said that "if a joint resolution were introduced asking for approval of the use of our Armed Forces already sent to Korea and full support of them in their present venture, I would vote in favor of it. * * *

"I feel that we must back up our troops * * * with unstinted support. Whether the President chose the right time for his new policy, or the right place, can be discussed in the future. I suggest, however, that any Secretary of State who has been so reversed by his superiors and whose policies have precipitated the danger of war, had better resign and let someone else administer the program to which he was, and perhaps still is, so violently opposed."

We think a great many people will agree with TAFT. The consequences of Tehran and Yalta, the failure to appraise Russian objectives correctly, and the inconsistencies and bungling in our foreign policy made a showdown with Russia inevitable. Perhaps Korea was not as favorable a location for it as we would have wished, but we had no choice in the matter. Perhaps the President did exceed his authority by using the Armed Forces without congressional approval, but time was running out. These issues, and the charge that the administration failed to maintain an adequate defense force, can be debated later. The important thing now is to do everything that is necessary and possible to back up the fighting men in Korea and to strengthen our defense forces elsewhere and those of our allies.

H. R. 4281: Taxis

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 26, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following timely editorial warranting the attention of the Members, which appeared in the Times-Herald Saturday, August 26, in connection with H. R. 4281, scheduled for consideration on the floor on Monday, August 28:

TAXICAB LIMITATION?—NUTS

The present attempt to limit the number of taxicabs in Washington has defeated its purpose. If the so-called limitation bill now before Congress is passed there will be more cabs in Washington than ever before.

FARE BOOST IS REAL GOAL

Therefore we believe it is silly for Congress to waste any more time on this perennial will-o'-the-wisp. The Senate District Committee has postponed action on the proposal indefinitely and the House should do likewise. The idea is un-American. There is no more fairness in limiting the number of cabs than there would be to limiting the number of grocery stores or shoeshine parlors. The real goal is to increase fares.

Washington is a unique taxi town. No other city depends on taxicabs for such a large amount of mass transportation. People who use the cabs in Washington walk or ride subways, elevated trains or busses in other cities. As a result the number of cabs driven by full time and part time drivers has grown to meet this good market.

Meters were ruled out in the early thirties in favor of zone rates to give drivers and riders a better break for their money. Group riding has been a boom to Government employees going to and from work in rush hours.

Gradually the system has settled on the basis of supply and demand where there is no more than the expected number of complaints from the public against overcharging and inability to get cabs in rainstorms or other emergencies.

On the other hand there has always been a continuous pressure from organized drivers and some independents to cut down the number of cabs in the city so the ones remaining in the business could make more money. Call it greed or good business, back of the drive to limit the cabs has also been an undercurrent to increase rates.

The original bills introduced in the Senate and the House this session to bring about limitation were basically the same. They authorized the public utilities commission to fix a flexible ceiling on the number of cabs that can be operated in the city. It is made flexible by providing that after the PUC determines what that number should be it can at its discretion change it to meet any new condition such as a sudden increase in population.

The bill also puts a safeguard around those who now have licenses providing that their licenses cannot be revoked or their renewal denied unless they violate the law to such an extent that they are considered unfit to drive a cab.

That means that should the PUC, under the proposed law, decide there were too many cabs in the city and set a number below those in operation, it would take years before the limit would mean anything. They would have to wait until enough drivers died or voluntarily gave up their licenses to leave the city or go to another job before the limit could be reached.

Now that is the way it would have operated under the bill as it first went to Congress. But the House District Committee put on two amendments which make the measure even more unworkable.

RUSH IS ON

First the committee wrote in language which would allow drivers to transfer their licenses. So if a driver was getting out of business he could sell or give his license to someone to fill his place.

Such a loophole would certainly keep the number of cabs always near the same level.

Secondly the House committee voted that the law would not go into effect until January 1, 1951. That would mean that between the date of passage and the effective date everyone and his uncle interested in driving a cab or getting a license to sell or give away would rush the PUC and flood the town with thousands of cab licenses. Licenses which would remain in effect no matter what limit was decided upon.

A month ago when hearings were held on the bill there were 7,967 licenses in effect. Thursday morning this week the PUC reported the number had jumped to 8,580. From July 10 to August 9, 579 applications were received. Normally the applications run from 10 to 15 a day but with the possibility that a limitation bill might be passed the rush has reached as high as 53 in one day.

From these figures it is plain to see that if the bill passed there would be a minimum of 10,000 licenses on the books when it went into effect.

What kind of limitation is that?

Korean War Is Different

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RAY J. MADDEN
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 26, 1950

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, few realize that we are engaged in a type war which we have not experienced before. The following editorial by James DeLaurier, publisher of the Hammond (Ind.) Times, reveals the true situation which confronts our military forces:

TWO KINDS OF WAR

The tragedy in Korea has demonstrated a fact that many of us, including highly placed military men, had tended to forget—that there can be two kinds of war.

Up to the time that North Korea sent her troops pouring across the thirty-eighth parallel, we had been thinking in terms of the "big" intercontinental war. This, if it came, was to be war on an unprecedented scale and of an unprecedented type. It was to be a war of amazing machines which would wreak death and destruction on a huge scale and at vast distances. A button would be pushed, and an atom bomb or a guided missile would be on its way toward the target. It would be a war of science and technology. Some thought it might be a war in which a decision would be reached without any ground action at all, and without opposing troops coming face to face.

No one can say that these concepts are wrong—they might hold true in that "big" war the world now fears. But it is clear that they do not apply in Korea.

In Korea we have a war in which the traditional, relatively simple weapons are all-important. The man with a gun in his hand must do the fighting. It is the most difficult and dismal sort of war imaginable. Great troop movements of the sort that took place in Europe in the last war are impossible. Everything is based upon the small unit—the battalion, the company, the platoon, even the squad. The importance of the individual soldier is supreme—if one man fails, disaster to many may follow. In this, the war is comparable to the jungle operations against the Japanese during the island-hopping period that preceded the Empire's surrender.

We are fighting an enemy whose habits and thoughts are incomprehensible to the western mind. The cruel fanaticism of the Orient finds its perfect reflection in the Korean soldier. Human life is worthless, death but an incident. No matter how many are killed, more come on. North Korea casualties have been infinitely greater than ours. But the offensives have been pushed in spite of them.

The Koreans have proven themselves extraordinarily adept at infiltration, and at guerrilla activity. This, in the first weeks, was one of the worst problems faced by the Americans. The enemy seemed to be everywhere, and foe and friend looked alike. The Korean soldier accepts the greatest of hardships with apparent equanimity—he has known little but privation all his life. He can sleep anywhere. A handful of the coarsest food sustains him. Supply, as we know it in the American Army, is unknown to him.

Worst of all, it is clear, we had not planned for this war. Our eyes were elsewhere—on Formosa, Iran, Europe—even as our minds were considering the other kind of war. And so, in every way, we were completely surprised.

The lesson we have learned is a grim one. We must be prepared for any kind of war—and for war almost anywhere. We have never faced a harder task.

Premature Release of German War Criminals

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 25, 1950

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Times:

FOR GOOD CONDUCT

Although good conduct is generally accepted as a cogent reason to cut a criminal's stay behind bars, it is unlikely that the people of Europe will readily understand our sanguine attitude in shortening the prison terms of Friedrich Flick and several other war criminals. Tried before a meticulously fair United States military tribunal at Nuremberg between 1947 and 1949, Herr Flick, Otto Dietrich, Richard Walter Darre, and others were convicted of war crimes ranging from spoliation of Nazi-occupied countries to furthering a program that resulted in the deaths of 6,000,000 Jews.

The release of such people is bound to alienate democratic-minded men and women in precisely those areas where their friendship is most vital to us. The Communists will naturally make the most of it. One must hope that a weather eye be kept on the future activities of Herr Flick & Co. to see that their freedom is marked by the same standard of behavior that brought about their untimely pardon.

Huk Organization in the Philippines

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 26, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following article which appeared in the August 1950 issue of the Columbia, the monthly publication of the Knights of Columbus:

RED DRIVE IN THE PHILIPPINES

(By James F. Kearney)

To those familiar with the methods employed for the Red conquest of China the whole Huk propaganda in the Philippines has a familiar ring. "Don't you realize that in every country the Reds always start by pretending to help the poor?" I protested to a veteran of Bataan who was inclined to sympathize with Huks as friends of the downtrodden. "If they get into power here, the people will see after it is too late, that they have been duped and are now helpless captives." He was not impressed.

The name of the Hukbalahaps, a wartime "People's Army Against Japan," has been changed to the "People's Liberation Army," the very same title the Chinese Communists adopted during their fight against Chiang Kai-shek. The Huk organization was founded in 1942. The military chief seems to be Luis Taruc, the political leaders Communists Guillermo Capadocia and Mariano Balgos, former labor leaders in Manila. Taruc has about him that mysterious something which captivates the imagination of his followers. According to one of his former schoolmates, he is a deceptively meek-looking person, 5½ feet tall, and weighing only about 120 pounds. He is as elusive as a shadow, has evaded snare after snare laid for him by the military police and the Philippine constabulary. He speaks with a soft, almost effeminate politeness that comes as a shock to those who had expected to meet in him a blustering bully.

He has been pronounced dead time and again, once even by the President, but the average man in the street still considers him very much alive. When Taruc was named on the wanted list by the Government back in 1946, he immediately disappeared into the mountains. After being hunted vainly by thousands for 2 years, he emerged honorably from the shadows in 1948 when an amnesty was offered him by the authorities. He came to Manila in a Government plane, was lodged in an annex to the President's residence, and protected by Government guards.

THE OLD FAMILIAR ANSWER

In an interview at that time, he answered the blunt question: "How permeated with communism is the Huk movement?" with the statement familiar to anyone who has followed the Chinese Red movement, "The Hukbalahap is not a Communist army and is not fighting for communism." We mustn't forget that according to explicit directions in the Communist Manifesto, all Red movements are supposed to start out as national movements; they become openly internationalized only after their civil war has proved successful. Only then do the Russians take over. Taruc, after denying any hook-up with Moscow, immediately launched into a eulogy of the Russian Soviet army, until one of his lieutenants suggested that he stop. He then switched back to what is now known as Titoism, declaring that "the Huks are in fact an army of liberation imbued with principles of nationalism, peace and democracy. We are not dictated to by Moscow, as claimed by Red baiters," he finished emphatically. These words may prove highly encouraging for those American officials who may still nourish the naive hope of making Titos out of Mao Tse-tung and other oriental Reds.

"The rich hate and despise the poor and look upon us as carabaos," complain the Huk propagandists here in language suited to capture the sympathy of the underprivileged. "They are robbing the common people. The people are the real owners of all this land and these big houses. They should arise and assert their collective rights." Here we have the traditional agrarian reform program with which Reds and pinks in the States deceived so many Americans who wondered whether Mao Tse-tung and his friends were or were not real Communists. So successful has this "agrarian" battlecry proved again and again, that the Huks see no reason for changing it. When they struck violently and almost simultaneously in four places on March 29, the eighth anniversary of their founding, the local president launched his antidissident campaign on a big scale.

One of the first Huk attacks was at the well-known summering place, Los Banos. The watchman of a large enclosure there told me this was what happened to him. At 2:30 a. m., he was awakened with a noisy, "Hello! Come out!" He obeyed, and saw three or four young fellows in uniform, with a larger group standing back in the shadows.

"We want your gun," they said, politely.

"But I need it to keep robbers away."

"They won't bother you," was the reply. "We know them all."

After giving up his fine rifle reluctantly, he asked, "Do you want anything else—money, whisky?"

"No. We're not allowed to take that. All we wanted is your gun. Goodbye!"

He seemed pleased that they had treated him so gently. "The Government will find it very hard to defeat the Huks," he said, "for these fellows know every mountain trail through the jungle. The soldiers don't, and can be easily ambushed."

RAIDS REVEAL HUK SYSTEM

The raid on San Pablo reveals the Huk system more thoroughly. News reports stated that long before it took place dissidents had entered the town as bare-footed peasants. Afterward the inhabitants remarked that the movie houses had been overcrowded, while purchases in the markets had registered an extraordinary rise. The innocent-looking Huks had mingled with the populace, carrying baskets to give them the appearance of rustic barrio traders. But when the attack took place, they appeared like veteran campaigners, though many of them were only youths ranging from 15 to 20 years old. As they attacked the city hall and the enlisted men's barracks, many of them sang and encouraged one another, but at other times they observed strict silence to avoid detection. Several groups of attackers were commanded by young women, and bystanders heard them being addressed as Esther, Cinderella, etc. Commander Cinderella's group forced its way into the city jail, seized two prisoners, and executed them, allegedly because they had made anti-Huk confessions to the constabulary. We pause to remark here that young women also played an important role in the night raids by Red China's guerrillas.

The Huks' first assault on the business section developed when a Chinese store owner refused to open his door and was fired upon. They looted the place, and many changed their old clothes then and there for new ones. Next day the town of San Pablo was found virtually littered with propaganda papers and other printed documents attacking the Government and blaming it for all the hardships and injustices of the people. A red flag was seen hoisted to a pole.

In another night raid at the beginning of May, Huks landed on the coast of Alabat Island, ransacked the houses of the mayor and other officials, set the city hall afire, looted the Chinese stores and private residences, hauling to the wharf an estimated 5 tons of merchandise. Then they addressed the assembled male residents whom they had rounded up at the wharf, bitterly assailing the present administration for its widespread graft and corruption. They appealed to the people to open their eyes to the goings-on in the Government and to rally to the rebel cause.

A lady eyewitness reports a Huk raid in Mauban in the heart of the dissident area in Quezon Province, telling how the daughter of her landlady urged her to peep through a half-closed window one night. "There, right below, were about 50 long-haired individuals in fatigues and denims and armed to the teeth. They were en route to the center of the town, where smoke was rapidly rising from the top of a building the Huks had set afire. They had entered the town from four different directions without opposition. As the fire grew bigger, panic spread among the inhabitants. They saw with horror the military barracks and the bus company garage go up in flames. Then shots rang out. It was a signal for civilians to keep out of harm's way; and the Huks touched neither hide nor hair of them, though they were looting Chinese stores for supplies.

"The following day the inhabitants started evacuating. At night some Huks kept vigil, scaring the wits out of fake Huks who were extorting money and rice from civilians. Ten days after the raid, the dissidents set up a loudspeaker to broadcast: 'The masses are the victim of injustice. While they toil, corrupt officials cheat them of their money. * * * This year and last, numerous scandals involving big fry have been exposed. The rich hoard their wealth which they should share with the poor. If this were done, social discontent would vanish. The Communist system is better. At one stroke it would solve the countless problems that beset the people of the Philippines.' * * * "Though reputed to be barbarians," concludes this lady witness, "the Huks treated the people almost gingerly. Their conduct at Mauban left very little to desire. Perhaps the Government troops, never a model in that respect, should think seriously about this."

MAKE INITIAL GOOD IMPRESSION

In the above we see the habitual Communist method of making an initial good impression on the masses to win them to their side in their violent attempt to overthrow the Government. All these instances confirm the statement read in the United States House of Representatives on June 27, 1947, entitled, "As I Saw the Huks," prepared by W. P. Reeves, of the United States War Department, who spent the year 1946 in the Philippines. "Unlike the Communists in America," it said in part, "the Huks do not hesitate to resort to armed violence. They make unreasonable demands for money, food, rice, etc. If their demand is denied, they murder the owner and burn his home. In the provinces I saw many houses which had been burned or broken into bits by Huks. * * * Captured Huks have admitted they were taught the principles of Lenin. They were taught that the solution of their ills, poverty, and hardships is the overthrow of the Philippine Government and the establishment of a Communist dictatorship. Angeles David, Governor of the Province of Pampange, stated, 'The Huk organization recognizes no law but anarchy and lawlessness, and has no love of country because it advocates communistic principles, using the Red flag in its demonstrations and celebrating November 7, the birth of the Third Internationale'." Evidently the real Huks are doing today as they have done from the beginning.

Their strategy for the future is, of course, a matter for conjecture. In areas under their complete control they have already set up a government of their own, where they collect taxes, celebrate marriages, impose penalties, and operate their own schools, one of which is named Stalin University. The Philippines Fress Press, for April 22 of this year, affirms that the one spot in Asia which had been peaceful and progressive was the Philippines under American tutelage. It was, therefore, a standing denial of everything Stalin wants Asiatic peoples to believe. As long as it remained comparatively happy and peaceful he could not convince the hungry millions of Asia that their only hope was in turning to the Russian way of life. Therefore, disturbances had to be created in the Philippines so that Russian propaganda could shout, "At last the exploited masses of the Philippines, ground down under the heel of American capitalistic teachings, have rebelled and are fighting for liberation."

This was a clever move, not only to discredit America in the Far East, but to remove one of the real obstables that lay in the path of an Asia-wide "People's revolution for freedom." Yet, though the Huks have frequently shown themselves as anti-American, they will probably not permit any overt act from abroad which might give the United States justification for directly intervening in the country to help the Government restore peace and order. The Philippine-American treaty of March 14, 1947, authorizes negotiations with a view to insuring the Territorial integrity of the Philippines, the mutual protection of the Philippines, and the United States, and the maintenance of peace in the Pacific.

Dean Acheson has said that an attack on the Philippines by a foreign power would not be tolerated by the United States. The Communists would, therefore, in keeping with past performances, doubtless want this to appear to be a non-Moscow revolution by the Filipinio people, and the violence they are able to stir up will have all the appearances of a purely internal and domestic problem. There will thus be no apparent question of foreign aggression or of violation by an outside Soviet power of the islands' Territorial integrity. In fact, the arrival of American reinforcements could then be denounced by the "patriotic" Huks as unwarranted Yankee imperialism. Even if Formosa should fall, there would thus be no direct invasion of the Philippines from there, according to this theory. The islands would be taken from within, with, of course, plenty of secret support from without.

And that brings up the question that is bothering local government authorities: the Chinese question. The Huk raids, as reported above, frequently concentrate on Chinese stores. The reason is that many of the Chinese merchants are unpopular in the Philippines because of their business methods. Attacks on them, to the exclusion of the Filipino merchants, seem to have been another attempt in the approved Red style to gain the sympathy of the Filipino masses. But fear has been expressed in government circles—and they show evidence for it—that an important part of the Red plan to take over the islands is centered about the large Chinese colony here. Specially trained persuaders will, it is claimed, try to convince wealthy Chinese that it is wise for them to back the Huks financially if they want to be on the winning side. Should the merchants be hard to persuade, their relatives in China will be made to suffer; and if this doesn't work, here and there a wealthy Chinese will be found brutally murdered. On May 29, the corpse of just such a merchant was discovered in an air raid shelter in Quezon City, his legs chained, his head bashed in, and marks of torture found in different parts. Was it a warning to others?

Frequent reports also state that Red Chinese are being smuggled into the islands as refugee Nationalists. But when Congressman TITO V. TIZON, chairman of the House Committee on Un-Filipino Activities, declared that "90 percent of the more than 600,000 Chinese Nationalists now residing in the Philippines are potential Reds," the secretary general of the Chinese Nationalist Party in the islands issued a formal protest, declaring that it was both inexact and insulting, since the total number of Chinese residing in the country was, according to both Filipino Immigration and Chinese Consular statistics, only 200,000—not 600,000. "A great majority of Chinese here are as loyal as ever to the National Government of China. * * * We Chinese, being actually engaged in a war against the Reds while other nations are merely doing lip service, are no moral cowards. To say that we might bow to the Red tyrants on the mainland is false and defamatory. * * * Irresponsible remarks can only serve the purposes of the Communists." By which he apparently means that, should Formosa fall, local Chinese Nationalists, with no government of their own left, might be tempted to join the Huks. The whole question seems fraught with such danger to the islands that it seems difficult to see how American authorities were able to state calmly for so long that it made no difference to American defenses whether Formosa stood or not. The repercussions would be tremendous, not only in the Philippines, but in the Chinatowns of San Francisco, New York, and elsewhere.

Representative Tizon speaks with authority on the Huk question, saying: "What started as a legitimate movement for agrarian reform has now been converted through the clever manipulation of the Communists into an armed revolutionary struggle, whose aim is no longer social amelioration but the overthrow of the government. This armed and psychological struggle is a culmination of over 20 years of Communist agitation and propaganda, which is not of a domestic origin but of foreign instigation." He goes on to say that the Huk cry of land for the landless is not in keeping with the economic realities of this country which call not for more land but for the cultivation of unoccupied soil. "There are no less than 6,505,025 hectares of virgin arable land all over the country still eagerly awaiting the pioneering hands of Filipinos. * * * No less than 60,000,000 individuals, approximately three times the present population, can be comfortably supported from the total agricultural land area alone."

Public lands have already been set aside in Mindanao and Mindoro for Huks who will lay down their arms and agree to live peaceably. But they do not want land; they want to overthrow the government. "Imbued with a messianic complex, they believe that only when the Communist Party gets into power will graft and corruption be forever abolished in this country. To prevent the Communists from using for their subversive purposes the government's own house-cleaning program, I maintain," he concludes, "that the accusations of corruption must not be generalized but must be localized to individual cases. * * * We should be able to outthink, out-write, out-talk, and out-fight the Communists every inch of the way in the ideological and armed struggles which have been forced upon our country."

What is the attitude of the Catholic Church here at the present time? Naturally she does not favor the Huk Communist movement. On the other hand, she has made it perfectly clear that she stands on the side of the poor in their present cry for justice. His Excellency Egidio Vagnozzi, D. D., Apostolic Delegate to the Philippines, in a powerful address to the Knights of Columbus on November 30, 1949, at Manila, pleaded with them as Knights to draw their swords in defense of justice, in defense of the widow, the orphan, the poor. "Do not be blind; if you insist on exploiting God's poor for the fattest profit you can get today, you are going to lose everything tomorrow, your capital, your business, your profits, probably your very life. In the storm that will break around you, you will sacrifice your family and the future of your children. These children of yours, if they will not be wiped out by the whirlwind of social upheaval, will be the prize and the spoils of a regime of tyranny and terror. This will be the vengeance of God for your egoism and greed."

With the fate of Nationalist China before everyone's eyes, the rational solution for the Philippines would seem to be the thorough cleansing, not the overthrow, of the present regime. Criticism, if pitiless, should be constructive at this hour of crisis in the Far East. The promises of communism have proved illusory everywhere else; it is childish to hope they will be less so here. The workers will not be better off under the Huks, if the latter take over, but worse off. There will not be the present freedom to write or speak against the Government. The fine Filipino family life will be destroyed, with wife turned against husband and with children spying on their parents. Catholic schools will be forced to teach atheistic communism and, when the Russians move in to take control, the beautiful May processions in the barrios might soon have to carry the picture of Stalin instead of the Blessed Virgin.

The Huks are already saying, as the Chinese Communists said before them: "Communism cannot possibly be worse than the present regime." But it can be. A Chinese friend of mine, a Hong Kong businessman, wrote recently, "Little did we think that the Reds would be so much worse than the National Government." Yet people who had lived under China's Reds for years had tried to warn them over and over again what the Reds were like. It is to be devoutly hoped that the inhabitants of this Catholic land won't have to learn that lesson the hard way.

Fifth. Rights of servicemen to reemployment.

This digest has been prepared by competent experts, who are attorneys and members of the Oklahoma State Bar Association:

RIGHTS OF SERVICEMEN DURING MILITARY SERVICE AS TO OBLIGATIONS TO PA MORTGAGES ON HOMESTEAD

(By Tom W. Garrett)

We recommend that all men entering the military service should first do everything that they can to pay the monthly installments on their home, as they will find it difficult to catch up on any unpaid installments upon their return from the military service. The rights of all men entering into the military service are fully protected by the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940 as amended. This does not mean that anyone is entitled to purchase property just because he expects to be called into the military service, and wants to obtain relief as provided by the Civil Service Relief Act, as you cannot compel the sale of property to any persons.

Those who wish to keep their homes for their immediate family, or to rent it to others so that they will have a home when they return, should not write a letter to the VA or to the lending agency, but should go to the place where they are making their monthly payments and give them full information of any changes of income or obligation, the name of the person who will be in charge of the property, and do whatever they can to work out an agreement while in the military service as to how much they can pay.

When we use the term "agency," we mean to include the RFC and other Government lending agencies, as well as life insurance and other loan companies. You will find that some of these agencies may be reluctant to make any extension or concession on account of the GI guaranty or the FHA insurance. The attention of these agencies is called to the fact that the FHA does not require notice of default until the borrower has defaulted his third monthly payment, and that the agency has 12 months to liquidate the loan in order to be protected. We find that under the present FHA regulations, interest starts on the debentures from the time of default instead of the commencement of foreclosure, and that they expect a regulation to be out in a few days authorizing them to waive any reasonable requirement as to loans where the man is called into the military service.

That under GI insured loans, regulation 36.4313, et seq., the holder of such loan does not have to give the VA notice until the loan has been in default for 3 months, and the agency is required to give an additional 30 days' notice, at such time as it may desire, of its intention to commence foreclosure proceedings. That under the regulations, the agency does not have to commence foreclosure at the end of 105 days, and if good faith is shown, the serviceman may continue to be in default as much as 3 months without the VA making a requirement to foreclose.

In the event that the serviceman is unable to work out a deal with the lending agency, or the agency is unable to protect its GI guaranty or FHA insurance, and commences foreclosure, such serviceman at that time would be entitled to the full benefits of the Civil Relief Act of 1940, as amended, which is found in title 50, United States Code, sections 501 to 590, inclusive. The Lawyers Cooperative Publishing Co., of Rochester, N. Y., has published a one-volume American Law of Veterans, with a 1949 supplement, which also discusses the questions involved.

From these sources it appears that where a serviceman is able to show that his ability to pay his mortgage loan has been materially affected by reason of his military service and is sued on such mortgage indebtedness, such serviceman is entitled to a stay of the enforcement of such obligation where he gives notice to the lending agency and presents the necessary evidence to the court to justify such stay. The court may require the serviceman to make certain payments or to do certain things, or a receivership might be had of the property and the rents be applied upon the payment of the loan where same is not occupied by the veteran's immediate family. The act provides that the installments under a contract to buy or under a mortgage may be postponed in such a way that the loan will be extended for the period equal to the period in the military service. There is nothing in this section that authorizes the extension of the loan for more than 25 years, so that at the end of 25 years the guaranty might not be enforceable, but for practical purposes such guaranty would not be needed due to the fact that the property at that time would be worth more than the balance due on the loan.

We are of the opinion that where the lending agency notifies the VA that the serviceman has been called into the military service, and the lending agency is of the opinion that such serviceman can only pay the interest, insurance, and taxes on the property, so is in fact in default on the payment of his loan, and such agency does not notify the VA of its intention to commence foreclosure proceedings, that until the VA requires the commencement of foreclosure, it would remain liable on its GI guaranty. In this regard, I would suggest that two notices be given. The first notice to be given at the time of entering the military service, and the second notice to be given when the principal is in arrears for 3 months.

We find that this question has been passed on by at least one court. The case of Morris Plan Industrial Bank v. Petluck ((1946) 187 Misc. 87, 60 N. Y. S. 2d, 162), a stay for a period of time equivalent to the duration of military service, namely, 34 months, was granted, upon condition of payment of arrears of interest, principal, and taxes periodically over such period. Upon final satisfaction of the conditions, the parties were directed to be restored to their normal status.

If the serviceman is compelled to sell his home, he should see a member of his local bar association, who will advise him as to his rights, liabilities, and the expenses he will be out in making such sale, and will assure that the serviceman is fully protected until such time that he can dispose of such property.

Rights of Servicemen as to Installment Contracts on Household Goods, Automobiles, and Personal Property

(By Eugene P. Ledbetter)

We recommend that if the person in the military service has purchased personal property under an installment contract, he should:

1. Make the payments as provided in the contract if reasonably possible.

2. Upon induction, go promptly to the creditor, mortgagee, or security holder and, if possible, work out an agreement in writing with him as to the adjustment of the payments, modification of the contract, or surrender of the property upon the payment to him of the reasonable value of his equity.

3. Examine his rights under the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act if the property is essential to the maintenance or comfort of his dependents and he is unable to work out a suitable agreement with the owner of the indebtedness.

The Soldiers and Sailor's Civil Relief Act provides that after a deposit or at least one installment has been paid upon an installment contract by a person who, thereafter enters military service, the owner of the indebtedness may not exercise any of the rights under the contract to terminate or forfeit it or resume possession of the personal property for nonpayment of any installment or breach of the other terms occurring during the period of military service, except by action in a court of competent jurisdiction (50 U. S. C., sec. 531 (1)).

When such action is brought, the court may, as a condition to the termination of the contract, order a repayment of the prior installments or deposits. Upon the other hand, the court may in its own discretion, on its own motion, and must, on application to it by a person in the military service or someone in his behalf, order a stay of the proceedings as provided in the act, unless in its opinion the ability of the purchaser to comply with the terms of the contract is not materially affected by reason of such service; or the court may make such disposition of the case as is equitable to conserve the interests of all parties (50 U. S. C., sec. 531 (3)).

Where a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage upon or to resume possession of personal property, or to rescind or terminate a contract for the purchase thereof, has been stayed as provided in the act, the court may, unless in its opinion, an undue hardship would result to the dependents of the person in military service, appoint three disinterested parties to appraise the property and, based upon the report of the appraisers, order such sum, if any, as may be just, paid to the person in military service or his dependent, as a condition of foreclosing the mortgage, resuming possession of the property, or ending the contract (50 U. S. C. sec. 583).

The act also provides that in any action brought before or after a person enters military service, the court may in its discretion, on its own motion or on application to it by such person, or someone in his behalf, stay the execution of any judgment, and vacate or stay any attachment or garnishment, unless the court finds that military service will not materially affect the ability of the serviceman to comply with the judgment or order. The attachment or garnishment may be stayed whether it is before or after judgment (50 U. S. C. sec. 523).

Any stay of proceedings ordered by any court under the provisions of the act may be for the period of military service and 3 months thereafter, or any part of such period, and subject to such terms of payment and time as may be just (50 U. S. C. sec. 524).

It should be noted that whenever in the act, the right to stay proceedings is granted, the court may in its discretion, grant a like right to those secondarily liable on the installment paper. (50 U. S. C. sec. 513). Further, the act extends its benefits to dependents of persons in military service unless, in the opinion of the court, the ability of such dependents to comply with the terms of the installment contract has not been materially impaired by reason of the military service of the persons upon whom they are dependent (50 U. S. C. sec. 536).

Since the underlying purpose of the act is to protect the property interest of persons in military service and to remove every obstacle to their full devotion to their assigned tasks, the courts are vested with wide discretion in adjusting the terms of installment contracts. However, under the act, the stay of proceedings to enforce an installment contract is not an absolute right, but is dependent upon whether or not military service materially impairs the ability to pay, and whether or not the property is essential to the maintenance and comfort of the dependents of the serviceman.

Rights of Servicemen to Protection on Commercial Insurance Policies

(By Jack High)

If a serviceman desires to be protected on a commercial insurance policy while in the military service, he must make application therefor. The application must be in writing and signed by the insured serviceman. Such application must identify the policy and the insurance company and should state that the serviceman agrees that his rights under the policy are subject to and modified by the provisions of the Soldiers and Sailors Civil Relief Act of 1940, as amended. In case the serviceman is outside the continental United States (excluding Alaska and Panama Canal Zone), a beneficiary under the policy may make the written application described above. The original of such application should be sent to the insurance company and a copy thereof to the Veterans' Administration. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs will determine whether the policy of insurance is entitled to protection and shall notify the insured and the insurance company of such finding. Such protection shall only be afforded on the life of one insured serviceman on a commercial life-insurance policy, or policies, up to $10,000. Any policy found by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to be entitled to protection shall not subsequent to date of application and during the period of military service of the insured or during 2 years after the expiration of such service lapse or otherwise terminate or be forfeited for the nonpayment of a premium becoming due and payable, or the nonpayment of any indebtedness or interest.

The amount paid by the United States to an insurance company on account of applications by insured servicemen shall become a debt due to the United States by the serviceman on whose account payment was made, and such amount may be collected by the United States either by deduction from any amount due said insured by the United States or as otherwise authorized by law.

The above statement is offered only as a guide and is not to be taken as a full statement of the law. The full text of the law is found in the Soldiers and Sailors Civil Relief Act of 1940, as amended (U. S. C. Annotated, title 50, War and National Defense Appendix, secs. 540 through 548).

Rights of the Dependents of Servicemen Against Eviction

(By Jack High)

The dependents of a person in the military service cannot be evicted from premises occupied by them principally as a dwelling where the rent does not exceed $80 per month, unless leave of court is obtained upon application therefor. Where such an application is made by the landlord, the court will not grant said dependents any relief if it finds that the ability of the tenant to pay the agreed rent is not materially affected by reason of such military service. On the other hand, should the court find that the ability of the tenant to pay the agreed rent has been materially affected by reason of such military service, it will, on its own motion, and shall, on application, stay the proceedings for not longer than 3 months, or it may make such other orders as may be just.

At the termination of the stay period, if granted, a tenant may not be evicted because he does not pay all the rent, including the rent accruing during the period in which its collection was stayed. He need only pay or tender the current month's rent.

The above statement is offered as a guide and is not to be taken as a full statement of the law. In support of the above, we cite the Soldiers and Sailors Civil Relief Act of 1940 and the amendments thereto, United States Code Annotated, title 50, War and National Defense—appendix, section 530, and the case of Jonda Realty Corporation v. Marabatto (178 Misc. 393, 34 N. Y., sec. 301).

Rights of Servicemen to Reemployment

(By Charles E. Earnheart)

Veterans' reemployment rights are provided by acts of Congress known as the Selective Service Act of 1940 and amendments thereto, and the new Selective Service Act of 1948. These laws will be found in United States Code Annotated, title 50, War and National Defense—Appendix, section 308, paragraph (b), section 357, paragraphs (a) and (b), and section 459, paragraphs (a) through (h), and Public Laws 572 and 599 of the Eighty-first Congress.

Reemployment statutes in effect prior to June 24, 1948, conferred reemployment rights on persons (principally veterans of World War II) who entered military service subsequent to May 1, 1950. The new Selective Service Act became effective June 24, 1948. This act does not repeal prior legislation covering reemployment rights of persons who served in the Armed Forces prior to June 24, 1948, or were in the Armed Forces on that date. A person having reemployment rights under either the old or new law is entitled to reinstatement in his former position, or a position of like seniority, status, and pay, and is entitled to be consdered as having been on furlough or leave of absence from his old job during his period of military service.

I. UNDER EXISTING LAW A VETERAN HAS A RIGHT TO HIS OLD JOB

If he can meet the following requirements:

(a) If the position was in the employ of a private employer, the United States Government, its Territories or possesions, or political subdivisions thereof, or the District of Columbia. (The 1948 act extends reemployment rights to employees of the legislative and judicial branches of the Federal Government in addition to employees of the executive branch.)

(b) If the position was other than a temporary position.

(c) If he left the position to enter upon active military or naval service in the land or naval forces of the United States, the Coast Guard, or the Public Health Service.

(d) If he satisfactorily completed his period of training and service or period of active duty and received a certificate to that effect.

(e) If he is still qualified to perform the duties of the position. Under the Selective Service Act of 1948 an employee who is disabled in service and unable to perform the duties of his old position is entitled to be restored to another position.

(f) If he applies for reemployment within 90 days after he is relieved from military training and service or from hospitalization continuing after discharge for a period of not more than 1 year.

(g) If such position was in the employ of a private employer, the employer's circumstances have not so changed as to make it impossible or unreasonable to reinstate the veteran to such position or to a position of like seniority, status, and pay.

II. PERSONS WHO ENTERED SERVICE PRIOR TO JUNE 24, 1948, ARE QUALIFIED FOR REEMPLOYMENT RIGHTS

If the conditions described in paragraph I apply, any of the following have legal rights to jobs:

(a) All persons inducted for military training and service under the provisions of the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940, as amended.

(b) Members of any Reserve component of the land or naval forces who were on active duty on August 27, 1940, or who were called to active duty after that date.

(c) All persons who, subsequent to May 1, 1940, have entered upon active military or naval service in the land or naval forces of the United States, including the women's components thereof.

(d) Reserve officers of the United States Public Health Service who were called to active duty after November 11, 1943.

III. WHAT PERSONS ARE QUALIFIED FOR REEMPLOYMENT RIGHTS UNDER THE NEW LAW WHICH BECAME EFFECTIVE JUNE 24, 1948?

If the conditions described in paragraph I apply, any of the following have legal rights to jobs:

(a) All persons inducted for military training and service under the provisions of the Selective Service Act of 1948.

(b) All Reservists who entered upon active duty (as distinguished from active duty for training only) in the Armed Forces of the United States, Coast Guard, and Public Health Service subsequent to June 24, 1948, and prior to July 9, 1951, if relieved from active duty not later than 3 years after entering upon such active duty, or as soon thereafter as orders may be obtained relieving them from active duty.

(c) Any person who, subsequent to June 24, 1948, and prior to July 9, 1951, enlisted in the Armed Forces of the United States or the Coast Guard, for not more than 3 years, if such enlistment is his first enlistment in the Armed Forces or the Coast Guard subsequent to June 24, 1948.

(d) By applying for reemployment within 90 days after being relieved from active duty.

IV. NOTIFICATION TO EMPLOYER

While it is not legally necessary to notify the employer that a serviceman is leaving his job to enter the Armed Forces, it will avoid misunderstanding and facilitate reemployment if such a notice is given in writing.

Paragraph (d) of section 459 provides the remedy for failure of the employer to comply with the provisions of the act; vests jurisdiction in the district court of the United States and provides that the United States district attorney shall act for the claimant.

Numerous decisions have been handed down by the Federal courts interpreting the 1940 act and amendments thereto.

The United States Department of Labor, Bureau of Veterans' Reemployment Rights, Washington, D. C., and Department of Labor, Bureau of Veterans' Reemployment Rights, 1114 Commerce Street, Dallas, Tex., have pamphlets and booklets relative to the question of reemployment.

The Enemy Within Our Gates

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 26, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, while drafting men to fight the Communists in Korea and perhaps in the future on a half dozen other fronts, there are those here in America who not only favor permitting the Communists' representative, Jacob A. Malik, to have a voice and a vote in the Security Council of United Nations, but endorse his demand that another representative of the Reds—this time from China—shall be seated where he may assist Russia's representative.

To me that position seems not only unsound but absurd.

What I believe is a sound, constructive argument which should be given consideration when we determine our future course is an editorial from the pen of Mark Haines, publisher and editor of the Sturgis Daily Journal, published at Sturgis, Mich., and which appeared in the August 19, 1950, issue of that paper. The editorial is as follows:

OUR CHICKENS COME HOME TO ROOST

Owners of television sets are having the doubtful pleasure this month of seeing the inscrutable mug of Jacob A. Malik as he presides over the deliberations of the Security Council of the United Nations at Lake Success. It is a humiliating spectacle.

As the American people watch and listen to this puppet of the Soviet Union respond to the strings pulled in Moscow, it would be interesting if an inquiring reporter could interview them and report their reactions.

Here before their very eyes, and assaulting their ears with scurrilous insults, is an accredited representative of a nation dedicated with fanatic zeal to the enterprise of sovietizing the world.

Here is a 1950 Machiavelli, ruthless and unscrupulous, being permitted to use every parliamentary device to thwart the essential purposes for which the United Nations was formed. He stares insolently at his unseen audience as he contemptuously imposes the will of his masters on practically the entire civilized world.

Of the 59 nations represented on the Security Council 53 have voted approval of the current effort to preserve the liberties of the South Korean Republic against the vicious aggression of the Communists. Malik has not had the consistent support of any other delegates, yet by virtue of the fact that he is a presiding officer, he is able to nullify the almost unanimous will of the Council.

It is little wonder that the people of the United States, as they watch and read about this travesty are bewildered, and wonder how such a situation can exist in this proud and intelligent Nation.

The answer is obvious. It goes back to a fundamental error committed at the time the United Nations was formed in San Francisco. In order to get Russia into the United Nations, our representatives, along with those of other nations, made the fatal mistake of giving the Soviet Union autocratic power to veto any action of the UN of which it did not approve.

Stalin's stooges were, in the end, given everything that they asked for including a free hand in China, North Korea, Manchuria, the Kurile Islands, Poland, Hungary, the Baltic states, and the Balkans. For good measure we threw in billions of dollars worth of lend-lease goods.

Now we are paying a terrific price for this incredible blunder of Roosevelt diplomacy. We were outthought and outmaneuvered and finally put in the futile position of becoming a member of an organization incapable of doing anything to preserve world peace unless it had the approval of Joe Stalin.

And as the American people listen in helpless rage to Malik's mouthings, another question will occur to them. Just how did it happen that Russia was permitted to occupy and sovietize the people of North Korea. By what right did they move in and take over the government of one-half of a nation that had been conquered and occupied by Japan.

Who defeated Japan and delivered the subjugated people of Korea from the grip of that Asiatic tyrant? Was it Russia?

Not by so much as the sacrifice of a single soldier or the expenditure of a ruble of wealth did Russia contribute to our conquest of Japan. It was not until a United States plane dropped an atom bomb on Hiroshima and practically obliterated the city that Russia saw her chance to garner the fruits of our victory without having to fight for them.

The atom bomb which made Japan's defeat certain was dropped on Sunday, August 5, 1945. Four days later Russia declared war on Japan and the next day received Tokyo's offer of surrender. It was without doubt the shortest war on record. Oddly enough, it was this same Malik, who is now ranting and raving at Lake Success, who presented the declaration of war and accepted Japan's surrender.

For this gesture, after the war, to all intents and purposes had been won and the Japs were incapable of further resistance, Russia demanded and received permission to occupy North Korea and other areas of strategic importance for which she had not expended a blow.

That is why American boys are fighting and dying today in a savage war to preserve alleged republican government in an improvised and tribal nation that will not be ready for self-government for another hundred years, if ever.

You ask, who is to blame for this?

Who was the President of the United States that sold his country down the river at Tehran, at Yalta, and at Potsdam?

Our chickens have certainly come home to roost.

Cotton Linters

OF

HON. LINDLEY BECKWORTH

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 26, 1950

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to place in the Appendix of the CONGRES-SIONAL RECORD a letter in regard to cotton linters:

DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY, LEGISLATIVE LIAISON,
Washington, D. C., August 24, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This letter makes reference to your note on my letter of August 5, as well as our subsequent telephone conversation relative to the procurement of cotton linters for use of the armed services.

I have discussed this matter at some length with officials of the Department of the Army, as well as other interested agencies of the Government, and I find that early in August the Chairman, Munitions Board, requested that certain quantities of essential commodities be held as a temporary reserve for the purpose of national security. Chemical grade cotton linters used in the manufacture of gunpowder and propellants is one of the items on this list. The Commodity Credit Corporation instructed their Dallas and San Francisco installations, which are responsible for the sale of this item, to withhold further disposals.

To facilitate this arrangement, the CCC is making available to the Munitions Board on a monthly basis a statement of its inventories which it proposes to sell unless requested to retain them for national defense.

As these inventories are received from the CCC they will be circulated to the three military departments inviting comments. At this time, also, information will be circulated to the three departments as to commodities being held by the CCC at the request of the Department of Defense.

In the event that any military supply organization can foresee the probability of a serious shortage of any material that the CCC is proposing to sell, the recommendation may be made to the Munitions Board that this commodity be retained for the present by the CCC.

It is to be recognized that this is an interim cooperative arrangement to prevent dissipation of essential stocks of critical materials. It is not intended to set a pattern for future operation. Further, arrangements of the services for cotton linters will be governed to a great extent by international developments and until such time as long-range planning can be clearly defined or appropriate legislation enacted, the action cited herein is considered sufficient to insure availability of stocks of essential items to meet current and foreseeable needs of the services.

I am glad to have had the opportunity to develop this information for you. In the event I can be of further service in this connection, please feel free to call upon me at any time.

Sincerely yours,
C. G. BLAKENEY,
Colonel, GSC Office,
Chief of Legislative Liaison.

Report to the Fourth Congressional District of Wisconsin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI

OF WISCONSIN

Saturday, August 26, 1950

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, among the numerous duties of a Congressman, I believe, is a comprehensive report to the people of an account and record of his efforts and votes on the legislation considered by the greatest law-making body on this earth—the United States Congress. By news letters, radio reports, and periodical vists to the district, from my very first week in Congress, I have conscientiously tried to apprise the citizens of the Fourth Congressional District of Wisconsin of my activities in Congress. It was my intention to send a report and record of my vote on every roll call of this session of Congress. However, the international crisis and present conditions necessitate action on legislation for a time longer than the constituency can wait upon such a complete report to pass judgment on the record made by their Congressman.

I sincerely believe, as long as the crisis shall exist, our place is in Washington—regardless of the election contests that may exist in our districts. I, for one, want Congress ever ready for action to cope with the present and any threatening challenges that may be awaiting us in the future.

Therefore, with a personal report impossible, I have prepared a summary of the issues and record of the Eighty-first Congress, including a record of my own activities and votes, which I shall present and circulate as widely as feasible for the scrutiny and judgment of the people in the congressional district which I represent.

MOMENTOUS DECISIONS

As the Eighty-first Congress draws to a close, dramatic world events so overshadow the affairs of us all that, to many of us who have had the honor of serving in the House of Representatives, it, indeed, appears that our task has just begun. On June 25, 1950, before the radios blared forth the tragic news of the Red Kremlin's bloodthirsty decision to change its mode of aggression from stealthy subversion to open armed conflict, Congress was prepared to adjourn. But the Communist decision to strike completely changed the decision of Congress to adjourn. We have a task ahead of us so great, particularly if the crisis should remain unchanged, that it is imperative that we stay here to meet the challenges that may await us.

There are momentous decisions that confront and will confront us—the armament of Germany and Japan; the extension of our ground forces, our Air Force, our Coast Guard, Marine Corps, and Navy; the adequate provision for families of those in our Armed Forces who are repelling our enemy; universal military training, the extension of selective service, and the federalization of the National Guard; the strengthening of the United Nations. Shall we have guns and butter, or just guns? Should we impose an excess-profit tax now or later? How can our freedoms and democracy be protected in a world beset with saboteurs who would use our cherished freedom to destroy us? What will we expect of our allies, and how shall we assist them—with guns, with food, with moral strength? These are problems paramount at the moment, and they affect the lives of us all. In this crisis, we must authorize the allocation of materials, so that guns shall be made instead of automobiles. If we do, how will we prevent competition among buyers for the fewer automobiles to be built? Price controls, and even rationing, are the answer. Should the barbarous masters of the Kremlin decide that this tragic, undeclared war should spread, we must be prepared for atomic attack. And, when the guns are silenced at last, we will face the problem of restoring to sanity a world which since 1917 has been at major war three times, in addition to innumerable lesser conflicts. It will not be easy to restore sane thinking and to provide democratic safeguards and conditions to people who have been at each other's throats for so much of the time since 1917.

This stark picture of things to come is, indeed, an odd way to preface a report on what has happened in Congress during the past 2 years. But we should all be realistic; it is impossible now to talk of the past, except in terms of the future. The problems before us must be viewed in the light of what has passed. From the very first day, on January 1, 1949, when I first entered into the Halls of Congress, till the present, truly, much has happened.

PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S PROGRAM

The Eighty-first Congress was presented with the President's program—a program with which President Truman had won a startling and impressive victory at the polls; and a program with which he had stumped the country, pleading for repeal of the Taft-Hartley law, for civil rights legislation, and for a housing program. He had asked for welfare legislation, a better standard of living for the hungry millions in other countries to enable them to buy American goods His victory confounded his critics who had so maligned the little man from Missouri in the Eightieth Congress. He was given a Democratic Eighty-first Congress. On January 1, 1949, both Houses had a Democratic majority. In the Eightieth Congress, the Senate had a slight Democratic majority; and the Republicans dominated the House of Representatives.

POLITICAL COMPLEXION OF THE EIGHTY-FIRST CONGRESS

But it was not long before I realized that, just as in Madison, where it was my pleasure to serve as State Senator, party labels on occasion did not mean too much. Firstly, there were many problems which were noncontroversial partywise; secondly, there were sectional interests which, to men of both parties, transcended party views; and, thirdly, there were some Democrats who acted like Republicans, and some Republicans who acted like Democrats were supposed to act. All the legislative antics were apparent in Washington, just as they had been in Madison—log rolling, filibustering, delay, personal anger and vilification, politics pure and simple—and then there came out of this mill of controversy the miracle of accomplishment, actual results representing a compromise—the end result of our system of checks and balances—the will of the majority, the greatest good for the greatest number. Looking back, I am amazed that so much happened—that the Congress met and faced so many great and complicated problems. True, not enough was accomplished in some fields—too much in others. But this, the Eighty-first Congress, was not a do-nothing Congress; it acted, and it acted courageously and resolutely on many issues. Time and space do not permit me to go into detail on all the accomplishments and shortcomings of the Eighty-first Congress. In looking over the past, there are evident clues for the future—clues which will indicate how Congress will react to the problems of the future.

Legislation acted upon by Congress can be divided into four basic fields: International affairs, national defense and internal security, human welfare, and Government administration.

INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

As your elected Representative in Congress, I have had the honor of serving on the Foreign Affairs Committee. It was my privilege to observe what goes on behind the iron curtain, and, after one look at Hungary and eastern Germany, and taking into consideration reports from the satellite countries, the Near East, and the Pacific, I knew that America had to bend every effort to strengthen our allies abroad, and to give them moral strength, financial aid, and military help. Although many of the minority party fought, opposed, and attempted to cripple and slash the efforts in international affairs and policy, the isolationists were unsuccessful in blemishing the record of the Eighty-first Congress. The North Atlantic Pact, the European recovery program, Point 4—the program for international development, the Displaced Persons Act, Mutual Defense Assistance Act, and the far eastern economic assistance program were enacted. The latter legislation, in the light of the present crisis, demands close scrutiny of the record of certain Congressmen. The first vote on this issue in the House of Representatives was deplorable. One hundred and ninety-three new-type isolationists, including seven Congressmen from Wisconsin, voted against aid to Korea. Let us be thankful that this ill-advised vote was finally reversed and that aid to Korea was voted despite the opposition. Further, in our foreign program, I was an early supporter of the mutual defense program, and have voted for all legislation which put into effect this "actions speak louder than words" rearmament program for our allies. It is my contention that the Point 4 program is one of the great cornerstones of future peace, and, therefore, I supported it. Under its provisions the underdeveloped nations of the world will be helped to lift themselves up by their democratic bootstraps through the acquisition of American technical skill and know-how. In the field of foreign affairs the Eighty-first Congress made, fortunately, due in no small measure to some bipartisan efforts, an enviable record. My record on foreign-affairs legislation is a clue as to how your Congressman will vote to help solve such problems in the future.

NATIONAL DEFENSE AND INTERNAL SECURITY

In the field of national defense, the strong right arm of our national security, the Eighty-first Congress can boast of the following legislative program: Reorganization of the Armed Forces; additional military installations; extension of the Rubber Resources Act of 1948 to 1952; extended enlistments, and the Selective Service Act; the increase in composition and authorized strength of the Armed Forces of the United States; benefits to servicemen and to their dependents; strategic and critical material programs continued and expanded; controls on subversives enacted; authorization given to the President to regulate and, if necessary, seize any foreign-flag vessel within the territorial limits of the United States if the national security is endangered, and to take necessary measures to prevent sabotage in American ports. The Eighty-first Congress effected a uniform code of justice. I have voted for all appropriations which would strengthen our military forces in all branches. What I saw in Europe convinced me of the need for an armed force second to none—and the sooner the better. And simultaneously with providing for a multigroup air force and land force, the Eighty-first Congress provided for the adequate pay for the young men and women who, in time of peace or war, aid their country by serving in the Armed Forces. Legislation was passed to revise service pay upward; and bills to better house America's fighting men at home, in Alaska, and overseas were enacted. These again are clues as to how your present Congressman will help resolve the issues of the future in the field of national defense.

SOCIAL SECURITY

The Eighty-first Congress passed legislation extending old-age and survivors insurance to 10,000,000 additional people. Benefits were increased to all eligible recipients from at 50 to 100 per cent, with the smaller beneficiaries receiving the highest percentage increases. Future beneficiaries shall receive monthly retirement benefits about 100 percent higher than present benefits. Eligibility requirements for future beneficiaries were greatly liberalized, and various new types of benefits were provided. The amount which insured persons may earn without loss of benefits was increased from $15 to $50 per month. Federal contributions and grants to State public-assistance programs were considerably increased.

This legislation received my support and goes far to improve the lot of our senior citizens, and of those who may someday be unemployed. Perhaps the bill could be still better; but social security is a changing thing, and as time goes by, it will be even further improved. It is my contention that such improvements must be forthcoming.

LABOR LEGISLATION

In the field of labor legislation, the Eighty-first Congress failed to repeal or make more equitable the Taft-Hartley Act. This act, which follows the pattern of the original Smith-Connally Act and other acts designed to hinder free collective bargaining, has proven to be inequitable in many respects. My record indicates that my vote was in the interest of the workingman and for the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act.

HUMAN WELFARE

In the field of human welfare, the Eighty-first Congress could have done more. Believing that we should have passed the civil rights proposals set forth by the President, I so voted. Unfortunately, this issue became a political football; and it will have to be worked for, once again, in the Eighty-second Congress. Ultimately, adequate legislation will pass; and then we will take away from the Communists one of their greatest propaganda weapons—the political capital they continue to make the world over on the lack of civil rights in the United States of America. I believe it is a matter of common decency that all our citizens, regardless of race, color, or creed, be entitled to the same rights and privileges.

The Eighty-first Congress enacted, and I have supported, measures for low-rent housing, for slum clearance, for aid to farm housing, and for housing research. The House should have supported legislation to enlarge our medical schools, as passed by the Senate; our medical colleges are in need of funds to make possible the education of additional physicians and nurses so greatly needed. The extension of rent controls in March 1949, received my approbation; and if rents should continue to go up, if new housing construction again should be halted by the tempo of world affairs, and if the present rapid rise in prices should continue, I would again support such legislation. It is the people of this Nation who will, in the final outcome, determine the need for the application of regulatory measures. I sincerely hope that business and consumers will voluntarily avoid conditions which would demand the application of extensive Federal controls.

In the field of education, I voted for the National Science Foundation, and will support nondiscriminatory Federal aid to education.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

In the field of Government administration, I have favored Government economy that will not lessen the service of the Government itself. The determination should be and was for waste elimination, but not for government by erasure. There were 35 reorganization measures, based on the recommendations of the Hoover Commission, before Congress. All of them have received my support; 26 received congressional approbation. Feeling that in periods of national prosperity there should be no national deficit, I have favored taxes in an amount sufficient to reduce the national debt. With that as a clue, it will be seen that your Congressman will favor measures to take all profit out of war, and to impose real excess-profits taxes in the face of huge armament expenditures.

Since the duty of a Congressman, no less than the duty of the man in uniform, requires that he be at his post, I have tried by this report to put before you as clearly and sincerely as possible my views of present problems, a summary of my stewardship as your Congressman during the last 2 years, and some indication of the problems ahead.

My record is an open book. Thousands of letters which you have been good enough to write, expressing your views and opinions, aided in keeping me apprised and abreast with the "pulse" of the people in my district on the problems of the ship of state. Before important votes, I made it my business to return to Milwaukee to talk to as many citizens as possible to get their views. It was with these views in mind that I formulated my opinion on specific legislation which came before Congress.

I was pleased to have your views, but we should bear in mind that it is a privilege to give expression of views and opinions on governmental affairs—an opportunity not afforded and granted by nondemocratic nations.

America is a country expecting sacrifice and homage from every one of us. The aggressors overseas are countries demanding blind obedience from every citizen. Our free way of life is again meeting trial by fire. We will win that fight. We will win it because we have that inner dignity of the spirit which moves each and every one of us to consider our actions truly in the light of what is best for the common good. We make those decisions; they are not made for us. Fitting into this process of making decisions is Congress and your Congressman. For Congress is your voice; and, make no mistake about it, your voice is always heard. Each 2 years at the polls, you have the opportunity to record your approval or disapproval of the kind of representation your voice has had in the National Legislature during the preceding period. Do not fail to avail yourself of the opportunity of approval or disapproval of your voice in Congress.

I humbly submit the following record to the people of the Fourth Congressional District of Wisconsin, whom it was a pleasure to represent in Congress, and invite their reactions and suggestions:

The Capstone

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAM HOBBS
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 23, 1950

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, during the commencement exercises of the University of Alabama, on the evening of June 5, 1950, the pleasure was mine of speaking to the alumni banquet. Several of those who were present have asked me to try to recall what was said and put it into the Appendix of the RECORD:

THE CAPSTONE

Mr. President, officers, faculty, fellow alumni, and distinguished guests, we who love our alma mater, glory in the challenging name given her by Dr. Denny; not as bosast, but as prayer. It was true, as history, while as prophecy of a goal to be won by endless struggle up the slope, it was even more inspiring.

The great chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, Judge Hatton Sumners, loved to call himself a "God fan." He elucidates his philosophy of living somewhat like this: "If God had wanted us on top of the hill, He would have put us there. But that would have made fools of us, and denied us the privilege of growth by the struggle to climb. We'll never get on top; that's God's place, from which He helps all who try."

Dr. Peter Marshall, the late pastor of the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church, of Washington, and Chaplain of the United States Senate, made famous this saying: "One who is an enthusiastic follower of any sport is called a 'fan.' He takes pride in being a 'fan' and in being called one. 'Fan' is a good word as applied to every enthusiasm save religion, but when one becomes enthusiastic about his religion he is called a 'fanatic.'"

What this world needs more than anything else is more "God fans," the best kind of fanatics, and the crowning glory of the capstone should be to produce them.

President James A. Garfield, when asked What does it take to make a great university? reolied: "Mark Hopkins on one end of a log with a boy on the other."

This definition caused Arthur Guiterman to write:

EDUCATION

"Mark Hopkins sat on one end of a log
And a farm boy sat on the other
Mark Hopkins came as a pedagogue
And taught as an elder brother.
I don't care what Mark Hopkins taught—
If his Latin was small and his Greek was naught—
For the farmer's boy he thought, thought he,
All through lecture time and quiz,
'The kind of a man I mean to be
Is the kind of a man Mark Hopkins is.'
Philosophy, languages, medicine, law,
Are peacock feathers to deck the daw,
If the boys who come from your splendid schools
Are well-trained sharpers or flippant fools,
You may brag of your age and your ivied walls,
Your great endowments, your noble halls
And all your modern features,
Your vast curriculum's scope and reach
And the multifarious things you teach—
But how about the teachers?
Are they men who will stand in a father's place,
Who are paid, best paid, by the ardent face

When boyhood gives, as boyhood can,
Its love and faith to a fine, true man?
No printed page nor spoken plea
May teach young hearts what men should be—
Not all the books on all the shelves,
But what the teachers are themselves.
For education is: Making men;
So is it now, so was it when
Mark Hopkins sat on one end of a log
And a farm boy sat on the other."

Our forefathers came to this new land seeking God, not gold. They dedicated themselves and their colony to God. The golden threads of religion have strengthened the warp and woof of the fabric of our national character.

Dr. Daniel L. Marsh has made this clear in his excellent book The American Canon. The seven constituent elements:

I. The Genesis of American democracy: The Mayflower compact.

II. Our Exodus: The Declaration of Independence.

III. Our Book of the Law: The Constitution of the United States.

IV. Our Major Prophecy: Washington's Farewell Address.

V. A Psalm of America: The Star-Spangled Banner.

VI. Our Gospel of Americanism: Lincoln's Second Inaugural Address.

VII. An Epistle to the Americans: Woodrow Wilson's Road Away From Revolution.

All of the major prophets of today voice the same old appeal; the only modern challenge. These are a few of them:

Frank Laubach, the apostle of literacy.

Eric Johnston, who cites Chiang Kai-shek, losing with war; while Ghandi won by practicing peace.

Sir Carl Berendsen, faith is the victory.

Billy Graham, 70,000 crowd Boston Common to hear him. The first evangelist invited to speak to Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Senator MARGARET CHASE SMITH, declaration of conscience: "It is high time that we stopped thinking politically as Republicans and Democrats about elections and started thinking patriotically as Americans about national security based on individual freedom. It is high time that we all stopped being tools and victims of totalitarian techniques—techniques that, if continued unchecked, will surely end what we have come to cherish as the American way of life."

Gen. George C. Marshall, on Memorial Day, 1950, at the Amphitheater in Arlington Cemetery and the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier, the World War II Chief of Staff, and later Secretary of State, after pleading for continuation of the Marshall plan, enjoined a listening world: "But material assistance alone is not sufficient. The most important thing for the world today, in my opinion, is a spiritual regeneration which would restore a feeling of good faith and good will among men generally."

With the voices of the major prophets of today still ringing in our ears and hearts, there is a voice of yesterday still vibrant and strong as he gives us the same message, in his last written word. Woodow Wilson also spoke for today: "That supreme task, which is nothing less than the salvation of civilization now faces democracy, insistent, imperative.

"The sum of the whole mater is this, that our civilization cannot survive materially unless it be redeemed spiritually. It can be saved only by becoming permeated with the spirit of Christ and being made free and happy by the practices which spring out of that spirit. Only thus can discontent be driven out and all the shadows lifted from the road ahead."

So, the grandeur of our alma mater has been and will continue to be builded by the profound scholarship plus the inspiring character of the leaders who have here invested their lives, fully appreciating the chief end of education.

We Need an American Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CECIL M. HARDEN

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 26, 1950

Mrs. HARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I request unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD at the conclusion of today's business.

Mr. Speaker, the American people are deeply disturbed by the disastrous failure of the foreign policy heretofore pursued by their Government and are apprehensive lest future blundering jeopardize their very national existence.

Mr. Speaker, the American people demand an end to secret commitments and decisions made on a day-to-day and crisis-to-crisis basis. They demand an openly arrived at American foreign policy they can support and understand.

Mr. Speaker, the American people have the right to know what is the foreign policy of their Government. And they have a right to assess that policy before they are called upon to shed their blood and exhaust their treasure in war.

Mr. Speaker, the foreign policy of our Government today is not a policy which has the confidence of the people. Nor is it a policy which the people understand. In truth, it is not a policy which the Members of this Congress understand, for we know far too little of its content.

Mr. Speaker, on August 25, I introduced in this body House Joint Resolution 526, which has as its purpose the immediate formation of a Select Committee of the House and the Senate. It will be the duty of this committee to consider and recommend a foreign policy designed to meet the pressing problems of the American people in their relations with the world.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the immediate consideration of my resolution.

Repair of Reserve Fleet Vessels

OF

HON. RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 26, 1950

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I am happy in the action which the House has just taken to provide for the repair and activation of vessels of the reserve fleet. It is long overdue.

Over a year ago a similar request for $25,000,000 to cover essential repairs for 134 vessels, representing an initial investment of $800,000,000, was defeated in conference due to the lack of a favorable budget recommendation from the President.

At that time the Joint Chiefs of Staff in endorsing the expenditure had pointed out that the ability of the United States to meet the demands of shipping in the event of war is largely dependent upon the material condition of the merchant shipping held in the inactive reserve; that many of the ships in the reserve were inoperable due to need of repairs and that from the military point of view it was highly desirable to accomplish the minimum essential repairs of all these vessels as rapidly as possible.

I supported the proposal last summer, calling for the expenditure of $25,000,000. Some time ago, I introduced a bill calling for the action just approved by the House, and authorizing an appropriation not exceeding $50,000,000.

The repair work is important with a view to an adequate reserve fleet which can be utilized immediately in case of need. It is vital from the standpoint of the preservation of our essential shipyards and our forces of skilled workers at those yards, who have proved themselves to be so invaluable in time of war.

The situation in our ship construction yards is becoming deplorable. Employment has been deteriorating rapidly. Skilled workers who have given the best years of their lives to ship construction are confronted by the possibility of unemployment. Under present conditions there will be only one merchant ship under construction in the Atlantic yards after December 1951. Under present conditions there will be little or no naval construction before 1952.

Those at the yards see once again the specter of conditions prevailing between 1922-37.

And, Mr. Speaker, when they turn their eyes toward Washington, they see the so-called long range construction program blocked by the President through the Bureau of the Budget and the Treasury Department. They see the failure of the administration to offer any constructive substitute for this legislation. They know that the repair program just approved has been blocked by the President for more than a year through the Bureau of the Budget, and they know that this House on yesterday afternoon voted to limit the number of ship subsidy contracts in this time of mobilization to 263 or only three more than actually in effect 8 months ago on January 1, 1950. It is disheartening.

The action of the House if approved by the Senate and the President will provide for the repair and activation of 135 vessels and for the repair and return to the reserve fleet of 46 vessels, a total of 181 vessels at a cost of some $27,000,000.

Eighteen million dollars is provided here—$9,000,000 will be provided by the Military Sea Transportation Service.

I congratulate the House on the action which it has taken.

More Power for the B–36

OF
HON. OVERTON BROOKS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend and revise my remarks I include an editorial taken from the Washington Star of August 25, 1950, entitled "More Power for the B–36." It is well worth reading:

MORE POWER FOR THE B–36

The distinctive characteristics of the Korean war have produced a kind of publicity eclipse for the B–36. It is not the kind of war for which the Air Force's intercontinental bomber was designed. The smaller bombers—B–29's and B–50's—operating from bases in Japan have ample range to reach any target in North Korea, and, consequently, there has been no reason to send the biggest of all bombers into action. This, naturally enough, has evoked some caustic criticism from those who have never had much faith in the B–36 and even less understanding of what it is supposed to do.

But this does not mean that the experience in Korea has in any way depreciated the importance of the giant bomber. If anything, the Korean war has rather tended to emphasize and enlarge our dependence on the B–36.

The fighting qualities of the North Korean puppet troops, Russian-trained and Russian-equipped, should have thoroughly dissipated any wishful thinking as to our prospects in a conventional ground war with the Russians and their allies and puppets. We simply cannot undertake to fight that kind of war with any hope of success. American ground forces will be needed, of course, for certain operations, as will the Navy. But we would be doomed in advance if we should try to conduct against the Russians the kind of war that Hitler waged.

Despite the detractors of strategic air power, a war with Russia in the foreseeable future will be, to a very large degree, an air war. We will have to look to our long-range bombers, and any other means of effective attack over great distances, to go in and destroy the Russian centers of war production. If that can be done, there would be some reasonable prospect of dealing with the Soviet ground forces which, meanwhile, will have swept into Europe. If that cannot be done, if we cannot knock out the vital centers of Russian power in Russia, then we will surely discover that there is very little we can do anywhere.

It is against this background that the announcement of the delivery to the Air Force of its first jet-equipped B–36 assumes special interest. This is a project that has been long in the making, and there were skeptics who said it could not be done. But it has been done. The remodeled plane, in addition to its six reciprocating engines, has four jet engines mounted under the outer wing panels. This means greater power and greater speed, especially over target areas, where speed and altitude can be the difference between success and failure.

With all of our B–36's scheduled for similar renovation, the strategic bomber fleet should be both a more effective deterrent to war and a more effective striking weapon if war with Russia should come. In any event, this latest announcement is gratifying evidence of the effort being made to improve this cardinal weapon in our armory.

Director of Central Intelligence

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 26, 1950

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, Admiral Hillenkoetter has done a superb job as Director of Central Intelligence, and as he now returns to active sea duty with the Navy, I wish to add my words of commendation for his performance as the Director of Central Intelligence. Admiral Hillenkoetter has had a long career in intelligence: first as naval attaché in France, then as Admiral Nimitz's intelligence chief in the Pacific, and finally as head of the Central Intelligence Agency. No witness who has appeared before our committees in recent years has been more frank and open in answering questions, or more informative on the world situation. We will all miss him and wish him the very best of luck in his new assignment.

Section 2 of H. R. 9158 Would Frustrate Intention of Previous Congress and Makes Possible Further Abuses of the Multiple Seizure Device

OF
HON. CLYDE DOYLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 22, 1950

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, one of the less apparent but nevertheless considerable evils of H. R. 9158 is contained in section 2 of the bill, which provides:

> The Federal Security Administrator or, under his direction and supervision, such officers and employees of the Federal Security Agency as he designates, shall execute his functions under this part.

No such provision is contained in the present law. The practical effect of this section would be to permit the Federal Security Administrator to delegate his powers and functions under the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act to any of his subordinates or employees of the Agency. While this would appear to be relatively innocuous on its face, it is believed that such a provision in the bill would frustrate and scuttle the intention of the Congress in enacting certain provisions of the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act of 1938. This is particularly so in regard to the multiple seizure provisions found in section 154 of H. R. 9158 (which is substantially identical with the present provisions of section 304 of the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act of 1938). The long legislative history of the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act of 1938 shows that it was the specific intention of the Congress to authorize probable cause determinations, which normally are conditions precedent to multiple seizures, to be made only by the Administrator of the Federal Security Agency.

CONGRESSIONAL INTENT IGNORED AND FLOUTED BY THE ADMINISTRATOR

Experience has shown that the Administrator of the Federal Security Agency has ignored the obvious intent of the Congress to permit multiple seizure determinations to be made only by the Administrator. At least in one known instance, the Administrator has permitted subordinate employees of the Agency, in direct violation of the provisions of section 304 (a) of the Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act of 1938, to make probable cause determinations authorizing multiple seizures. Since this one known instance involves several of my constituents I am quite conversant with the circumstances surrounding it. Between October 1948, and January 1949, 11 seizure actions were filed against a mutiple vitamin and mineral product known as Nutrilite and distributed by Mytinger and Casselberry, Inc., of Long Beach, Calif. These seizure actions were instituted in far-flung jurisdictions throughout the United States—i. e., Belleville, N. J.; New York, N. Y.; Buffalo, N. Y.; Hastings, Nebr.; Spokane, Wash.; Seattle, Wash.; Clarkfield, Minn.; St. Petersburg, Fla.; and Chicago, Ill.—without giving Mytinger and Casselberry, Inc., any notice or an opportunity to be heard. In December 1948, this firm filed suit in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia seeking to enjoin officials of the Federal Security Agency from making further seizures of the product Nutrilite. Upon a filing of a motion to dismiss by the defendant officials in that action, it was discovered for the first time that the probable cause determinations authorizing the multiple seizures of Nutrilite were made not by the Administrator of the Federal Security Agency but rather by Charles W. Crawford, Associate Commissioner of Food and Drugs, Paul B. Dunbar, Commissioner of Food and Drugs, and George P. Larrick, Associate Commissioner of Food and Drugs. On January 24, 1949, Judge David A. Pine of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia held that the failure of the Administrator himself to make the determinations authorizing multiple seizures violated the Act. Judge Pine held that since the multiple seizure provisions were so drastic and harsh, the Congress intended that the important decision to make them was to be made by the Administrator personally and further, that the legislative history clearly shows that this duty was not to be delegated to any subordinate of the Administrator.

In holding that the defendant officials had failed to comply with the Act which required the Administrator of the Federal Security Agency to make the determinations of probable cause, Judge Pine stated as follows:

> The COURT. * * * I am of the view that when Congress gives the authority contained in the Federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act which permits him to make multiple seizures when the Administrator has probable cause to believe from facts found with or without a hearing, by him or any officer or employee of the agency, that the misbranded article would be in a material respect misleading to the injury and damage of the purchaser or consumer, that the provisions of the statute should be strictly followed. They have not been strictly followed here because the Administrator, as administrator, has not stated he had probable cause to believe these things * * * I cannot grant the relief sought by the administrator at this time because I feel there has not been a strict and literal compliance with the statute and that there should be one when such a drastic and harsh provision of law permits the acts contemplated.

It is obvious that the ruling of Judge Pine in the case of Mytinger and Casselberry against Ewing and others, properly emphasized the fact that the Congress, being completely cognizant of the drastic nature of the multiple seizure device, had vested the power to authorize and recommend such action only in the Administrator of the Federal Security Agency, for it was obvious that only those having the highest degree of responsibility should be authorized to bring into play such a course of action having such serious consequences on a business.

I do not know whether section 2 of H. R. 9158 was proposed by the Federal Security Agency or the Food and Drug Administration as a result of Judge Pine's ruling. Nevertheless, it is obvious that the section is diametrically opposed to the intention of the Congress and would apparently authorize a minor irresponsible official or employee of the Federal Security Agency to unleash a multiple-seizure campaign which could destroy a beneficial and legitimate business before there was any opportunity to be heard on the claims alleged against a product or its labeling. Every effort should be made to limit possible abuses of the multiple-seizure device. Yet the effect of section 2 of H. R. 9158 would be to increase substantially the possibilities of abuse of that power. Congress originally decided that this tremendous power should only be in the Administrator and that is where it should remain if it is to exist at all. I have introduced H. R. 5466 to change this great uncontrolled power by amending the present act and those amendments are explained in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at page A5924.

THE LEGISLATIVE HISTORY OF THE MULTIPLE SEIZURE PROVISIONS GRAPHICALLY DISCLOSES THE CONGRESSIONAL INTENT THAT ONLY THE ADMINISTRATOR OF THE FEDERAL SECURITY AGENCY COULD MAKE PROBABLE CAUSE DETERMINATIONS AUTHORIZING MULTIPLE SEIZURES

The history of the various bills which ultimately become the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act of 1938 discloses beyond any doubt that the Congress in providing in section 304 (a) of that act that multiple seizures could be made when the Administrator of the Federal Security Agency has probable cause to believe that certain facts exist intended that the Administrator and only the Administrator should have this power. The multiple seizure provisions were of major interest to the Congress and received detailed consideration and study. In 1933 Senator Royal S. Copeland of New York introduced S. 1944 into the Senate of the United States—Seventy-third Congress, first session. This bill represented the initial congressional effort to amend the Food and Drug Act. One of the greatest difficulties encountered in the congressional consideration of the bill was the multiple seizure provisions. Section 16 (a) of S. 1944 introduced by Senator Copeland provided that adulterated or misbranded foods, drugs and cosmetics should be liable to seizure by, first, process pursuant to libel, or second, if a chief of station or other officer of the Food and Drug Administration, duly designated by the Secretary, has probable cause to believe that the article is so adulterated as to be imminently dangerous to health, then, and in such case only, by order of such officer, issued under his oath of office, particularly describing the article to be seized, the place where located, and the officer and employee to make the seizure. Thus it will be observed that the original bill contains specific authority for chiefs of stations or other officers if duly designated by the Secretary of Agriculture, under whose jurisdiction the Food and Drug Act was then placed by law, to make probable cause determinations necessary for seizure.

Subsequent to the introduction of S. 1944, S. 2000 and S. 2800 were introduced by Senator Copeland as substitutes and revisions of S. 1944. Neither S. 2000 nor S. 2800 contained any changes to section 16 (a), S. 1944, as quoted above. In Senate Report No. 493 dated March 15, 1934, and which accompanied S. 2800 to the floor of the Senate, the Senate committee specifically recognized that officials other than the Secretary could act where the public health demanded but the report notes that the Secretary was specifically to designate the officials who could act under this section. S. 2800 was not, however, enacted by the Senate. During the Seventy-fourth Congress, Senator Copeland again introduced a bill known as S. 5 in which section 711 (a) embodied the provisions of section 16 (a) of S. 1944, S. 2000, and S. 2800 which authorize probable cause determinations to be made by chiefs of station or other employees duly designated by the Secretary. Section 711 (a) of S. 5 also required that the facts upon which the seizure was based be duly reported to the Secretary.

The next development in the Senate occurred on April 8, 1935, when the so-called Bailey amendment to section 711 (a) was accepted. This amendment provided in part as follows:

Provided, however, That no more than one seizure action shall be instituted in cases of alleged misbranding, except upon order to show cause, and then upon a showing by the Secretary that such article is misbranded in manner or degree as to render such article imminently dangerous to health, or that such alleged misbranding has been the basis of a prior judgment in favor of the United States in a criminal prosecution or libel for condemnation proceeding respecting such article under this act: And provided further, That said single seizure action shall, on motion, be removed for trial to a jurisdiction of reasonable proximity to the residence of the claimant of such article.

The above amendment clearly rejected the idea that "chiefs of stations" or "employees" could have probable cause and instead placed upon the Secretary the duty of making "a showing that the article is misbranded."

The next development in the Senate was highly significant in that it discloses the protective cloak by which the Congress had always intended the multiple seizure provisions of the present act to be surrounded. On May 28, 1935, S. 5 was enacted by the Senate, with still a further change in section 711 (a). As passed by the Senate, this section now reads as follows:

Any article of food, drug, device, or cosmetic that is adulterated or misbranded when introduced into or while in interstate commerce, or that has been manufactured, processed, or packed in a factory or establishment, the operator of which did not, at the time of manufacture, processing or packing, hold an unsuspended valid permit, if so required by regulations under section 305, shall be liable to be proceeded against while in interstate commerce or at any time thereafter on libel of information and condemned in any district court of the United States within the jurisdiction of which the article is found, provided, however, that not more than one seizure shall be instituted in cases of alleged misbranding, except when the Secretary has probable cause to believe from facts found by him that such article is so misbranded as to render it imminently dangerous to health, or when such alleged misbranding has been the basis of a prior judgment in favor of the United States in a criminal prosecution or libel for condemnation proceeding under this act respecting such article, and provided further, that said single seizure action shall, on motion, be removed for trial to the jurisdiction of the claimant's residence.

The Senate therefore said that the Secretary must not only have the probable cause but must also find the facts, and rejected the previous thoughts that chiefs of stations or other employees could have the probable cause, or even that the Secretary must make a showing.

S. 5 then went to the House of Representatives, where the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce offered an amendment to section 711 (a), renumbering it 709 (a), and making certain textual changes not of pertinence here. They did not, however, alter in any manner the emphasized language in the above quotation. On June 19, 1936, S. 5 passed the House of Representatives as reported to it, and the bill went to a conference committee of the Senate and House where the bill died, the conferees being unable to agree on who or what agency was to enforce the act.

Again, in the first session of the Seventy-fifth Congress, on January 6, 1937, Senator Copeland reintroduced, as S. 5, his measure. In this version, section 6 (a), as introduced, was identical with section 709 (a) which had been advanced by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce at the previous session of Congress, except in one respect. The word "imminently" was omitted.

The bill was referred to the Senate Committee on Commerce, and on February 15, 1937, a favorable report was rendered, the word "imminently" being reinserted, and the second proviso being shortened to read as follows:

When the Secretary has probable cause to believe from facts found by him that such misbranding of the article renders it imminently dangerous to health.

Senate Report 91, which accompanied S. 5, stated as follows:

This bill permits multiple seizures of any food, drug, device, or cosmetic that is adulterated. It permits multiple seizures for misbranding when the misbranding has been the basis of a prior judgment in favor of the Government, or when the Secretary of Agriculture has probable cause to believe, from facts found by him, that the misbranding renders the article dangerous to health.

The only limitation is that misbranding which does not render an article dangerous to health, shall not be handled by multiple seizures made at the will of enforcement officers. That has been the declared policy of the Food and Drug Administration in enforcing the existing law. The bill therefore does no more than write into the law what is declared to be the policy of the Administration. But it is important that that policy be written into the bill because it is the proper policy, and because succeeding administrations should be held to that policy.

Senate Report No. 91, from which the above quotation is taken was, however, withdrawn, and Senate Report No. 152 replaced it. In Senate Report 152 the following statement with reference to multiple seizures was made:

This bill permits multiple seizures of any food, drug, device, or cosmetic that is adulterated. It permits multiple seizures for misbranding when the misbranding has been the basis of a prior judgment in favor of the Government or when the Secretary of Agriculture has probable cause to believe, from facts found by him, that the misbranding renders the article actually dangerous to health.

The only limitation is that misbranding which does not render an article actually dangerous to health or is, in a material respect, false and fraudulent, shall not be handled by multiple seizures made at the will of enforcement officers.

While this actually does impose a limitation on seizure of food, drugs, and cosmetics it does confer, in the opinion of the committee, sufficient power for adequate public protection.

Still, the Congress believed that the Secretary was the one who should not only have the probable cause, but who should actually find the facts.

S. 5 was enacted by the Senate on March 9, 1937. Following Senate passage, the bill went to the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and a subcommittee was appointed to study the bill. This subcommittee recommended no change in section 6 (a) as passed by the Senate, except in its numerical designation, making it 304 (a). The full committee, however, made the most significant change thus far when it eliminated the words "from facts found by him." This omission clearly supports the conclusion that the intent was to require the Secretary to have the probable cause, but that he need not find the facts necessary to sustain the probable cause. This conclusion is inescapable when the language of previous measures considered by Congress is compared with that used by the committee.

S. 5 passed the House on June 1, 1938, and immediately thereafter a conference committee was appointed to reconcile the differences in the House and Senate versions of the bill. This conference committee met and submitted a report which contained the present language of section 304 (a) of the act. The report was accepted by both Houses of Congress, and S. 5 became the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act of 1938.

It is obvious from the foregoing that the Congress certainly intended for the Secretary to be the individual who determines whether or not multiple seizures would be made. First, they required him to designate those officials who could have the probable cause; then they added to that the further requirement that the facts be reported to him; then they placed upon the Secretary the burden of not only having the probable cause but also of finding the facts; and, then, finally, left to him the duty of having the probable cause, based upon the fact-finding activities of other officials, thereby cutting down somewhat upon the personal duties formerly thought necessary to impose upon the Secretary. The Secretary's role in the multiple-seizure device is, therefore, a matter of clear legislative intent.

In this connection, it should be noted that by the reorganization plan of 1940, the functions and duties of the Food and Drug Administration were transferred from the Department of Agriculture to the Federal Security Agency. The Federal Security Administrator, therefore, succeeded to the duties and responsibilities theretofore in the Secretary of Agriculture. Certainly Mr. Ewing, the Administrator of the Federal Security Agency, is not as important as the Secretary of Agriculture who is a Cabinet officer. The reorganization plan of 1940 thus in effect placed the multiple seizure power in a person of lesser responsibility. Section 2 of H. R. 9158 would whittle away still further the intent of Congress to place the multiple seizure power in those having a high degree of responsibilit .

CONCLUSION

I respectfully submit that section 2 of H. R. 9158 should be deleted from the proposed bill. If it is deemed advisable to authorize the Administrator of the Federal Security Agency to delegate certain functions, I believe that these should be spelled out specifically. I strongly reject any delegation of power concerning the authority to make determinations of probable cause in regard to multiple seizures. We must not cast aside in a moment of carelessness so fundamental a principle which was resolved by the Congress after years of study and consideration.

On August 17, 1950, I offered for your information, proposed amendments to the existing Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act of 1938 as amended, and made a statement appearing in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on pages A5824–A5927, explaining the amendments.

Rear Adm. Roscoe H. Hillenkoetter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEON H. GAVIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 26, 1950

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all the Members of the House heard with interest Friday night of the President's appointment of Lt. Gen. Walter Bedell Smith as the new Director of the Central Intelligence Agency, and the assignment of Rear Adm. Roscoe H. Hillenkoetter, the present Director, to the command of a cruiser division.

Those of us who have known the admiral, have realized that for many months—long before the outbreak of the Korean crisis—he had been desirous of returning to sea duty. Those of us who have heard him testify on various occasions before congressional committees, realize that he is one of the outstanding public servants in the Government, and his position will be a difficult one to fill. His frankness and honesty in his appearances before our committees have made a universally fine impression. His performance as Director of Central Intelligence merits from all of us a hearty well done.

Report on Alaska

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. L. BARTLETT
DELEGATE FROM ALASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 28, 1950

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, it is a long time since I have read an article about Alaska which so captured the flavor and vastness of the country as that written by Jessie Ash Arndt, woman's editor of the Christian Science Monitor, and which appeared in the Monitor of August 23. Believing this article will convey a truer understanding of Alaska, I take pleasure in presenting it here:

RESOURCES AMAZE VISITOR IN BRIEF TOUR OF TERRITORY

(By Jessie Ash Arndt)

Alaska, it could be said, begins in the attractive little town of Ketchikan. That is where I boarded the 58-foot motor launch Forester, flagship of the United States Forest Service, for a journey through the inside passage to Juneau on a trip that was to take me to the Bering Sea.

Ketchikan, like other towns in southeastern Alaska, which planted themselves against the edge of the Tongass National Forest, reaches a short distance back into it and stretches along about 17 miles of forest. That's all. If you look at the map you will find Ketchikan is written in large, black letters like Chicago or Tulsa or Seattle. But it has only about 6,000 population.

Our host aboard was Chester M. Archbold, the forester who is in charge of 6,000,000 of the 16,000,000 acres of the Tongass; Mrs. Archbold was our hostess. The skipper was Art Thompson, also of the Forest Service, who once had been a deep-sea diver.

It was reassuring to have two men who knew both the forest and the sea in charge of our little ship. Four hours over smooth water, which constantly reflected in color the variegated mountains, brought us to the piling of an old cannery dock. The cannery had burned, and because the trend now is toward larger canning operations, had not been rebuilt.

PROFOUND RESPONSE

We tied up for the night in a wilderness of mountains, forest, and water that made the visitor understand, early in his journey, the best description of Alaska—this section or any other—of which I know. A Negro from the United States, when asked his impression of Alaska, pondered and then replied: "Well, it's just miles and miles of miles and miles."

The next day we headed for Wrangell via Ann Creek. At this point the Forest Service has marked a trail from the shore into the forest. Maybe 200 persons get there in a year, Mr. Archbold told us. That morning we learned what Longfellow meant by "the forest primeval." Ancient, moss grown, and moss draped, it seemed unreal; yet there we were, with tremendous spruce and hemlock towering overhead; twisted trunks and roots about us; and the ground dogwood, fern, and myriad other forest plants beneath our feet sunk in spongy muskeg centuries old.

We stood above rapids up which thousands of pink and silver salmon were struggling to their spawning ground and watched a great black bear lumbering up the opposite trail and shaking the fish he held in his mouth. A bald eagle on a rock, in the quieter water above the rapids, was awaiting his chance for a similar catch.

So we went on, from Ketchikan to Wrangell, a little fishing village noted for its totem poles; Wrangell to Petersburg, which was like a bit of Norway transplanted in Alaska. Nothing but air and water connect these small towns and cities of southern Alaska, for there are no roads or other connecting links by land. From Petersburg we moved up scenic Tracy Arm to the Sawyer Glacier, retraced our way to Stephens Passage, and continued to Juneau, the Territorial capital.

Juneau brought the Baranof Hotel with elevators and porters in uniform, an impressive Federal building, but a population of less than 6,000.

PART OF TODAY'S WORLD

While one is tempted, in describing the stupendous scenery of Alaska, to be lazy and employ the meaningless phrase, "Its out of this world," one does not do so. Alaska is very much a part of today's world. Juneau brought us down to earth.

We found Alaskans listening to the radio and watching the headlines, but not talking much about the war in Korea. "They say some of the people down in the States have the war jitters," more than one person observed.

The radio news programs I heard gave me an intimate glimpse of the people: About a salmon derby, a railroaders' picnic in Wasilla, an old-timer who tried to shoo a black bear away with a cane and had a little trouble. One of the broadcasts brought wry smiles from Alaskans listening. The commentator named a couple of major matters which had been put aside for the adjournment of Congress and then added, "and other matters of secondary importance including statehood for Alaska."

There are various reasons why statehood is not of secondary importance either to Alaska or to the rest of the States.

To be sure, opinion is divided, even there, on this question. But men in a position to know most about Alaska's needs appear heartily in favor of it.

MORE PEOPLE NEEDED

"First, American citizenship is the most precious possession in the world, and we want it in full measure," said Gov. Ernest Gruening, when I interviewed him in Juneau. "We pay all the Federal taxes there are, and yet we have no voice in making them. The Alaska Delegate is voteless even in committee—a situation which has led to discrimination and retarded development of every kind. A Territorial government, at best, is defective, because it is administered at long range."

Alaska has 130,000 population, said the Governor, which is substantially more than most States had when they were admitted to the Union, and can show an 80-percent increase in the last decade. "But we need more people. We have 586,000 square miles, one-fifth the area of the United States, which is 4 or 5 miles to every person."

RED TAPE ASSAILED

Incidentally Governor Gruening says red tape is the most serious Red menace within Alaska. Until recently the Territorial legislature has been dominated by absentee interests which have fought any Territorial tax program. This is now beginning. At the last session the battle was won when permissive legislation was passed for a city sales tax. One-half of the estimated yield will go to schools and the rest to health and welfare. Each town may now vote its own local sales tax.

A day came when we left taxes behind us and flew over the clouds from Juneau to Anchorage. Here we returned to roads and roads that connected with highways.

Beyond Anchorage, along Glenn Highway, we found the Matanuska Valley, where the people of Anchorage and Fort Richardson get their fresh produce, milk, and butter. This valley, to which colonists were sent by the Federal Government in the thirties is well known—by name. I had expected to see many miles of well-cultivated farms. But this, like other preconceived notions of Alaska, was wrong. There were several farms of good size and with house and barn such as one might see in Kansas or Wisconsin. But these were few. Others were still being developed, from log cabins or cottages instead of from large farmhouses.

LABOR AND MATERIALS

The major reasons can be reduced, perhaps, to two. Labor costs and building materials are both much higher than those in any State in the Union, and the growing season is short.

Below Anchorage, from Seward, there is a railroad which goes all the way to Fairbanks. This is another link through the interior. It has blue cars with yellow trimmings and draws a gay line along the landscape. A round trip between Anchorage and Fairbanks is made three times a week. You start about 8 a. m. and arrive about 11 p. m. I flew in 2 hours instead, so I can't personally vouch for the statement that if a passenger sees wild flowers he wants, the train stops so he can pick them.

But things are like that in Alaska. A man who was on the plane with us from Anchorage to Bethel on the Kuskokwim River intended to continue by bush plane to Nunivak Island in the Bering Sea to watch the reindeer round-up. "I'm eager to get over there," he said, with a little impatience at the low-hanging clouds.

ALWAYS TOMORROW

"Nobody's ever eager in Alaska," the bush pilot told him, "the weather will clear maybe tomorrow, maybe the next day, and we can get over." It was the day after "the next day" that they went.

When we boarded a Douglas aircraft of Northern Consolidated Airlines at Anchorage for the little village of Bethel—90 percent Eskimo—our seats were on one side of the plane and roped securely on the other was the cargo. The plane carried a young steward instead of a stewardess to give a lift with the freight.

We flew with eggs, oranges, paint, soup, and other necessities for Bethel and outlying villages, scientific instruments for a research project at Kotzebue, and luggage and a baby carriage of a couple with two children who were getting off at Fairwell, our first stop.

Fairwell is a flag stop for the Douglas, just a landing strip to be used when a passenger or cargo has to be picked up or delivered. A man met the plane to pick up two suits he had sent to the cleaners in Anchorage last week. They weren't ready. Try the next flight, he was told.

MAIN STREET LANDING

From Fairwell, we went to McGrath, where we landed on the main street, which is the Civil Aeronautics Administration airfield. The plane sounds its horn and people keep off the runway when it is coming in. It comes down over the Kuskokwin River and hits the runway just on the opposite bank. We taxied up in front of the roadhouse, which Northern Consolidated now operates, and Marie Christian, the hostess, welcomed us for lunch.

Before taking off for Bethel we walked over to the Northern Commercial Co. store, one of which is in practically every Alaskan village. Alaskans quip that the Russians could never take Alaska because the NC stores would not give them credit. We also looked at the old river boat which was on one of its two visits a year to the village. It is a wood-burning stern-wheeler and serves to bring in the heaviest freight. Its visits are still important along the Kuskokwim and Yukon but not as vital as they were before the days of the airlines.

The pilot of our aircraft, Oscar Underhill, has been flying up in Alaska since 1939. Shortly after we landed at the airfield across the river from Bethel, he was ready to take the Douglas on its run back to Anchorage.

For days Northern Consolidated had been busy hauling fishermen and cannery workers back from Bristol Bay, where the salmon season was over, and returning the natives either by bush plane or boat to their villages. The "fish haul," they call it.

This portion of Alaska and the far North present a curious contrast with the most advanced modes of travel and communication of modern civilization serving primitive peoples. The bush pilots are among the Eskimos' best friends.

WINGED CONTACT

Above the Arctic Circle, where Wien-Alaska Airlines operates, a dozen or more Eskimo mothers have named their sons "Sigwien" after their good friend Sig Wien, the coming of whose plane in the remote, snow-bound villages means supplies, contact with the world outside, and winged aid in emergencies.

Most of the air routes in Alaska follow those of the dog teams which used to carry the mail in winter, while it came by boat in the summer. In the 1930's the bush pilots began bidding against the dogs as mail carriers. In those days flying was often dependent on two factors locally referred to as "WP and PW"—"weather permitting and pilot willing." Now the flights are scheduled, and the airlines perform a service that falls somewhere between that of a rural mail carrier and a local bus line, but seems more specialized than either.

DC-3 SERVICE

For example, Northern Consolidated Airlines, which marked its third anniversary this year, has three DC-3's which fly to points out of Anchorage and Fairbanks and connect with bush planes, nine of which service Eskimo villages and even individuals living in remote spots, who have no other link with civilization except the radio. Anything from window shades to toothpaste may be needed by people in these far-off places, either white or Eskimo, and no request is too small to be filled. "You name it, we fly it," say Northern Consolidated officials.

By using the DC-3's for the long jumps and connecting with the bush planes which reach areas where a larger craft could not land, the service is speeded up and greater safety insured. Typical of bush-plane service are the eight mail stops within 90 miles of Bethel.

Not only is the cost of gasoline much higher—57 cents a gallon on some routes against less than half that in the States, he explained, but the haul in Alaska is typically one way, whereas in the States you can't justify a run with less than a 65- or 70-percent load.

PRODUCE FLOWN IN

Before the days of scheduled air transportation, people in this region received their produce and eggs by boat in June and August. The produce was not too fresh after 14 days aboard, and the eggs often failed to last through the winter, even when they were carefully put down in waterglass.

The meat flown in is all frozen. Flour, canned goods, and other heavy staples are still brought by boat.

Incidentally, it was a bush plane that enabled me to hold $35,000 worth of platinum in my hands. This was in a leather poke, smaller than a large bag of popcorn, but it was so heavy I could hardly hold it.

When officials of the Good News Bay platinum mine on Kuskokwim Bay of the Bering Sea were asked how they ship their platinum their answer is: "By registered air mail." Unless you know more about platinum than I did, when we went from Bethel 150 miles by bush plane to see the platinum operations, you may have thought it was shipped by carload. After watching the tremendous bucket dredge, standing in golden brown water and biting out tons of earth in search of the precious metal, such a conclusion would not seem unreasonable. Nevertheless, platinum does not come out in heavy or large pieces, though it is much heavier than gold.

TOWNS CONTRASTED

Mr. and Mrs. F. O. Tompkins, who manage the Platinum roadhouse, took us in their truck over the gravel road which has been built across the barren tundra from Platinum to Good News Bay, to see the mine.

It is hard to realize the contrast between the tiny village of Platinum—a handful of Eskimo huts, the little store, the radio shack, the roadhouse, then vast, flat tundra and the Bering Sea—and the modern little mining community which exists seven or eight months of the year at Good News Bay, then is closed for the winter.

There are white frame houses with modern conveniences, a bowling alley with Alaska murals on the walls, and a record player for dances in the room adjoining. The bowling alley is really the community center. There is the company office, with a modern apartment above, which is the home of two young men of the staff—an apartment such as one might find in New York or San Francisco, but would hardly expect in this isolated spot.

We also visited the cook shack where we were invited to help ourselves to some of the wonderful coffee cake the night cook, Mrs. Charlotte Anderson had just taken out of the oven. Any time, day or night, men off duty may go to the cook shack for a snack. The long, low building is immaculate, blooming plants are in the windows, and Mrs. Anderson or one of the other capable cooks is cheerily at work on the next meal—men on three shifts must be fed three times a day.

WEATHER FINALLY CLEARS

It was mid-afternoon the next day before the weather cleared at Platinum enough for us to return by bush plane to Bethel. I borrowed a typewriter at the radio shack.

While I worked, the radio operator prepared his dinner in his living quarters adjoining. Occasional messages came over the radio. Would Tosch come first for the passengers waiting at Platinum or take the fishermen to Coos Bay and then come over? He would land the fishermen at Coos Bay first and then fly to Platinum for the three passengers. That meant us. He would be there in a couple of hours.

That evening, when we returned, we learned there was to be an Eskimo dance at Max Lieb's Tundra Shack. When we arrived at the shack it already was filled with Eskimos of all ages, the older women seated on the benches around the wall of the big room where there is a soda fountain. The Tundra Shack serves as a community center for Bethel's Eskimo teen agers.

An old Eskimo, wearing fur trousers and kneeling on the floor, held a drum, with a long handle, high in front of him and beat it rhythmically with a long, slender stick. Two other Eskimo men with fur masks on their faces held what looked like shepherds' pipes with two short knobs on them into which were stuck stiff grasses or quills—three in each—and at the end of which bobbed white rabbit tails. The men kept the rhythm with these bobbing sticks. (The younger generation, sitting in a circle on the floor, kept time with bubble gum.)

DRUMMER JOINS IN

Presently one of the women felt moved to come out and dance. She donned a feather headdress and some beads but added no other costume to her blue rayon dress, which perhaps came from Sears, Roebuck. She went through the movements of the dance as the drummer called them, movements which resembled those of the Hawaiian dance, although they were more with the arms than the feet.

Other Eskimo women and men took their turns or danced at the same time, and then the drummer, with the agility of a man a third his age, himself performed a hunting dance.

On another day, Ken McRoberts, as everyone knows him, went with us on the little motorboat which Max Lieb runs to the Moravian Children's Home above Kwithluk, a 3-hour trip from Bethel on the Kuskokwim River.

ADVENTUROUS CAREER

He is much beloved by the Eskimos and the white people of the area, including the Moravian missionaries whose work in this region is a story in itself. The day of our trip to the Children's Home was chilly and rainy. The marshal stood on the deck of the boat with the hood of his windbreaker thrown back disclosing iron-gray hair above a ruddy, pleasant face and steady eyes, unmindful of the chill rain and wind.

His service in Alaska under the Department of Justice has been hazardous and fraught with adventure more often because of the weather than because of the persons with whom he has to deal.

"The Eskimos are good honest people," he told me. "Most crimes derive from drinking. If it were not for that we should have none. When there were liquor stores in Bethel the jail was packed, but now there are only one or two ever in it. Much credit for this is due the Moravians. If it had not been for the Moravians," he added, "I do not know what would have happened to our natives when there was a large Army camp across from Bethel. As it is, they stood up against the outside influences better than most whites."

A yen for adventure which has led many men to Alaska, brought Ken McRoberts here in 1935. He came from his home in Napa, Idaho, to Anchorage and first did surveying on the Matanuska project and then worked on the railroad. In 1936, he ran the Colony Barbershop in Anchorage for a couple of months, sold it, and went to Takotna on the Kuskokwim, which was having a boom because of a gold strike.

There he ran the Kusko Times for 2 years, serving the 135 white people who had come there. After that he did freighting on the Takotna River and then shipped in a truck and did trucking from the river to mining camps. For a period he prospected for gold. Then came World War II. He was above the age for service but became United States marshal to do his part in that capacity, and he has served since.

ABRUPT DEPARTURE

His home in Bethel is one of those with a a little greenhouse beside it in which a few fresh vegetables grow in the summer.

Our departure from the boat and the friendly people aboard was abrupt. We had left the Children's Home and were tying up at the village of Kwithluk when our pontoon plane landed in the river to take us aboard.

From Anchorage we flew to Fairbanks, about 90 miles from the Arctic Circle. There trucks and motorcars testified to the connecting highways, and the 8 floater planes I counted in the Chena River, along the bank opposite my hotel window, indicated that the airlines were also well-traveled.

We arrived in Fairbanks after midnight, and it was then almost dark, but, by the time I had settled down for some sleep, it was daylight again. Sweet peas growing as high as my head, gorgeous nasturtiums, almost any other flower you could name, and a sunflower 16 feet high, were some of the results of the round-the-clock daylight of summertime in this section.

TOMORROW'S FRONTIER

But beneath the topsoil the ground remains frozen, and this, plus the frosts which come in late August above ground, makes it impossible to have perennials here. Seed must be planted annually and usually started inside, then put into the ground after June 1.

At Bethel I heard a comment that seemed apropos of the people's feelings about Alaska in whatever part, Ketchikan to Bethel to Fairbanks: Once people adjust to Alaska, they never want to live outside again.

After a few weeks there one can understand. Those who have come and stayed have met obstacles and overcome them. They have earned the heritage the country promises for them. It is theirs because they have put so much into it. It is America's frontier of today and tomorrow. They are the pioneers.

Monday, August 28, 1950

Mr. FELLOWS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial written by Reginald Wright Kauffman, which appeared in the Bangor (Maine) Daily News on August 14, 1950:

HOW RED MY HERRING

Soviet diplomacy is devilish, and devilishly clever. Broadly, it envisages a series of distant, far-scattered and separately minor wars to involve America until America is bled white, whereupon a death blow can be safely dealt us. Narrowly, the Soviets have achieved, in Korea, a position from which they will temporarily profit, no matter what its military issue. If we lose, it will seem—however erroneously—that communism can worst us in fair fight; if we win, we will—however falsely—be pilloried as exploiters of backward peoples.

Nevertheless, it is now of paramount importance that we win. So it is of paramount importance that we unitedly support our Government. And so it is of paramount importance that we have a Government which we can support confidently.

At the present moment, we haven't such a Government. This is what the voters must keep in mind at the coming congressional elections.

We need a congressional majority that will guide the man whom the radio boys call the President of the United States—with fervent emphasis (heaven knows why) on their preposition—a Congress that, at the very least, in the matter of security, will save Mr. Truman from his perilous complacency:

Red herrings. "The allusion," Dr. Brewer explains, "is to trailing a red herring on the ground, to destroy the scent and set the (hunting) dogs at fault." What ghostwriter, Clark Clifford or Judge Rosenman, supplied the phrase? Lattimore, perhaps, when proving that China's Reds were simple agrarians? Every domestic and most foreign Communist dangers were red herrings all. Conscience-stricken Elizabeth Bentley. Wretched Alger Hiss. The prospects for peace were better than at any time during the past 5 years—a few brief days before Korea exploded. How red was my herring.

Proceed thence, from fish to birds, from the ichthyology of Mr. Truman to the ornithology of his party.

The traditional emblem of the Democrats was a patient donkey; its present symbol is an ostrich. For, though zoologists aver that this ratita has no gall bladder, he does possess a very muscular gizzard; though he can run 60 miles in an hour, he runs ever in a circle. And how wrote learned Anoetos of Kos? "When pursued, the ostrich buries his head in the sand, thinking that, forsooth, if he cannot see his enemies, his enemies cannot see him." Result: plumes for knight's helmets, for their ladies' fans—but dead ostriches.

Only eyes buried? Ears also. The Democrat administration, the Democrat majority in Congress were alike deaf to Hurley's cautions, MacArthur's appeals. Merely a desperate minimum of assistance was voted South Korea, and almost none of that assistance actually delivered. In January, this smug announcement: "The United States will not provide military aid or (even) advice to Chinese forces on Formosa; * * * the resources on Formosa are adequate * * * for defense." Washington asked the Chinese Nationalist air force to cease operations against the Chinese Communists, and, for a fateful month, the Chinese Nationalist air force obeyed, while thousands of veterans in the Red Chinese army were transferred to North Korea.

These are facts that cannot be denied. These are the reasons why a handful of raw and insufficiently armed American boys had to be sent for massacre by trained masses of well-armed Korean Communist soldiers. Why our tanks were inferior to the enemy's Russian tanks, our medical corps miserably understaffed, our military intelligence a bewildered butt for ridicule. This is why, while American courage was never higher, we Americans—who once boasted one of us could whip 10 Germans—had to find out the hard way that 10 Reds sometimes make a bit of progress against one American.

And there, too, lies a most cogent reason why the coming Congress should be predominatingly Republican. Not change horses while crossing a stream? It all depends, as Roland Eaton says, on the sort of horses involved.

Into this mess it was the Democrat Party that brought us. We have good reason to hope a change to Republican influences will be a change for the better. We have no reason to hope that the Democrats now in Congress will improve so long as they remain there. They have had their chance, and they have murdered it. Of course, we must support this war; so we should of course seek at least a legislative branch of Government capable of commanding confident support. No more talk of red herrings; no more suicidal ostriches:

"If you don't win this war," says Eisenhower, "you can't win anywhere."

Controls To Prevent Run-Away Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENDERSON LANHAM
OF GEORGIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 28, 1950

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, my efforts to get the immediate imposition of price, rent, wage, and profits controls are well known in the House since I took a definite stand in a speech made even before Mr. Baruch's ideas were made public. Moreover, I fought for every amendment to the recent control measure that would have imposed a roll-back of prices to pre-Korean days and for the imposition of controls immediately.

As an illustration of the necessity for controls, especially in the building industry, I am including herewith a letter from Mr. R. G. Wilkerson, a prominent builder from my home city of Rome, Ga.

Again I urge that some action be taken immediately to control run-away inflation.

ROME, GA., August 26, 1950.

Hon. HENDERSON L. LANHAM,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: During the last few days we have been receiving price schedules showing quite an increase in price of various items and materials which go into effect on certain dates. These prices are effective at certain times and apply on that which will be shipped on these certain dates.

Since we had our orders in before the increase in prices we should have some protection on prices since we will not be able to increase our prices to our customers.

It seems we are going to have to have price controls, allocations and possibly rationing to keep things in line. If such is in the making it seems that the proper thing to do would be to go back to the beginning of the Korean war and fix prices at the level at which they were at that time.

Most of the manufacturers seem to feel that prices would be fixed at the prevailing prices around 30 days before regulations and they all want new prices in effect for 30 days before these regulations go into effect. There is really no sense in these increases and some measures should be passed to set all prices of materials and labor to the beginning of the war.

Those who have contracts on a large number of jobs signed up some time ago are not going to stay in business unless given some assistance. New work is not going to be let at the higher prices and workmen will be loafing.

Contracts for some of the new schools being let here in the last few days are around one-third higher than those let 30 days ago. Something must be done to relieve the situation.

Yours very truly,

R. G. WILKERSON.

White Urges Economy in Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CECIL F. WHITE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 28, 1950

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Speaker, Government reorganization for greater economy and greater efficiency has become a watchword of the American people. They want Uncle Sam to put his house in order. This demand for economy and efficiency in Government has become intensified since the outbreak of war in Korea. Because we must now raise billions of dollars to supply our boys with the necessary equipment to bring about victory, we must make every effort to save in every other department of Government.

The American people, as taxpayers, want the Government to be well-run. They demand that modern, businesslike techniques of management be applied. They insist that the structure of Government be simplified and that lines of authority be clearly drawn, so that we can hold our public servants fully accountable for their actions.

In other words, they want an all-out attack on inefficiency, waste, and red tape in their Government. Beset with heavy taxes and a national budget deficit, the American people are right in making these demands. There is no excuse for a Government structure that is too sprawling and cumbersome to be well-managed. There is no excuse for wasteful duplication of agencies and activities.

FOLLOW HOOVER COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS

Some shortsighted people would effect these economies by making a percentage cut straight across the board in all Government departments. Anyone should know that this would not work, as has been so aptly pointed out by President Truman in recent statements on the subject. All Government departments are not necessarily overstaffed because some of them are. As a matter of fact some Government departments, in view of developments resulting from the Korean war, are understaffed.

Let us rely upon the recommendations of the Hoover Commission. They have studied this problem long and hard. It is true that no commission is infallible but the Hoover Commission recommendations should certainly be safer than a percentagewise reduction straight across the board as is recommended by some Members of Congress.

WORK TOWARD BUSINESS EFFICIENCY IN GOVERNMENT

I am glad to report, Mr. Speaker, that this Congress is alert to the problem. Without fanfare, without headlines, we are moving steadily forward in reorganizing the executive branch of the Government under the guiding hand of the Hoover Commission recommendations. Uncle Sam is taking firm steps to put his house in order. Mr. Hoover himself recently testified before a Senate committee that astonishing progress has been made. Experts say that we have accomplished more in the past year than in any like period in our history.

WHITE BILL TO SAVE $250,000,000 YEARLY

Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a bill which, if it becomes law, will save the taxpayers of the Nation $250,000,000 annually, according to authorities who have made a study of Government reorganization.

I refer to my bill, H. R. 8663, to consolidate the Bureau of Reclamation and the civil functions of the United States Army Corps of Engineers. Senator PAUL DOUGLAS, of Illinois, has paid me the high compliment of introducing a companion bill in the United States Senate.

The Hoover Commission itself recommended the consolidation of these two Government agencies as proposed in my bill. It is a shame and a disgrace, Mr. Speaker, to have these two agencies competing to see which shall build the dams on our mountain streams. The Hoover Commission report pointed out how these two agencies, by fighting each other for the right to build Pine Flat Dam in California, have, through the conniving of some selfish interests, delayed the building of Pine Flat Dam for 10 years.

In the interest of economy and good Government, Mr. Speaker, these two agencies must be consolidated, and I urge one and all to support the bill I have introduced for this purpose.

GOVERNMENT MUST BE OVERHAULED TO ATOMIC-AGE EFFICIENCY

Speaking as a legislator, as well as a businessman with 25 years of successful experience, and as an individual citizen who wants his Government to be sound and strong and prepared to meet the problems of the atomic age, I sincerely believe that thoroughgoing Government reorganization along the lines proposed by the Hoover Commission ranks as one of the most important matters confronting the Nation today. We must solve it; we will solve it, as our progress demonstrates. In so doing, we must rise above narrow partisan or private interest; good government comes first.

Those of us who are concerned about our country's welfare realize how important is the need for overhauling the machinery of government. We cannot travel the modern highway to peace and prosperity with a vehicle handed down from the horse-and-buggy days.

TO PRESERVE DEMOCRACY GOVERNMENT NEEDS STREAMLINING

Democracy faces the challenge of a totalitarian ideology. To resist it successfully, our Government must be streamlined and organized to render efficient service. Every ounce of fat must be trimmed off. Its muscles and sinews must be strong.

We want the most security and the most service we can get for each tax dollar; but we do not want our security to be weakened, nor the essential services of Government to be curtailed.

THREE TO FOUR BILLION DOLLARS YEARLY SAVINGS ARE POSSIBLE

When our work of Government reorganization — now near the halfway mark—comes close to fulfillment, the experts say that possibly three or four billion dollars in yearly savings will result. This, so say the experts, will do away with a substantial part of the budget deficit. It should help us to prosecute the war in Korea and prepare our defenses against further aggression. More than that, it should mean a better Government and a healthier democracy.

I am pledged to the task of eliminating the waste and inefficiency in our Federal Government. I have voted in support of every one of the Hoover Commission recommendations which have been presented to the Congress. In addition, I have introduced the far-reaching bill to consolidate the Bureau of Reclamation and the civil functions of the Army engineers. I have taken definite and positive action to streamline our Government, to save money, and to make for greater efficiency.

I predict that over 90 percent of the Hoover Commission recommendations will be found worthy of acceptance and the economies resulting therefrom will make it easier to finance the war in which we are now engaged, build our defenses, and make the tax burden of our people easier to bear.

Fair-Traded Products

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WRIGHT PATMAN
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 28, 1950

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting herewith a statement sent to me by the Bureau of Education on Fair Trade, Dr. John W. Dargavel, chairman. It is very revealing and is self-explanatory:

TELEGRAPHIC SURVEY OF PRICE BEHAVIOR OF FAIR-TRADED PRODUCTS SINCE KOREA

In order to ascertain the price behavior of fair-traded products since the outbreak of war in Korea, the Bureau of Education on Fair Trade conducted a telegraphic survey of 300 manufacturers, selected at random in fields in which fair trade is prevalent.

The following telegram was sent to these manufacturers on August 2 by Dr. John W. Dargavel, chairman of the bureau and executive secretary of the National Association of Retail Druggists:

"BUREAU OF EDUCATION ON FAIR TRADE,
"New York, N. Y.

"In World War II fair-trade prices showed remarkable resistance to inflation. Bureau of Education on Fair Trade, therefore, is assembling data on behavior of fair-trade prices in current war crisis. You and other leading manufacturers in fields where fair trade is prevalent are being polled to find out what has happened to fair-trade prices or what is likely to happen to them in foreseeable future. Have your fair-trade prices remained unchanged? Are they likely to be pushed up because of war conditions? We do not expect specific statistics but would appreciate indications of trends. All company names will be kept confidential in publicizing results of poll. Your information will simply be correlated with other data in a general summary. Your immediate cooperation will be appreciated.

"JOHN W. DARGAVEL,
"Chairman."

As of August 17, 1950, responses both by telegram and letter had been received from 125 manufacturers, or 42 percent of the total queried.

Of the 125 manufacturers responding to date 84, or 67 percent, sell some or all of their products under fair trade. Forty-one, or 33 percent, do not fair trade their products.

The 84 manufacturers on fair trade who have responded represent these 12 fields: Proprietary drugs, cosmetics, and toiletries, 16; electrical appliances and household products, 10; cameras and photo supplies, 5; books, 9; tobacco products, 4; hardware, 7; automobile accessories, 7; office supplies and equipment, 6; jewelry, silverware, and optical goods, 6; household furnishing and utensils, 6; radio, television, and phonographs, 2; packaged and canned-food products, 6.

A breakdown of the responses from the 84 fair-trading manufacturers shows: Have not raised prices and do not expect to do so in foreseeable future, 73 firms, or 87 percent; have not raised prices but expect to do, so in near future, 6 firms, or 7 percent; small price increases already made, 5 firms, or 6 percent.

The generality of comment running through the responses of the 73 manufacturers who have not raised their fair-trade prices is that they will make every effort to maintain these prices at present levels. At the same time, a number noted that price increases might become necessary if the cost of materials and labor were to rise substantially.

The resolve of manufacturers to avoid raising their fair trade prices is reflected in the following comments culled from their responses to the Bureau's survey:

"You're entirely correct in saying that in World War II fair-trade prices showed remarkable resistance to inflation. At least that statement holds true insofar as our own products are concerned * * * our principal lines have not changed at all in price during the period from 1937 to date * * * our prices structure today is essentially the same as it was before World War II * * *."—By a maker of men's pipes.

"So far as we can determine at the present time, we do not anticipate increasing our fair-trade minimum prices on any of our models * * *."—By a producer of electric shavers.

"We will make every effort to keep our prices at the present level throughout the present situation, which we have every hope will not reach any such proportions as during the years 1942 through 9."—By an automobile-accessories manufacturer.

"Our fair-trade prices have remained unchanged in face of present crisis. We will resist any pressure trying to push them upward. We are firmly convinced that any changes in price structure of whole economy at this time or in predictable future will act to bring on dreaded Government regulation."—By a maker of pen-and-pencil sets.

"It is our firm resolve to hold the present price level, but this can be done only if the printers, binders, manufacturers of paper, boards, glue, cloth, etc., are willing to do their part * * * we firmly believe that the best interest of all would be served if every price was held at the level existing June 1, 1950 * * *."—By a book publisher.

"Consistent with our policy of the last several years, we do not intend to change our prices or fair-trade minimums on proprietary drug items, unless forced to do so by excessive inflation * * *."—By a proprietary drug producer.

"We did not raise prices during the last World War and our fair-trade prices have remained unchanged since the war with a few minor exceptions. We do not plan any general price advances due to present war situation unless conditions brought about by advances in supplies and materials would force us to make minor adjustments on a few exceptional items. But we do not plan any general price advances."—By a cosmetics manufacturer.

"Our fair-trade prices have remained unchanged, nor do we see any changes in immediate future. We agree with experience that fair-trade prices show remarkable resistance to inflation, whereas some other lines of our manufacture have had recent prices increases."—By a manufacturer of brass products.

"In spite of increased material and labor costs, have not considered raise in price of deep-freeze units * * *."—By a household appliances producer.

"Definitely, fair-traded (brand name) will not be priced on the basis of what the traffic will bear * * *."—By a carpet-sweeper manufacturer.

CONCLUSIONS

It is clear that fair-trade prices, to date, have remained at pre-Korean levels despite the price rises noted in the press in many other items. As of August 17, 94 percent of the fair-trading manufacturers who responded to the Bureau's survey had not increased prices; of this, 87 percent do not expect to raise their fair-trade prices in the foreseeable future, while 7 percent do expect to do so. Only 5 of the 84 fair-trading manufacturers included in this study had raised their fair-trade prices since Korea, and even these 5 said their price increases were small.

It is, perhaps, also interesting that a random selection of 300 manufacturers in fields in which fair trade is practiced discloses that two out of every three manufacturers in these fields choose to sell their products under fair trade in order to protect the property values of their nationally known and advertised trade-marks.

OBSERVATIONS

At this time it would appear that fair-trade prices will hold the line against inflationary pressures far better than non-fair-trade prices. This should come as no surprise, since fair-trade prices have in the past demonstrated their stability.

Other studies conducted over the past decade have demonstrated that fair-trade prices, while the lowest at which the efficient retailer can sell and still earn an honest living, do resist inflation. Results of these other studies:

Pre-World War II: Fair-trade prices of 50 leading drug products in 1939 were down 1 percent from prefair trade depression prices. These statistics come from the University of Minnesota's School of Business Administration.

The war and postwar period: From 1939 to 1947 the prices of 7,334 fair-traded drug products rose only 3.1 percent, while Bureau of Labor figures showed food prices soaring 93 percent and the over-all cost of living 59.3 percent. This study was made by the National Association of Chain Drug Stores.

The immediate past—July to December 1949: The fair-trade prices of 26 nationally known drug products, over-all, were less than the prices for the same items in the non-fair-trade areas. The American consumer paid one-tenth of a cent less for them, under fair trade, on the basis of a composite weighted average. A product-by-product analysis showed that 17 out of the 26 items sold for less under fair trade. The maximum price difference between the fair-trade and non-fair-trade areas is slightly over 3 cents. Only 3 products out of the 26 show this much difference. Two sold for 3 cents less under fair trade. Yet these famous brands of dentifrices, headache remedies, laxatives, shampooes, and shaving creams were typically used as "loss leaders" by predatory price cutters in non-fair-trade areas. They are the products on which lower prices could be expected in non-fair-trade areas if such lower prices really existed.

This study, by an independent research agency through the Bureau's Research Advisory Committee, was a scientific analysis of prices in 770 selected drug stores—700 in the fair-trade area and 70 in the non-fair-trade—to keep the proportion between the size of the two areas. Independent and chain stores in rural and urban areas were included. In arriving at the final figures similar types of stores were compared and prices weighted, according to sales volume.

All these findings show that consumers cannot expect to pay less without fair trade, and that in many cases they would pay more. This is a tribute to the integrity of manufacturers, wholesalers, and retailers operating under voluntary fair trade.

Discharge of Civil Service Personnel at Marietta (Ga.) Air Force Base

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENDERSON LANHAM

OF GEORGIA

Monday, August 28, 1950

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, for some weeks now I have been urging that Secretary of National Defense Louis Johnson be asked to resign. I have done this, not only because of his bungling and his apparent lack of ability, but because I think he has in many cases deliberately misled the people, among them many Congressmen. For instance, in the famous conference held at the Pentagon when Mr. Johnson announced that he was cutting thirty thousand from the payroll, he announced that approximately 100 civil-service personnel were being discharged from the Marietta Air Force Base at Marietta, Ga. Later I found that Secretary Johnson had permitted the Air Force to employ a corporation to do the same work the civil-service employees had been doing. Practically all of the civil-service employees were then discharged and then employed by this corporation.

I wrote Secretary Johnson at the time, protesting this sort of skullduggery, but never got a satisfactory answer from him.

I am now, with leave first obtained, extending in the RECORD with my own statement a letter which is startling in its disclosure of things that are said to be happening at this same Air Force base in connection with this contract and subsequent ones made with the Air Force officials. This is a small contract, it is true, but I am afraid it is typical of what is happening on a much larger scale in our armed services and the procurement of services and supplies.

I am withholding the name of the person who gave me this information, as to disclose it would, no doubt cause him to lose his job. He is to be commended for his patriotism for putting the facts before us.

It seems to me that the Armed Services Committee should immediately begin an investigation of this whole problem, or in the event the standing committee is too busy with other matters then committees similar to the famed Truman committee, which was set up during World War II to track down corruption and bribery in the conduct of the procurement of supplies and equipment for our armed services, should make such an investigation.

HON. HENDERSON LANHAM,
Representative From Georgia,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I would like to submit the following facts for your information and I believe they demand an immediate investigation. Please do not use my name in connection with the matter, as I am employed by civil service and could suffer, if the wrong parties discovered the author of the following data:

The Tumpane Co., Inc., is a "fly by night" corporation, organized to milk money from United States Air Force. They depend upon the inside pull of their secretary, Jack Lepre, a former Air Force colonel, and money placed in the proper hands at Wright-Patterson Air Force Base, Dayton, Ohio, for their business. They were awarded a contract to load and unload freight at Government aircraft plant No. 6, Marietta, Ga., in January 1949. The contract was let, even though the service was not needed. Sufficient civil-service personnel was available to do all of the work. The contract called for a certain number of cars to be loaded and unloaded, during a 6 months' period. The Air Force knew that this number would never be reached. Jack Lepre and John Tumpane announced that they cared nothing for this small contract ($35,000) but they were after big game. In other words, they knew 9 months in advance that the plant would be let out on a service contract, which was done on September 21, 1949, after the Louis Johnson economy policy was announced.

The buyer of this contract (loading and unloading) was a civilian at Wright Field named Miller. When the contract expired, John Tumpane was prepared to sign a release on the deal but Miller told him not to do so; that he could collect about $19,000 for work called for in the contract but which the Government had been unable to furnish. The settlement is still pending.

Then, in September 1949, the large contract was awarded for plant operation. All civil-service personnel was discharged from the Government to comply with the orders of Louis Johnson and rehired by Tumpane at a higher salary. However, Tumpane knew that he must make a good showing on this first big contract and he did manage to fire enough production workers to offset the large salaries paid to the officers of his company and by this procedure his actual cost of operation was no more than the Government operation. He was able to do this by not doing any work. The contracting officer for the Air Force, at Marietta, was told that he would remain at this base as long as he caused Tumpane no trouble. He did not wish to be transferred, so he caused no trouble. In fact, he spent his vacation at Daytona Beach, Fla., with John Tumpane during March 1950.

The first service contract expired June 31, 1950. Then, another service contract was let, to run until December 1952. Naturally, Tumpane was given this contract, too. It was awarded by J. B. Straley, at Wright Field. Tumpane knew that he would also be given this job. Straley had taken care of that. Any other bidders figured to have a chance, were disqualified, for one reason or another. Some were refused an invitation to bid, because they were not financially able to perform the contract, yet all of Tumpane's payments are assigned to a bank. They borrow money from week to week to meet the payrolls and other expense.

With the award of the latest contract, salaries really shot upward. John Tumpane advanced his salary from $200 to $300 per week. Other salaries range from $250 per week, downward. Several girls earn $70 per week, as they are favored by the company

Last week Tumpane decided to put himself in the transportation business. A shipment of jeeps consigned to Warner Robins, were loaded on his trucks. He requested a Government bill of lading to cover the movement. The officer in charge decided this was too much like General Meyers' own actions and refused to issue the bills. Tumpane became very angry but he finally made a deal with Smith Transfer Co., in East Point, Ga., to use their name on the bill and give him the revenue for hauling. There is also on the records at this plant the evidence that in November 1949 Mr. Tumpane ordered a truckload of lumber delivered to his home in Marietta, but there is no record in the salvage office that he ever purchased any lumber. These, and many other incidents are a matter of record. Use this information as you see fit, but please do not use my name for reasons I have already explained.

I will keep you informed as to future happenings.

Very truly yours,

———— ————.

Giuseppe Garibaldi

OF

HON. JAMES J. MURPHY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1950

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, Giuseppe Garibaldi was not only a great Italian patriot but an inspired humanitarian. So much was he admired for his sterling military virtues that Abraham Lincoln offered him a commission as a general officer in the Union Army. In the Italian liberator's letter to Lincoln after the issuance of the Emancipation Proclamation it is said that Garibaldi originated the name of Great Emancipator by which Lincoln has been since known.

In July 1850 Garibaldi came to Staten Island and resided there 3 years. In observance of the one hundredth anniversary of his visit, I am pleased to include in my remarks a sketch of the great liberator's life by Daniel Santoro, as follows:

GARIBALDI

(By Daniel Santoro)

"There is around the name of Garibaldi a halo which nothing can extinguish; a whole life devoted to one subject—his country: a name consecrated by the deeds of honor, first abroad and then at home; honor and constancy more than admirable, simplicity of life and manner which recalls the men of antiquity; all the mournful trials and losses manfully endured; glory and poverty. Every particular referring to such a man is precious."—Giuseppe Mazzini, Italia del Popolo, 1850.

Giuseppe Garibaldi was born at Nice on July 4, 1807. His humble but devout parents brought him up in the strictest principles. Young Giuseppe did not mingle easily with other boys, he was a quiet sort of boy preferring the out-of-doors and a life of solitude. How well suited to his personality the recluse life of an exile at Caprera was to be.

He loved and conversed with nature, and the life at sea where he was sent to earn his living in a fisherman's craft did not distract him from his studies. He was conversant with many languages and literatures.

As a boy he had shown great admiration for the Eternal City: her monuments, her ruins, and the glory of the past held a certain charm for him. But more than anything else Rome's loss of independence left an indelible mark in his mind, and from that time he dedicated himself to principles of liberty.

Early in life he had made voyages to the Black Sea, and on one of these voyages aboard the brig Cortese he was second in command. Pirates were not uncommon in those days, and Garibaldi, observing the lawlessness on the high seas and the tyranny of the despotic nations of the east, was fired with an inordinate love of liberty. Having refused to carry out his father's wish to become a priest, Giuseppe had embarked on a life of adventure.

In 1834 another great leader, Giuseppe Mazzini, was organizing a society called Giovine Italia (Young Italy), which was rapidly expanding among the Italian patriots. Garibaldi, fired with patriotic enthusiasm, joined the movement, enlisting at the same time in the Sardinian Navy.

With a number of companions aboard the frigate Euridice, Garibaldi plotted the seizure of the vessel first, and then to take the arsenal at Genoa at the same time that Mazzini's expedition would enter Savoy. The plot was discovered, and Garibaldi was in danger of being arrested. Condemned to death by default on June 3, 1834, he escaped to South America, where he was given letters of marque by the State of Rio Grande which was in revolt against Brazil. After a series of victorious engagements, Garibaldi was taken prisoner and subjected to severe torture, resulting in the dislocation of his limbs. Regaining his liberty, he renewed the war against Brazil and captured Port Allegro.

It was in Rio that he met Anita Riberas. They fell in love and were married on board the ship Rio Pardo. On March 26, 1842, the marriage vows were renewed in the Church of St. Francisco d' Assise, since a religious ceremony was the only one recognized by the government. Anita, who was to be his devoted companion for many years to come, was as brave as her husband, fearing neither the battlefield nor the dangerous adventures. They sailed away and spent their honeymoon in warfare along the coast and in the battlefields, experiencing the hardships of camp life and wandering over the sea and wilderness. Anita bore her husband three children: Menotti, Ricciotti, and Teresita.

Garibaldi next passed into the service of Uruguay and was sent to Corrientes with a small flotilla. Having exhausted his ammunition, and seeing himself being overtaken by Admiral Brown, against whose fleet he had fought for three days, Garibaldi burned his ships and escaped.

Returning to Montevideo, Garibaldi organized the Italian Legion. It was the first considerable body of his countrymen which he commanded on land. Most of them were political exiles, and they wore the famous red shirt. They enlisted with the idea of fighting for the liberty of Montevideo in return for shelter it had given them, but the real reason was to prepare for the big struggle, the unification of Italy, which Garibaldi had never forgotten even in the depths of the American forests.

This Italian Legion saved Montevideo when it was hard pressed by its enemies in 1843 and 1846. Garibaldi was loved by all the inhabitants of the city.

In the meantime Garibaldi had been in constant touch with "Young Italy" at home, and when in 1847 news of the political disturbances in Europe reached him, he first sent his family to Genoa, and then in 1848 crossed the Atlantic with about 25 fighting companies.

On June 24, 1848 the "Speranza" arrived at Nice. News reached Garibaldi that Palermo, Milan, Venice, and many other cities had started on the momentous revolution, that the Austrian Army was in retreat and that all Italy was arming. The whole city rallied with joy 'round Garibaldi.

He was then, and remained throughout his life a Republican, ready to fight for popular government in any form. Garibaldi offered his sword to Charles Albert (Italy's first king), but the latter refused the offer of the rebel of 1834, and Garibaldi took a commission under the incompetent provisional government of Milan, who sent him with badly armed and ill-chosen men to Bergamo, where he had no opportunity to prevent the disaster of the main army at Custoza.

But the Garibaldians who had come from Montevideo were not content to lay down their arms after the famous armistice was signed between Piedmont and Austria, and carried on a republican campaign against Austria in the Alps. The little campaign was waged, however, for 2 or 3 weeks in the mountain villages of Lake Maggiore and Varese, and by the end of August Garibaldi was driven across the Swiss border, demonstrating on the way his genius in guerrilla warfare while the Austrians recovered all the Lombard and Alpine territory.

Returning from Switzerland, Garibaldi decided to carry the people's war to Sicily against Ferdinand II, King of Naples and of Sicily.

In October 1848 he sailed from Genoa accompanied by some 70 companies mostly from Montevideo. When they arrived at Filigare on November 9, they found their entrance into the Papal States blocked by 400 Swiss guards. In this critical juncture of his career the people of Bologna came to his rescue and permitted him to enter the city and a few days later sent for his men from Filigare. In the meantime political events in Rome took the attention of the whole country and allowed Garibaldi to push his enlistment problem so rapidly that at the end of November the First Italian Legion could leave Ravenna with 500 men.

On the 30th of April the French advanced on Rome with about 6,000 infantry and a complete equipment of field guns marching straight for the summit of the Vatican hill to the Porta Pertusa by which they were to enter Rome.

Garibaldi placed himself at the head of his men, stormed through the gardens fighting with bayonets. After a fierce struggle the French were put to flight.

He was "of middle stature, deep chested and wide shouldered, his frame was cast in an iron mold, combining agility with strength. There was something statuesque in the appearance of his head, with its broad brow, straight features, and long, flowing hair blending with a beard of the same golden hue. His countenance, expressive of resolution, gave character to his features rather striking than handsome. In his dress he consulted the picturesque. He wore at that time a cap of scarlet cloth, ornamented with gold lace; a tunic, or blouse, with rich red; and besides his sword he carried a dagger in his belt. In his movements Garibaldi displayed ease and grace, mingled with that sober and stately dignity acquired by those who had exercised authority over the descendants of the Spaniards in the Western World." The quotation is from Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly of May 1882.

That night Rome celebrated the victory, and Garibaldi secured his position he so well deserved in the imagination of his countrymen.

While the French were temporarily quiet and awaiting reinforcements Mazzini had to made his plans to prevent his enemies at home, King Ferdinand and the Neapolitan army, from reaching Rome. He, therefore, instructed Garibaldi to cross the Campagna to keep the invaders in check.

Garibaldi left with 2,500 troops on May 4, and taking the road south from Rome to Naples took up his headquarters at Palestrina. One engagement followed another, until on May 9 with a small force he defeated the Neapolitan army. The expedition had succeeded in preventing the further advance of King Ferdinand's army, and Garibaldi was recalled to Rome.

The destiny of the Roman Republic had now reached its most critical point Mazzini was at the head of the government; Roselli was the commander in chief, and the defense of the city was entrusted to Garibaldi, who clearly saw the error of the treaty which had been signed with France. During the following weeks one engagement followed another, and the fate of Rome was sealed.

Rome fell, and Garibaldi was accompanied by an army of 4,000 volunteers which headed toward Venice with the idea of joining the defenders of that city. Thus he embarked on that magnificent retreat through central Italy pursued by the armies of France, Austria, Spain, and Naples.

By his consummate generalship and the matchless endurance of his men, Garibaldi reached the Republic of San Marino. With his wife and a handful of followers, he vainly attempted to get through to Venice, where the tricolor was still flying, and he took refuge in the pine forests of Ravenna.

Anita, who had undergone great sufferings during her voyage, was dying. Garibaldi sought shelter in a nearby cottage, and she expired in her husband's arms.

Afflicted by so great a loss, pursued by the Austrians, Garibaldi, assisted by all classes of people, fled to Gibraltar, proceeding to Liverpool, and on June 27 left for New York.

Horace Greeley's newspaper, the New York Tribune, recorded the arrival on July 30, 1850. "The ship Waterloo arrived from Liverpool this morning with Garibaldi, known the world over as the hero of Montevideo and the defender of the Roman Republic. He will be received by all who know him in a befitting manner as a man of character, and for his service in behalf of liberty."

Garibaldi arrived at the quarantine, then located in Tompkinsville, Staten Island, at 10 a. m. on July 30, 1850, and proceeded to the Pavilion Hotel on Richmond Terrace, St. George, Staten Island, where he stayed. In New York he found many friends. He did not have to work for his living. Garibaldi was proud in a humble way and he was determined to earn his own living. He led a tranquil life, avoiding the honors of the New York society, which would have wanted to lionize him. Instead he preferred the peace and quiet of State Island, where on October 1850 he went to live with Antonio Meucci—who was working on his invention of the telephone—far from the insatiable curiosity of the metropolis.

Garibaldi occupied the room at the northeast corner of the modest cottage. The furniture was very simple, consisting chiefly of an iron bed with three mattresses, three chairs, a small table, a wooden "toilette," a closet on which rested a wax skull, and a small mirror hanging on the wall before which Garibaldi often "tormented" his blond beard with the scissors.

He had placed a parrot in the entrance hall who had been taught the famous words: "Hurrah for Italy * * * Banish the foreigners" (Viva l'Italia! Fuori lo straniero!), and whenever anyone appeared at the entrance the bird would shout the refrain to the delight and astonishment of those present.

Life was simple but happy in the tiny Garibaldian colony, which soon became the center of reunions for the Italian exiles and political refugees of every nationality. On Sunday the visitors were numerous, among them Foresti, Filoparti, Pastacaldi, Co. Forbes and the poet, Daniel Pelton.

But funds were running low in spite of the careful economy of the household. The idea of setting up a candle factory came to Garibaldi, and with Meucci they established a small factory. One, however, should keep in mind that Garibaldi's work was voluntary. He himself tells in his Memorie, "at the Meuccis I could work if I wanted to." His main diversions consisted of going fishing and hunting in the woods.

Life was pleasant in the tiny village of Clifton, but Italy was up in arms once more, and Garibaldi prepared to return. Parting was difficult, "Good-by," he said to his friend Meucci, leaving him his red shirt as a souvenir (now in the Museum in Rome), "never forget the foreman of the candle factory; he will never forget you."

And with that Garibaldi left for Italy in 1854 never to return to America. He purchased the Island of Caprera, and there he built his home.

In the War of 1859 he was given command of the Alpine infantry. Defeating the Austrians at Casale on May 8, crossing the Ticino on the 23d of May after a series of victorious battles, he liberated the Alpine territory as far as the Tyrol frontier. The Armistice of Villafranca prevented him from advancing into Austrian territory.

Returning to Como, he married Countess Raimondi, who had aided him during the campaign. But the duty to his country was by far stronger than the duty to his wife, and Garibaldi set out for central Italy.

Forbidden to invade Romagna, he returned indignantly to Caprera, where with Crispi and Bertami he planned the invasion of Sicily. Assured of the sympathy of England by Sir James Hudson, he began preparations for the expedition of Marsala.

In revolt against the Bourbon tyranny, Sicily looked to Garibaldi as her redeemer. On May 11, 1860, while Cavour shut his eyes to the affair, Garibaldi landed at Marsala. Within a few days he had defeated the enemy at Calatafimi. Having outwitted the strong garrison at Palermo, he effected an entry into that city on May 30. His victory at Milazzo about a month later established him as dictator in Victor Emmanuel's name, though the King had not given his official sanction.

Instead of crossing to Calabria, Garibaldi secretly departed for Aranci Bay in Sardinia, where Bertami was fitting out an expedition against the Papal States. Cavour, however, obliged the expedition to sail for Palermo.

Returning to Messina, he found a letter from King Victor Emmanuel II dissuading him from invading the kingdom of Naples. Garibaldi, in his reply, asked for permission to disobey, and the following day crossed the strait to Calabria, where he won the Battle of Reggio on the 21st of August. At San Giovanni 9,000 Neapolitan troops capitulated, and on October 1 he routed the remaining 40,000 Bourbon soldiers on the Volturno. The Italian troops had now occupied Le Marche, Umbria, and Abruzzi.

The presence of the Italian troops, however, put an end to the plan for the invasion of the Papal States, and Garibaldi unwillingly issued a plebiscite which was to sanction the incorporation of the two Sicilies into the Italian realm. Disbanding his volunteers, Garibaldi returned to Caprera.

Cavour could not escape from his old pledge of Plombieres to cede Savoy and Nice to France, and Garibaldi became highly indignant. Returning to political life, he became a deputy in 1861 and raised a bitter and violent voice against Cavour. Bixio attempted reconciliation, but the publication by Cialdini of a letter against Garibaldi provoked hostilities which but for the intervention of the king would have led to a duel between the two.

Returning to Caprera, Garibaldi awaited events. Cavour's successor, Ricasoli, enrolled the Garibaldians in the regular army. Rattazzi, who succeeded Ricasoli, urged Garibaldi to undertake an expedition in the aid of the Hungarians, but finding his followers ill-disposed to the plan, he decided to turn his army toward Rome.

Proclaiming a state of siege in Sicily, he sent the fleet to Messina and instructed Cialdini to oppose Garibaldi.

Circumventing the Italian troops, Garibaldi entered Catania, crossed Milito with 3,000 men on August 25, but having been wounded by Cialdini's forces at Aspromonte, Garibaldi was taken prisoner. Liberated by amnesty, he returned to Caprera.

This was not Garibaldi's last adventure; the excellence of his generalship, the magnanimity of his heart were to play many other roles, which, however, are not within the scope of this treatise. Garibaldi died on June 2, 1882. The world, remembering freedom's greatest soldier, paid its reverend tribute at the bier of the simple citizen of the world.

The year 1950 marks the centenary of Garibaldi's arrival at Staten Island. To commemorate the event, the author has prepared this article, dedicating it to the memory of the hero of two worlds. The Garibaldi House (1) in Rosebank not only has been neglected but points a finger of shame to the Italian colony in America. The Staten Island Historical Society has plans for restoring the cottage to a safe and attractive site so that it may serve the world and generations to come as a symbol of human ideals which the general cherished and for which he fought so valiantly to the last breath of his life.

The original is in Italian. Translation by Daniel Santoro, June 1950. The inscription on the tablet placed in front of the house by some friends reads as follows:

"Here lived in exile Giuseppe Garibaldi, the hero of two worlds, 1851–1853."

It erroneously stated that Garibaldi lived in Staten Island from 1851–1853. The dates should be 1850–1853. The Pantheon was dedicated on July 4, 1919.

Triple Reverse

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GORDON CANFIELD

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1950

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Sunday Star of August 27, 1950:

TRIPLE REVERSE

The House, alert to the welfare of the so-called lower animals, has appropriated funds for a new roof for the elephant house at the Zoo. This means that the elephants, the giraffs, two species of rhinoceros, a hippopotamus, and other creatures who use the elephant house, will be adequately sheltered from wind, snow, and rain.

In a remarkable series of flip-flops, however, the House has refused to permit the people of Washington to do anything worthy of mention to protect themselves against the danger of an atom-bomb attack. A request for $290,000 for civilian defense had been submitted to the House—all of the money to come from District tax revenues. The Appropriations Committee cut it down to $30,000. Then a group of members of the House District Committee, on Friday, persuaded the House to restore the full amount. But yesterday, in a third reverse, the House went back to the $30,000 figure.

This means that for the foreseeable future there will be no adequate defense preparation for the people of Washington against an atom-bomb attack. To say the least, a sorry example has been set for other cities, many of which do not even have zoos to which their residents might flee when disaster strikes.

Message From the Management to Everyone in the La Salle National Bank

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH E. FLANDERS

OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 28 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a letter from the La Salle National Bank, of Chicago, to its employees and the public dealing with their credit policy in view of the inflationary situation, and also dealing with the question of the younger men called up for service. It is such a thoroughly public-spirited letter that I believe it is well worth printing in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TO EVERYONE IN LA SALLE NATIONAL

Things are changing so fast that we thought it might be a good idea to tell you some of the thoughts that are in our mind.

Korea was—and is—a shock to all of us. We don't know anyone whose outlook and plans are not affected—anyone who is not shaken at realizing that after all the sacrifices and hardships of World War II, here we are again—in combat.

How long the conflict may last—how far it may spread—none of us can tell. It seems certain that we are in for a long period of intense rearming, enlarged military service, heavy taxation, and, above all—uncertainty. Anything can happen—at any time.

The people who will weather this period best, we believe, are those who can live calmly and courageously in that uncertainty. (Some people dread suspense more than they dread the positive knowledge that the worst is about to happen.)

One way of easing that suspense is to face the fact that some things are beyond our control, and concentrate on the things that we can influence.

For instance, we have had loan applications from people who saw a chance to profit by buying up things outside their regular business which they believed would be in short supply. These loans would have been paid off, in our opinion, and we would have made money on them. But we thought it would be a disservice to the country to make those loans, so we said no. On the other hand, if someone is converting part of his plant's production to military goods, and needs banking help, that would interest us very much. Thousands of people need financial help because this Korean conflict changes all their plans; we want to aid as many of them as we can.

To the younger men, particularly: a lot of you are wondering if—and when—you will be called into service. That's part of the big uncertainty. But you can be sure that when you are wanted, you will be told. Meanwhile, we are not doing badly if we can honestly say: "My family and I didn't load up on food or anything else when hoarding was on. We're saving money. When I see customers or relatives or friends, I don't give them jitters because I haven't got them myself. I'm tending to my job at the bank, and the bank is trying to do its job toward the country."

If you have personal problems that you'd like to talk over with either of us, don't hesitate a minute to come in and unburden yourself. Here at La Salle, we have always worked together closely; this unity means more than ever today.

SAMUEL ARMOUR,
Chairman of the Board.
J. C. WRIGHT,
President.

Keep the Heat On

HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1950

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, before this session closes I want to again express my opposition to the proposed compulsory health-insurance or socialized-medicine legislation before the Congress and the people.

I want to warn the doctors and dentists of the Nation, the various hospital organizations, the nurses and hospital attendants, and the people who are opposed to socialized medicine, that there is an attempt being made on the part of some Democratic candidates and the administration to lull them and the people interested into the thought that those who favor socialized medicine are, to some extent, abandoning their pressure for this legislation. They only want it to cool off till after the election.

This is a political trick in the hope that the doctors and dentists and the people generally may be deceived by such action and slow down their opposition to Democrat candidates for the House and Senate at this time.

KEEP THE HEAT ON

My advice to the medical and dental profession and others is "Be not deceived. Keep the heat turned on."

The administration will preserve this legislation in the deep freezers here in Washington made popular by General Vaughan. When the election is over they will again bring it to the front and demand its passage in the next Congress.

In Illinois, and some other States, Democrat candidates who favored socialized medicine, and who proudly wear the yoke of the administration and the labor bosses, are now playing it down. In some instances they now boldly state they are opposed to compulsory health insurance or socialized medicine. Some of them who said they were for it are now singing a different song. Again I say, "Be not deceived."

IT'S A PART OF LABOR'S TICKET

The left wingers of the Nation, fellow travelers, big labor bosses in the CIO, and other powerful labor organizations who largely control this administration are more interested in fastening compulsory health insurance or socialized medicine on the people of this Nation than they are in the repeal of the Taft-Hartley law, or any other piece of legislation.

Labor will carry on the fight for it in the next session of Congress with renewed vigor. They are soft-pedaling now to get you to turn off the heat, hoping to elect candidates they have endorsed whom they know they can and will control if they are elected.

Mr. Speaker, the American Medical Association, which was smeared, slandered, and persecuted when it started this fight to protect the health of the people, is not likely to be fooled by this move on the part of the administration for political expediency. The dental profession and hospital organizations throughout the Nation will likewise not likely be deceived.

Those organizations which have opposed this socialistic, communistic scheme, along with the great majority of the people who realize that it would cost billions of dollars and lower the type of medical and dental service to the people, rather than slow down, should increase their efforts to elect Members of the House and Senate who have fought against this threat to the health of our people, Members who they know will meet the challenge and continue to fight against it when it comes before the Congress next January, as it surely will.

Mr. Speaker, the President has twice recommended the enactment of this legislation. He will recommend its enactment again in the coming Eighty-second Congress. When the House is organized, if the Democrats have a majority and elect the Speaker, he and his party will be committed to the passage of this legislation. The power of the President will be put behind it.

On the other hand, if a majority of Republicans are elected to Congress they will elect the Speaker of the House who, along with the Republican Members who are elected with him, are committed to be against compulsory health insurance or socialized medicine. If the Republicans control the House of Representatives such a bill will not pass, and no other socialistic or communistic legislation will be written on the statute books during the coming 2 years.

IT IS UN-AMERICAN

Mr. Speaker, compulsory health insurance or socialized medicine is un-American and does not spring from the American people. It is a mixture of Socialist and Communist ideology. It has failed in every European country where it has been tried.

The great white father of socialized medicine is Communist Russia. Listen to the words of Lenin, the founder of communism in Russia. Here is what he said, "Socialized medicine is the keystone of the arch of the socialistic state."

That ought to settle the question so far as the American people are concerned.

We have already adopted too many Socialist and Communist schemes of the Communist Russian state during the past number of years. If we should be forced to adopt this one it would be the greatest step toward socialism and communism taken in America in the past 25 years.

THE PEOPLE WOULD SUFFER

The bill proposed by this administration is against the interest of the citizen.

It would regiment the patient and all health activities. It would provide a political and socialized medical-care program. It would be expensive, wasteful, and time consuming. It would provide a form of regimentation of medical services administered from the national level. Such a program could not be administered in a manner pleasing either to the patient or the physician.

The quality of medical service, to the patient would be strained and inferior in the beginning, and would rapidly deteriorate. Medical research would be curtailed. Medical education would be static, and medical progress in general would be set back many years.

Mr. Speaker, the practice of medicine involves a personal contact between physician and patient. The people want a personal service with sympathy, cheerfulness, and confidence in their doctor.

The United States has the finest hospitals, medical equipment, techniques, and its physicians practice the best medicine in all the world. Why revolutionize medical practice, medical schools, hospitals, and technical research when they are doing such a good job?

This national health bill would place all medical problems under a Federal system controlled by salaried bureaucrats.

The medical student and physician would be offered a regimented practice, federally supervised and controlled.

It would be impossible under this bill for the physicians, the hospitals, and other medical services to give to the people the type and quality of medical care to which they are accustomed.

POLITICAL MEDICAL BOSS

If the proposed legislation is enacted, there is little doubt but that Oscar R. Ewing, the present Federal Security Administrator, who is not a medical man but a very active politician, will head the administration and provide the rules and regulations under which the practice of medicine and the care of the sick will be carried out.

It would place the finest medical and hospital system in the world under the direction of a politician, and if the bill were enacted, the politicians throughout the Nation in charge of boards in every county and State would stand between the doctor and the patient.

It is too dangerous to take any chances on its passage. Those leaders of the medical and dental professions and the people who are generally against this type of legislation, rather than slow down their efforts, should turn on the heat between now and November.

This Socialist step against the welfare of our Nation and the health of our people is too dangerous to take chances with. We must prepare in November to stop it in the future. We must press the fight against it at the present.

Availability of Electric Power for American Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER FERGUSON

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 28 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, on August 13, 1950, Mr. James W. Parker, president of the Detroit-Edison Co.—the same company of which former Senator Prentiss M. Brown is chairman of the board—issued a statement in relation to electric power. He expressed his opinion that the interconnected power systems of the United States were well prepared to cope with added defense loads. He said:

The light and power industry has made tremendous strides since the end of World War II. The national power situation is good—and don't let anyone tell you otherwise.

There has been a great deal said about the amount of power we have in this country, and I think it is well worth while that Members of Congress read the opinion expressed by Mr. James W. Parker.

I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"There is plenty of electric power available here in Michigan's industrial heart to carry out the area's full share of the Nation's new defense production program," Detroit Edison president, James W. Parker, said today.

There is available as much power as can be used when industrial plants take up their allotted share of the defense production loads, he said. In most instances, manpower will be the limiting factor. With every employable person in the area on the job, there will be enough electric horsepower to go around.

Parker declared there would be—just as during the last war—enough power to take care of the defense program without curbing either residential or farm use of electricity. He said the electric industry as a whole will have power to meet the country's needs, provided no governmental restrictions are imposed which would retard the construction program now under way.

"Even though new peaks of demand have been reached during 1950," the Edison president said, "our capacity is advancing well ahead of use."

Present capacity of the Edison Co. is about 1,500,000 kilowatts—roughly 2,000,000 horsepower. This includes the 200,000 kilowatts added recently at Trenton Channel. Two new turbo-generators which will go into service at Conners Creek within a year will bring capacity to 1,750,000 kilowatts.

Also important are the interconnections with others. Between Consumers Power and the Edison Co. the interconnections have been tripled to strengthen Michigan's overall electric supply system.

Parker also announced that construction will soon start on a project to add another 250,000 kilowatts. Originally scheduled in part at an existing plant, this addition may, in view of recent events, require the building of a new plant.

The company's revised expansion plan will enable it to keep longer in service three older generators which were slated for retirement before the outbreak of trouble in Korea, Parker explained.

"I hope present stepped-up expansion of the Nation's electric power will not be interrupted," Parker said. "It is vital that the Government should cooperate in private power company expansion plans."

The present Edison expansion target is 1,850,000 kilowatts by 1953 or before. This represents an increase of more than 750,000 kilowatts since 1945.

Parker said this goal has been set with an eye to maintaining year-round, around-the-clock industrial production—either for armament or for whatever the Nation calls upon the Detroit area to build.

Commenting on Nation-wide power adequacy, Parker said reports of the entire electric industry show that power supply in most parts of the country is geared to keep well ahead of both industrial and civilian needs. This takes the defense production program, as now known to the industry, fully into account.

Electric generating capability today is nearly double that of 1941, totaling 66,000,000 kilowatts. Since World War II, 16,500,000 kilowatts have been added. Another 18,000,000 kilowatts at least will be available by the end of 1953, according to present estimates.

At present, 80 percent of the Nation's electric power is being generated by investor-owned companies, whose systems have been built entirely with private capital.

Parker reiterated his hope that Government limitations would not halt scheduled expansions. Most electric companies' expansion programs have been speeded up since the United Nations undertook the task of driving the Communists out of South Korea.

Confidence was again expressed by Parker that the interconnected power systems of the United States are well prepared to cope with added defense loads. "The light and power industry has made tremendous strides since the end of World War II," he said. "The national power situation is good—and don't let anyone tell you otherwise."

Tools Back in Spotlight

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANTONI N. SADLAK

OF CONNECTICUT

Monday, August 28, 1950

Mr. SADLAK. Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of my colleagues an article entitled "Tools Back in Spotlight," that appeared in the Steel magazine of July 24, 1950. It is quite apparent that the present situation in Korea is such that very shortly there must be a large demand for machine tools and it is too bad that this industry is not receiving the consideration it should. The article follows:

TOOLS BACK IN SPOTLIGHT—MACHINE BUILDERS STILL DOING BUSINESS WITH REGULAR CUSTOMERS DESPITE DEFENSE RUMORS

Machine tools are an area of speculation and wonder again. After a long period when machine tools were in surplus supply, users are beginning to worry about availability.

A lot of the rumors about what is going on in machine tools have no foundation. Reports are going the rounds about military buying for instance. They are true only in a qualified sense. The Armed Forces are buying machines but not at any greater rate than before.

DEPENDS ON MACHINE

Some companies are wisely trying to get their houses in order by replacing obsolete equipment. Whether they have to wait very long for delivery depends on the machine purchased. Some standard items, like lathes, can be purchased from stock, as they have not shared in improved business that special machinery builders have enjoyed since the start of this year. As the result of deals being closed for modernization purposes the whole machine tool industry is doing better. Earlier this year, though the National Machine Tool Builders' Association's index was up, some standard machine builders weren't benefiting.

A few companies are dusting off escalator clauses because materials costs are rising. Here too it depends on what machine is ordered and how long it will be until it is shipped. In many cases it represents no change from a policy in effect since the end of World War II.

MUSCLES WITHERED

Relative strength of the machine tool industry, as measured by its ability to produce equipment, in some respects is below 1941. From 1936 to 1939 plants were building tools for Europe. The defense preparations starting in 1940 showed up a lot of bottlenecks. In 1942 shipments were $1,300,000,000, an all-time peak.

They have declined every year since then, and industry employment is down to about 36,000. Although some companies have larger plants, parts of them cannot be considered machine tool capacity because they are devoted to making other equipment.

What Can We Americans Do To Start a Marshall Plan of Ideas?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH E. FLANDERS
OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 28 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an advertisement by the Toledo (Ohio) Blade in the Paris edition of the Herald Tribune, which advertisement asks that Americans abroad report on what they find to be the general opinion as to the effect of the Marshall plan, the reputation in which the United States is held by the people among whom they travel, and similar matters.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT CAN WE AMERICANS DO TO START A MARSHALL PLAN OF IDEAS?

To Americans Abroad:

Men who know the world situation say America is losing the war of ideas. President Truman, Secretary Acheson, Eisenhower, Marshall, Clay, Dulles, and others have warned repeatedly that we must step up a thousandfold our efforts to tell the American story to people of other lands.

Now a stateside newspaper wants to know what it can do—and what its readers can do—to help the United States wage this vigorous campaign of truth.

Perhaps you, being on the scene, have some practical suggestions as to what we at home can do. Perhaps there are even ways in which you, too, can help right now while you are in Europe, and which other Americans who will follow may carry on.

One authority has said, "The world must hear what America is about, what America believes, what freedom is, what it has done for many, what it can do for all. We must use every means we know to communicate the value of freedom to the four corners of the earth. Our message must go out a hundred different ways. It will carry conviction because it comes not out of the Government alone but out of the hearts and souls of the people of the United States. Because it is the authentic Voice of America, freedom will ring around the world."

President Truman has asked Congress for $125,000,000 for a vastly expanded campaign of truth. This, of course, would finance the United States Government's official program.

But aren't there other ways for men and women and even the children of America, and for newspapers like the Toledo Blade, to help win this terribly urgent war of ideas?

We think there are. We think you might have some suggestions as to how Americans abroad and at home might now participate personally.

Perhaps you have an opinion on present or possible international information activities.

For instance, do the people of countries you have visited believe the United States acted defensively in Korea, or has Russian propaganda succeeded in its effort to label us the aggressor?

Would it be worth while to stimulate a campaign of letters to the world similar to the letters to Italy campaign, which originated in Toledo?

Can you suggest ways to make the Voice of America broadcasts more effective?

Could the public help substantially to counteract communist propaganda by sending quantities of newspapers and magazines to the some 150 United States Information Service libraries abroad?

How can American newspapers and industries best help in getting America's story to a world audience?

Can you suggest any methods of encouraging men and women here to personally support with all their vigor a Marshall plan of ideas?

This is an invitation for you to send us such ideas as you might have. We will acknowledge them and send you a copy of the issue that contains anything you contribute. Air mail your suggestions, please (if possible in letters under 500 words so we may publish them), to Michael Bradshaw, editor.

Aggressor's Blueprint

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAY LeFEVRE
OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1950

Mr. LeFEVRE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article by Mark Sullivan which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune of Sunday, August 27. At a time like this when we have one high Government official, Mr. Jessup, our Ambassador at Large, speaking apparently for the Department of State, opposing our starting a war, while another high Government official, Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Matthews, expresses the view that the United States should be willing to start a war if necessary to compel cooperation for peace, I think it is well to read Mr. Sullivan's article and give some thought to Mr. Stassen's suggestion:

AGGRESSOR'S BLUEPRINT — MARK SULLIVAN TELLS HOW RUSSIA PLANS TO SCATTER POWER OF UNITED STATES

(By Mark Sullivan)

Our people watch Korea concentrating their attention on the battles there. Unconsciously or wishfully they assume that sooner or later we will triumph there, and that this will be the end of the chapter. It could be the end of the chapter but only the beginning of the book. This ought to be clear from the preparation we are making for a prolonged and major war, and is crystal clear to those who think through. Thinking through is only approximately possible even to the best informed. For not all the information is available to anyone; much of it exists only in the minds of the Russian Communist heads, their intentions and plans.

One who has thought through with thoroughness and clarity is former Gov. Harold E. Stassen, of Minnesota, now president of the University of Pennsylvania. He concludes that Russian communism aims to overcome the United States by definite methods, carefully planned. One method, major in importance, is, in Mr. Stassen's words: "The continuous embroiling of * * * the United States in minor wars at distant, difficult points to tire and weaken us and bleed us white."

The present example of this is Korea. Belief held in thoroughly informed quarters is that Russian communism plans aggressions similar to the Korean one in from five to eight other places distantly separated from each other. The aggressions will be opposed by the United States; we have committed ourselves to it.

Consider now the military strength that is already in existence and available for service overseas. A large part of this was already in use before Korea, as occupation forces in Japan and Germany. A percentage of our remaining available strength is now being used in Korea. How much this percentage is cannot be estimated with any accuracy; it is almost certainly a large percentage, for undoubtedly we are making use in Korea of everything we can spare of men, material and the other factors that enter into military strength.

Imagine now that Russian communism makes another aggression while the Korean one is still on; in Formosa, for example. This would call for an additional percentage of our military strength, probably at least as much as in Korea. Yet another aggression in any of the places where aggression is apprehended would demand an additional percentage of our strength. Some of the anticipated or feared aggressions, as in Europe, would demand large percentages.

Add up all these percentages, and the sum is more than we have. This is a grim conclusion. To escape it or minimize it, we turn to possible counteracting factors. We consider that possibly Russian communism may not make the new aggressions soon, but we may have time to increase our strength. But to assume that Russian communism will withhold further aggressions until we build up our strength is to assume that it will forego an immense advantage which it has planned for and in use of which it has made a beginning in Korea. Similarly vain for the same reason is any assumption that the aggressions will not go on simultaneously. To assume that is to assume that Russian communism will not use this method of overcoming us.

One counteracting factor which has substance is that we will have help from the other countries which are with us in resisting the Korean aggression, as called for by the United Nations. But willing though the other nations have been to come forward, limitations upon what they can do are suggested by the amount they have been able to contribute, so far. Besides, some of these countries are directly in the line of expected aggressions, and they must build up and maintain their home defenses.

The sum of all is that Russian communism is in the way of overcoming us by a method of warfare it devised, in which it has the initiative and in which we are on the defensive, obliged to adjust ourselves to the moves that Russian communism makes. The one advantage we have, commonly believed to be decisive if we use it, is the atomic bomb. But here is part of the ingenuity of the method of warfare Russian communism is practicing. It assumes that while we might use the atomic bomb against an attack made upon us by Russia directly, we will hesitate to use it against aggression that Russian communism inspires in small countries.

This condition has led to several suggestions. One by Mr. Stassen is especially concrete. He would have us, and the United Nations, serve formal notice on the Kremlin that we will hold it responsible—that if the Communist leaders do in fact start world war III by aggression through their satellites and puppets, we and our associates in the United Nations intend to finish it, in due time, against the Kremlin itself.

Use of Waters of Belly and Waterton Rivers, Mont.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WESLEY A. D'EWART
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1950

Mr. D'EWART. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make reference again to the problem of beneficial use in the United States of the waters of the Belly and Waterton Rivers, which arise in Montana and flow north into Canada.

The International Joint Commission has been studying this problem for many months, and we understand that the Commission's field committee, composed of engineers from Canada and the United States, has failed to reach an agreement as to plans for mutual development of this resource.

It is understood that a meeting of the International Joint Commission will be held in Ottawa in October, and it is hoped that the Commission will make some substantial progress to overcome the present disagreement and reach an agreement respecting the division and use of the waters before that date.

The matter has been pending for some 5 years, and further delay is extremely irritating to residents of Montana, who note that in the meantime Canada is completing various reservoirs and canals which involves the potential use of water that does not belong to that country.

As an example of the feeling in Montana, I include as part of my remarks an editorial on the subject from the Lewistown Daily News. It follows:

AS WE SEE IT—WATERTON AND BELLY RIVERS—TESTS IN UNITED STATES AND CANADA COOPERATION

It is almost a month now since the cool waters of the Waterton and Belly Rivers caused hot debate on both sides of the United States-Canadian line, in hearings before the International Joint Commission.

So there has been time for cooler contemplation over the demands made by both countries for these waters, which rise largely in the United States but flow north into Canada.

Alberta and Saskatchewan wanted all the waters from these rivers for irrigation projects north of the international line.

Montana wanted its fair share to irrigate parched lands in between Havre, Shelby, Cut Bank, and the Canadian line.

WE HAVE SLUMBERED

In fairness to the Canadians, it must be admitted that we have slumbered for years so far as these waters are concerned, giving them the idea that they might be able to use all the water from the Waterton and Belly Rivers.

In fairness to the United States, these rivers rise largely in Glacier National Park, on the Montana side of the border, so the water is originally ours.

We have even talked of cutting a tunnel through the mountains, and taking all of the water for ourselves if the two countries don't get together on a fair distribution. This can be done, too, if we don't pay much attention to costs, and a bill has been introduced in Congress that would make the project possible. But we would dislike seeing such action.

However, a new element has entered into the discussion that may help effect a compromise—this spring's tragic flood in the Red River Valley, which put much of Winnipeg under water, and the entire area from the Manitoba capitol to the North Dakota-Minnesota line.

EIGHT HUNDRED MILES TOGETHER

It is almost 800 miles from this point on the plains to the Waterton and Belly Rivers, high in the Rockies, but they are definitely related in the over-all picture.

Canada needs the cooperation of the United States in preventing or controlling such floods in the future. And this cooperation seems forthcoming. So, if the two nations work together in one point on the international line, it seems logical that they should do the same at other points.

On the Red River, it is a problem of "turning the water off," and up in the high Alberta and Montana plains, it is a case of "turning on" the waters of the Waterton and Belly Rivers. But the principle of international cooperation is the same.

Canada's members of the international Commission have already been criticized on the floor of the House of Commons in Ottawa for what some members consider delay in acting on flood problems. The record is in the official report for May 1, 1950.

ON THE SPOT

The Honorable J. A. Ross, House of Commons member from Souris, Manitoba, criticized the Canadian members of the Commission as follows:

"May I say that so far as the Canadian appointments to the International Joint Commission on Water Rights are concerned, many people consider this a lucrative pension scheme to certain people for past faithful service. * * * There is great dissatisfaction in this regard among people well acquainted with these flood problems. In fact, the engineers' association has publicly protested this method of appointment."

We are unable to enter into this argument, but must say that we were most impressed with the two Canadian members of the Commission who appeared at Havre at the June 17 hearing. G. S. Spence, of Saskatchewan, is one of Canada's grand old men in service and ability. Gen. A. G. L. McNaughton is Canada's Gen. George Marshall. So there is no question that our friends from north of the border sent big leaguers of great prestige and talent to the Waterton-Belly hearings—men who must also act on the Red River flood-control problem.

NO COMMENT

But, as to Canadian charges that the Commission has delayed in acting on flood control, we are unfamiliar with this, and cannot comment

In asking action, Mr. Ross said: "It is obvious that the people of the United States are trying to do something about this recurring situation."

The Honorable Rene N. Jutras, of Provencher, however, preceded Mr. Ross in urging the Commission to do something.

"I ask the Government to press the international joint commission to speed up its engineering report on the control of floods in the area," Mr. Justras said, "to try to get some action, and to explore further to see whether, if they cannot be wholly controlled, they may be partly controlled."

So the Canadian members of the Commission are on the spot so far as flood water agreements are concerned.

Whether this is also true regarding a settlement of the Waterton-Belly controversy is concerned, we do not know.

DELAYED ACTION?

There is a feeling that General McNaughton is fighting a delayed action—that he wishes to stall settlement just as long as possible so more and more of the water will already be put into use by Canadian farmers, on the theory that once in use it won't be taken away from them.

This feeling may be entirely unfair to the General, who is certainly one of Canada's greatest men, but it does exist. Time and action will either confirm or refute it.

Anyway, division of the waters of the Waterton-Belly Rivers has become a mooted and much booted question recently on both sides of the international border.

That there is need for international cooperation on river problems is certainly plain to the Canadians in the Red River valley. And if this is true there, it is also the case 800 miles to the west, where the Waterton and Belly Rivers flow from the Montana into Alberta.

So the decision of the International Joint Commission will be awaited with much interest.

It is hoped that it will be released soon.

HON. ANTONI N. SADLAK
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1950

Mr. SADLAK. Mr. Speaker, the latest report of the Employment Security Division of the Department of Labor, State of Connecticut, lists unemployment claims at 21,715. In order to give the complete picture as it is indicated for the State of Connecticut by this report, I ask that it be printed in its entirety so that my colleagues from beyond the State of Connecticut who continue to make inquiry about the unemployment status may be informed of the over-all picture, which includes 30,350 exhaustions of claims since January 1, 1950. It follows:

UNEMPLOYMENT CLAIMS DOWN TO 21,715

The number of unemployment claims in Connecticut dropped to 21,715 during the week ended August 19 from 24,849 for the previous week. Last week's figures included 2,884 claims for vacation shutdowns where employees did not receive vacation pay and filed jobless claims.

The above totals include 10,242 women who made up 47.8 percent of the total.

INITIAL CLAIMS DECLINE

Initial claims under the Connecticut law numbered 1,702 last week, 2,327 the previous week and 4,399 2 weeks ago.

EXHAUSTIONS

Those exhausting their benefits last week numbered 500, making the total 30,350 since January 1, 1950.

National Security Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1950

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Record, I include the following:

JOINT STATEMENT ON THE NATIONAL SECURITY LEGISLATION NOW PENDING BEFORE THE CONGRESS, ISSUED BY THE NATIONAL CIVIL LIBERTIES CLEARING HOUSE

The undersigned officers of organizations, conscious of the need for adequate internal security measures, united in their opposition to all totalitarian political movements, and committed to the preservation of the democratic way of life at home and abroad, are unalterably opposed to the McCarran (S. 4037), Mundt-Ferguson (S. 2311) and Wood (H. R. 9490) bills pending before the Congress. We urge that legislation in the spirit of the President's message of August 8 on national security be substituted for these measures. The Magnuson and Celler bills (S. 4061 and H. R. 9502) are such an approach to the problem and although some of the undersigned have objections to some of their provisions, we consider them clearly preferable to the McCarran and Mundt-Ferguson proposals.

The McCarran, Mundt-Ferguson, and Wood bills are indiscriminately repressive measures, ostensibly written to meet the Communist threat to our national security, but they will not do that job. They jeopardize the rights of individuals and of organizations which not only are not subversive but are dedicated in principles and program to the fight against Communism. They represent a hysterical approach to a serious national problem which can only be met through an understanding of the nature of the Communist movement in this country and a faithful adherence to the basic principles of the Bill of Rights.

The Magnuson and Celler bills would be more adequate to protect the country against threats while maintaining conformity to traditional American guaranties of individual freedom. We most earnestly hope that the Congress will not endorse totalitarian methods to fight totalitarian dangers.

Himstead, General Secretary, American Association of University Professors; Ernest Angell, Chairman of the Board, and Patrick Murphy Malin, Director, American Civil Liberties Union; James Loeb, Jr., Executive Secretary, Americans for Democratic Action; John Slawson, Executive Director, American Jewish Committee; Isaac Toubin, Acting Director, American Jewish Congress; Elmer W. Time of Great Peril

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY W. WIER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1950

Mr. WIER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial from the Hennepin County Review, a weekly newspaper in my district—the Third—at Hopkins, Minn., written August 24, 1950, entitled, "Time of Great Peril."

I submit this editorial because of its relationship to the huge expenditure of moneys we have just set up in our $54,000,000,000 appropriations legislation.

The editorial is as follows:

TIME OF GREAT PERIL

Our decision to defend Formosa against the Chinese Communist army, single-handedly—it will be remembered that the United Nations did not go along with us on that decision—has met with a cold, universal and fearful reaction in the world capitals. If we are compelled by the turn of events to make good on this commitment, we shall be on our own, on the other side of the earth, tortured by a 5,000-mile supply line, and fighting 450,000,000 Chinese, to the extreme delight of Russia, the apprehension of our Western allies, and the disgust of all Asiatics.

In such a war, India might well find herself allied against us—that is to say, forced into an alliance with Russia and China. In India today the suspicion against America is increasing alarmingly. India's Nehru is bitterly disappointed over Washington's stubborn refusal, to date, to get off the Formosa hook if the expression may be employed in dealing with a subject so grave.

Our position respecting Formosa constitutes the most alarming phase of our foreign relations. In its gravity it transcends the immediate war picture in Korea by many times. All of our so-called Western European friends are sweating it out, praying that we transfer the problem to the United Nations while there is yet time—before an invasion move by the Red army of China precipitates a duel of guns between MacArthur and Mao Tsing. Meanwhile, Mr. Joseph Stalin no doubt wants nothing at the moment more than to see Mao Tsing give the order that will mean a Chinese-American war.

With 40 percent of the world's people already under Russian control, one trembles in contemplation of a war against China. It could very well be in the beginning of a war between the colored and white races of the earth. In the world today there are three colored citizens for every single white. We have now taught the colored man to shoot. In Korea he has convinced himself he can shoot pretty well, that there is no valid ground for an inferiority complex when he comes to grips with the white man on the battlefield.

Why have the world's leaders in four decades allowed affairs to reach such a tragic state? Why must the civilized peoples of the world devote themselves continually to war, to the insane business of shooting one another down? Why cannot the world's peoples live in peace?

The answers lie in the sinful refusal of too many of the governments of the world to live and let live. Millions on millions of the world's unfortunate little people have been kept to heel by the colonial powers for hundreds and hundreds of years. The profits of their labor have gone to the exploiters, while they themselves have lived on animal levels or worse, much of the time on the verge of starvation.

These little people long since have decided they prefer death to continual destitution. They propose henceforth to eat, or else to shoot it out to the death if that be their only alternative. There is a world revolution in progress. We have failed, in the United States, to catch hold of this basic fact. Everywhere we have been dealing with governments unconcerned with their peoples' welfare—concerned only with their own selfish and corrupt financial and political ends.

In South Korea, for example, the government of Sigmund Rhee has been as corrupt as was the government of Chiang Kai-shek in his heyday on the mainland of China. Rhee ruled a police state and kept his countrymen in daily terror. He refused to give the people land, although the land, seized from the Japanese at the end of World War II, belonged to the people. The list of his crimes against his people classifies him beyond question as a small-time Fascist of the Hitler-Franco-Mussolini pattern. We supported Sigmund Rhee. We sent the proper diplomatic congratulations to him the other day on the anniversary of South Korean independence. The people of South Korea loathe and hate him as a deadly enemy.

So it has been most everywhere. In Greece we supported a dictator government. In Indochina we assist the French government as they shoot down the people there who want nothing but their independence, and a chance to eat, as did our own American forefathers in 1776; in the Philippines we support a corrupt government whose hard core is comprised of men who were infamous collaborators with the Japanese during World War II.

Recently we loaned the dictator Peron of Argentina $125,000,000. Scarcely before Peron had put that money into circulation he was damning the capitalist countries with the vehemence he usually reserves for Communist countries. Our Congress only a few days ago passed a law ordering the Export-Import Bank to loan $100,000,000 to Franco, the gangster of Spain, the old pal of Hitler, the one remaining Fascist tyrant of the Hitler-Mussolini school and fraternity. Everywhere, it seems, we support governments conducted by this breed of ruler. Is it any wonder the small people around the world wonder? Is it any wonder that they believe Stalin when his propaganda agencies screech out the charge that we are imperialists and money grubbers—that we are out to exploit half the world, now that England's star of empire has fallen?

The American people do not believe in their hearts that their American Government should support evil governments, but they are loyal, and they will support their Government and their country, right or wrong. The American people themselves do not wish to exploit other unfortunates of other lands. When America is looked upon as an imperialist nation, an exploiter, as Stalin has convinced so many we are, it is unjust to the people of the United States. We are not that kind of people, even though our Government has made it appear we are.

Our Voice of America has not been getting through to these people across and around the earth. They do not know us. They hear and hear that our Government has been supporting, always and always, those rulers and those governments who have been against the people. They hear this from Stalin and that is almost all they hear. Thus they convict us as imperialists. Convicted, we are without friends and under suspicion.

So there we are, in the eyes of the world, as we stand perilously near a war with China, a single-handed and lonesome war, in which we shall find ourselves without friends or allies.

There we are, as Stalin cunningly pulls his diplomatic strings from the Kremlin, the strings designed to get us into trouble, and keep us there, until we descend to the status of a second-rate power.

There we are, as the ferment of a war between the races bubbles and bubbles, ever more ominously.

The United States sits today on a hot seat in the troubled world arena. Never have we confronted a crisis so grave and menacing. Inspired leadership, calm thinking, a steady hand at the helm, and the grace of God are what we must have. Without them, and especially the latter, we stand as a Nation and a people in deadly peril.

Weak and Uncertain Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I want to include and have printed in the RECORD an editorial written by Gordon Morrow, the editor of the Wellston Sentinel, a very influential newspaper in my congressional district. Mr. Morrow served long and faithfully in World War II and is always well posted on all public questions. I compliment him on his forthright statement:

OUTPOST—NOTES AND COMMENTS

As Wellston's life is increasingly disrupted by the recall to active duty of more and more reservists necessitated by our complete unpreparedness for the Korean war, the finger points at two men directly responsible.

They are Secretary of State Dean Acheson and Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson.

It was Acheson's failure of a concrete foreign policy in the Far East which gave the North Korean Reds the opportunity to sweep to the south, and it was Johnson's failure to have an adequate Defense Establishment built up to resist successfully (without calling reservists) such a sweep to the south.

Johnson was the guy who said we could lick Russia (and presumably her satellites) with one hand tied behind our backs. He hamstrung the Navy, cut down the Air Force, and all but obliterated the Marine Corps.

Who did MacArthur want when the going got tough in Korea? The Marine Corps. To whom did President Truman give the first defense order? The United States Seventh Fleet.

In the period following World War I, Washington crucified the messiah of airpower, Gen. Billy Mitchell, and in the period following World War II, Washington crucified the messiah of defense, the late Secretary James Forrestal.

In 1947 and in 1948, Forrestal pointed the way. He was so opposed and ridiculed that he collapsed, and later took his own life. Subsequent events proved he was right.

In the late 1940's Forrestal predicted that Russia or her satellites would move when the Reds got the A-bomb. We were at war then, he said, not a shooting war, but a political war. In 1947 he said:

"* * * start now to build up other forms of military power to balance the threat of Soviet armies when the atom can't protect us any longer."

Forrestal meant: giving arms to our European friends, create a reserve of ready-to-fight ground troops here in the United States, plus tactical air power; step up the Navy anti-submarine program; and build up the air defense of our home territory.

He said that historically, the balance of power is a pretty good means of keeping the peace. He showed us the way to maintain a balance of power. If we had taken his advice in 1948, we would have had a year's start on Russia. But the Reds exploded their first A-bomb a year ago, and we again were caught with our defenses down.

It will cost us heavily in the next few years, for in war, time is the most precious of all commodities. It can only be repurchased at the price of blood. And that is what we are doing now.

Ohio's Water Policies in Accord With California's Stand Against Fantastic Central Arizona Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, August 26, 1950

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, I commend to my colleagues a statement of water policy of the State of Ohio, prepared by the Ohio Water Resources Board.

Especially I call attention of the House Members to the Ohio board's recommendations with regard to reclamation. It follows:

With regard to reclamation it is this board's opinion that a moratorium should be declared on further irrigation projects in view of the burdensome agricultural surpluses on hand. Present irrigation projects are not self-paying and involve huge Federal subsidies. It would be to the national interest to spend such funds in areas of heavy population for needed water resources developments where they will contribute substantially to industrial production.

On page A5358 of the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is a statement of mine in which I recommended that Congress put in mothballs unnecessary and costly reclamation plans which would burden the Nation's war effort. I cited as an example of a totally fantastic and unfeasible proposed development, the central Arizona project, which would cost more than a billion dollars to construct, and would mean an additional loss in interest to the Nation's taxpayers of more than $2,000,000,000.

The proposed Arizona project would increase greatly the burdensome agricultural surpluses on hand. It would grow crops which are already heavily subsidized. This would be done at enormous cost to the Federal Treasury. Thus, the taxpayers of each State would not only have to pay the cost and the interest losses, but would have to pay more subsidies for crops already in great surplus.

Let me point up another important paragraph in the State of Ohio recommendations. It follows:

The board does not believe in the further indiscriminate development of water resources for any purpose unless each specific project serves a need that can be demonstrated, and that the benefits to be derived substantially exceed the cost. It is the opinion of the board that a substantial contribution should be made by the localities who receive the major benefit.

Here, again, the proposed central Arizona project is an excellent illustration for the views of the Ohio board.

For instance, under the Arizona project plan the irrigators who would benefit would pay less than the costs of operation, maintenance, and replacements, and therefore would pay no part of the construction cost allocated to irrigation. Nor would the Arizona irrigators pay for any part of their water distribution or drainage works. No other Bureau of Reclamation project has been authorized where such a situation would exist, and it is in violation of section 9 (d) of the Reclamation Project Act of 1939.

The State of Ohio believes that a substantial contribution should be made by localities who benefit from a reclamation project. The Arizona localities which would benefit under the proposed central Arizona project would receive the project benefits as a gift from the people of other States, and Ohio's share of the contribution would be immense.

Conservation of the diminishing water resources of our Nation is one of our most vital internal problems. Every State is involved, and I suggest that the Members of the House read the opinions of the Ohio board.

The complete statement follows:

STATEMENT OF WATER POLICY

(This statement represents the opinion of the Ohio Water Resources Board after a hearing attended by representatives of public and private agencies interested in water policy and is respectfully submitted to the President's Water Resources Policy Commission.)

The proper development of the Nation's water resources is of profound importance to our economy and well-being. The water resources available for development are limited, and therefore great thought and care must be given to the development of those that remain. It is estimated that one-half of the total water resources in the United States have already been developed.

Complete development will require large capital outlays which by the nature of the investment requiring long periods for repayment and amortization must be made by Government. The amount of available public capital is not unlimited, which indicates a further need for careful analysis of any water-resources project.

The board does not believe in the further indiscriminate development of water resources for any purpose unless each specific project serves a need that can be demonstrated and that the benefits to be derived substantially exceed the cost. It is the opinion of the board that a substantial contribution should be made by the localities who receive the major benefit.

Successful development of water resources requires a complete knowledge of all phases of the hydrologic cycle, which can only be obtained by a continuing inventory and research. We believe the cooperative program of the States and United States Geological Survey is an effective means of obtaining these important data.

The board believes in an adequate system of flood control for the security and protection of our people from floods. Flood-control spending might well be geared to the state of the Nation's economy and not be pursued with a break-neck pace when other demands are putting severe pressure on the Nation's economy. It could well be used as a backlog of useful public works when the economy needs stimulation. Any flood-control project should show economic benefits substantially greater than the cost.

This board is opposed to regional or valley authorities, which permit a minimum of local autonomy or control. It is believed the conservancy method which has been successfully used in Ohio points the way toward a democratic type of organization for development of the water resources and that with Federal financial assistance and guidance this could result in more economical first cost and operation of water-resources projects.

This board favors a program of soil conservation not only to save our soil resources but to preserve our water resources by reducing siltation and increasing infiltration. Further research and on-site farm assistance is recommended in cooperation with State and local governments. This can best be accomplished by separating farm-subsidy programs from the soil and water-conservation programs.

This board is of the opinion that where hydroelectric power can be developed in conjunction with flood-control or irrigation projects that such power should be generated and sold wholesale to those in the business of distributing electricity. It also believes that where steam auxiliaries are necessary to firm up such power such installation should be by private utilities and not by the Federal Government.

With regard to reclamation it is this board's opinion that a moratorium should be declared on further irrigation projects in view of the burdensome agricultural surpluses on hand. Present irrigation projects are not self-repaying and involve huge Federal subsidies. It would be to the national interest to spend such funds in areas of heavy population for needed water resources developments where they will contribute substantially to industrial production.

In the board's deliberation the thought arose as to why there had been created a President's Water Resources Policy Commission and these reasons seemed most compelling:

1. We have a confused national water policy and program at present. It wasn't planned that way but like Topsy it just grew.

2. That except in rare instances there has not been a broad basin-wide, regional, or national viewpoint in selecting projects. They have been selected through log-rolling and pressure-group methods.

3. That the pace at which water projects are being built outstrips the available knowledge of stream regimen and other hydrologic occurrences, and that we should greatly accellerate a program of hydrologic investigation prior to such construction.

4. That the allocation of cost between the Federal Government and local beneficiaries is confused, and local beneficiaries do not pay their proper share of the cost. If such a proper cost allocation were insisted upon it would tend to decelerate the unwise and hasty building of projects.

5. That many claimed benefits are nebulous or nonexistent. Conversely only belatedly have other benefits been recognized (i. e., sanitation benefits due to low-flow regulation).

6. That possibly a reason for some of this lack of wisdom is that agencies which perform design and construction also pass on economic justification and feasibility.

7. A paramount conclusion is that there is a need for a permanent Federal water resources policy commission.

The board considered what the organization and functions of such a permanent body should be and these were suggested:

a. It should be an independent commission similar to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

b. It should have the power to determine whether any water resources project should be included in the Federal budget.

c. It should set up criteria for economic justification of water resources projects which shall apply everywhere in the United States.

d. It should set up water resources projects in the order of their cost-benefit ratios, those having the most favorable ratios to be constructed first.

e. It should set up formulas for allocating funds to States for water resources development based on their population, contribution to the Federal income, and their present and potential water needs.

f. It should promote a program of expanded hydrologic inventory and research.

g. The commission should be staffed by the most competent hydrologic and economic experts of the Nation.

American Common Sense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I have sought over my many years' service in Congress to always cast a vote that would strengthen and not weaken this Republic. I believe that I have a record of economy as shown by my votes that is unsurpassed by any other Member of the House of Representatives.

The most valuable heritage which I can leave to the members of my family, to my friends and constituents is our form of government unimpaired financially, spiritually, with all of its traditions and ideals intact, as bequeathed to a freedom-loving people.

I know that the great mass of the people who constitute the population of these United States feel just as I do with regard to our glorious heritage. There is only one group of people who can preserve this great Republic of ours, and that group constitutes the sovereign citizens who are clothed with the power to select by their votes at the polls the men who are to control the purse strings of the Government.

I have received a letter from a constituent which I believe comes from the brain and heart of a true American, and I, therefore, under unanimous consent, make it a part of my remarks. I am omitting the name of the author of this letter for the reason that under present conditions it might subject her to communistic reprisal:

Some reflections of one native-born voter who has earned her own living since she was 17:

1. On economy: The first thing done by any individual worth his salt when confronted with abnormal expenses which must be met is to curtail his normal spending by every dollar, yes, every dime possible, regardless of the fact that such curtailment means real hardship to him and his. The individual who does not do that, goes down under the weight of his additional burdens and is never his own man again.

Distressing as it is to think about, our Government is definitely faced with abnormal expenses for expanding military mobilization throughout all of the presently foreseeable future; and one of the most important steps that can be taken is for our national Government to economize rigidly, right now, on ordinary expenditures of all kinds, beginning with paper, pencils, and rubber bands, and carrying all the way through even to funds made available to other countries.

2. On communistic controls: My constitutional rights and civil liberties are precious to me. I have never been knowingly guilty of anything even remotely disloyal to my country. If there are in my life any associations which unknown to me are aligning me with anything that savors of such disloyalty, I want to have that fact made known to me by the FBI, Senator McCarthy, or anybody; and I feel very secure in the knowledge that if I did in ignorance become associated with any questionable group, I would come under FBI surveillance, for I can think of no safer method of protection for a truly loyal American who forms questionable associations without realizing their nature. In these dangerous days, I have no patience with the American citizen who refuses to give a straightforward answer under any and all circumstances to questions pertaining to associations which might involve loyalty to his country.

True, my home is my castle and I should be secure and unquestioned in its occupancy at my will; however, if a nest of vipers has gained entrance to some part of my premises, it might well be necessary that I temporarily give up the privilege of occupying the place in its entirety in order to be assured that the vipers have been cleaned out.

3. Delegates to the United Nations Security Council: If a delegate for either Soviet China or North Korea should be seated in the Security Council as a result of Russian pressure, our Nation would stand before the world a self-confessed weakling, too soft to hold our own against the ruthless bully even in the very hours when Americans are losing their lives in Korea because of the tactics of that bully. We, too, have the power to veto in the Security Council; and if the question of seating such a delegate comes before the Council, we should use the veto. Any other course would be an abject surrender to Russia pressure tactics.

I do not know where else to register this opinion and have it even read. This is one opinion that I should like very much to have placed before whoever is the right person.

4. On interference by the United States of America in the affairs of other nations: If I give money to a man who needs warm clothes and stout boots to enable him to earn his living more comfortably, it seems to me that it is my business if he spends that money for patent medicines and magic plasters; and that it becomes increasingly my business if he turns to me for more money because medicines and plasters prove inadequate for his needs.

My Government operates on my money, both at home and abroad; therefore, when funds from my country are made available to any other country, I am entitled to a voice in how that other country spends the money taken from me and given or loaned them. To mention just one example—if the English people insist on having a socialist state, let them pay for it; stop making me contribute to a form of government I abhor.

Russian Imports

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RUSSELL V. MACK
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 25, 1950

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Record and include extraneous material, I publish herewith an editorial against imports of Russian canned crab from the Aberdeen Daily World, of Aberdeen, Wash., and a resolution against further importation of Russian canned crab that was adopted by the State convention of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of Washington State.

The editorial from the Aberdeen World follows:

Russian Crab

The action of New York and Boston longshoremen in refusing to unload Russian-packed canned crabs wins approval. The crabs came to this country from Great Britain, which got them in trade from Russia for British products and then shipped them to the United States to get American dollars. At least, that has been the way with a considerable amount of our trade with Britain. We are quite ready to take British goods, but not Russian goods coming through British agents.

In fact, why do we trade with Russia at all? Congressman Mack, who has turned the spotlight on the imports of Russian crab, reports that during the first 5 months of this year we bought Russian goods to the amount of $17,049,488 and sold Russia only $514,050 worth of American goods. That is a balance of trade of 34 to 1 in Russia's favor. Why, in all conscience, should we coddle Russia to any such tune, or to any tune at all? Why, in fact, should we trade with Russia? Why should we help her in any way? Why, also, should we send goods or dollars to any European country under the Marshall aid plan, that will find their way to Russia? Why not tell these countries that are getting our help that the help will be canceled if they send our supplies to Russia?

We sent scrap iron and oil to Japan during the years Japan was preparing for war on us, and got back the scrap and junk in shells on our troops, while our oil supplied the fuel for Jap planes. Voices were raised against that trade, our own among them, and we well remember the threats of reprisals in the cancellation of advertising contracts and other ways, if we continued our objection to the traffic.

Russia is our potential enemy, the only one we have in the world in fact, and it occupies now the same position that Japan occupied in the days before Pearl Harbor. We should not trade with it either directly or in a roundabout way. "Why," asks Frank Kerins, shop steward of the New York longshoremen, "should we help Russia make money in this country?" Can there be any answer but one to that pertinent question?

AGAINST RUSSIAN IMPORTS

The resolution by the State convention of the Veterans of Foreign Wars for the State of Washington reads:

Resolution

Whereas the markets of the United States are being flooded by the importation of Russian crab meat, the importation into the United States from Siberia in the single month of February 1950 having reached the alarming proportions of 59,000 cases, and the Russians are now believed to be packing about 500,000 cases of crab meat annually, most of which pack may be dumped into the markets of the United States; and

Whereas the prosperity of the people in the coastal areas of Washington, Oregon, California, and Alaska depends to a large extent on the fishing industry in those areas; and

Whereas United States citizens in said areas have over a period of years developed a thriving fishing industry involving an investment of millions of dollars in boats, gear, dock, and wharf facilities, and furnishing employment to thousands; and

Whereas the importation of Russian crab meat and other fish products from foreign nations threatens to ruin the fishing industry of the entire Pacific coast: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Department of Washington, Veterans of Foreign Wars, at the Thirtieth Annual Encampment, in Bellingham, as follows:

1. That we vigorously protest the importation of Russian crab meat and other fish products from foreign nations into the United States unless the citizens engaged in the fishing industry are adequately protected from the ruinous effects of such importations by the imposition of adequate tariffs; and

2. That the Congress and President of the United States be strongly urged to provide adequate protection to citizens of the United States engaged in the fishing industry from ruinous foreign competition, either by prohibiting such importations entirely or by the imposition of adequate tariffs.

Household Hints for Hoarders

OF
HON. JOHN E. LYLE, JR.
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 28, 1950

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, one of the many useful and delightful citizens to come out of the South is the able writer David L. Cohn. His Household Hints for Hoarders should have as wide distribution as possible and I am therefore inserting it in the Congressional Record:

Household Hints for Hoarders

(By David L. Cohn)

(Hoarders are on the run for goods. Panic buying, in full stride despite warnings, is pushing United States toward rationing. Sugar, soaps, nylons, are being snatched from store shelves. Hoarding is creating artificial shortages, forcing prices up.—United States News and World Report, July 28, 1950.)

Get in there and shove, Mama.
Push the others out of the way, Sis.
Strip the shelves to the bare boards
Where lie the tiny droppings of midnight mice.
Buy anything and everything.
Clean out the store.
Then run to the wrapping counter
Pursued by the barehanded
As barnyard hens pursue the lucky one that has a choice bit of offal in its mouth.
This still being a free country
Every citizen has certain inalienable rights.
Among them the right—especially dear when the Nation's life is at stake—
To be a hog; or, if that sounds offensive, a buzzard.
Buy tea, coffee, spices, canned goods—anything.
Store it, hide it, bury it.

You'll agree with me that there's no sweeter fat than sticks to your own bones.
Ignore the President. Give him the razz-matazz.
You're no Godless Communist trying to destroy this country; a blind but destructive termite.
On the contrary, you're a church-going, tax-paying, God-fearing patriot, with a passionate interest in yourself; your illimitable, eternal, inexhaustibly fascinating, infinitely precious self.
They do you wrong who, noting your behavior, vainly wish for retrospective contraception.
So think now, as men die for you,
Of your Gut.
Of your dear, precious, well-beloved Gut,
Of the whole two hundred twenty-eight feet of it
Coiled in your abdomen.
In time of peril men instinctively think of what is most precious to them:
Soldiers die for an inch of ground.
But don't revere them for it. That's easy.
For, as simple arithmetic reveals,
You must stand guard over two thousand seven hundred thirty-six inches of Gut.
Well-larded, coiled, greedy peristaltic Gut.
The ancients believed that the soul resided in the bladder.
But we know better, don't we?
It lies in the Gut.
In the well-larded, coiled, greedy, peristaltic
Gut.
Be sure to store plenty of sugar.
If your neighbor can't get any, that's his fault.
For, as the Good Book says,
Where there's no vision the people perish.
(--And soap. You remember the song?
"Soap and water will surely wash you clean.")
Sugar's good in time of war.
Its sweetness cuts the gall-bitter taste of defeat which, to the palate, is as the stinkingness to the nose of the pusrunning wounds of soldiers.
Beforehanded with sugar, you can have your cake and eat it, too,
One layer blood-red in memory of the war dead,
In tender token of your patriotism,
And example to your children.
Grab all the nylons you can.
Grab 'em, lady, before they become para-chutes.
Lucifer, you know, thrown from Heaven's battlements,
Fell from dawn until dewy eve.
Well, by God, there's nothing he did that a
GI—your own son perhaps—can't do.
In short--this is my final advice—
Buy everything that isn't nailed down.
Go the whole Hog, as we say.
And if the worst comes to the worst,
If the Bomb gets you,
You will die with larder overflowing,
History recording that you were caught nap-
ping,
But not—praise the Lord—caught short.

The Forgotten Man

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES C. DAVIS
OF GEORGIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 21, 1950

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, in 1940 the late Harry Barfield, of Atlanta, Ga., printed a pamphlet regarding the origin of the Civilian Conservation Corps, entitled "The Forgotten Man."

Under leave to extend my remarks, I insert this article herewith:

THE FORGOTTEN MAN—THE REAL STORY OF THE CCC

(By Harry Barfield)

[From the Atlanta Journal of Janu·· 29, 1940]

"TRENDS OF THE TIMES

"The year 1933 opened with a great American army on the retreat. The army consisted of a multitude of young men—and some women—on the highways thumbing rides from here to there. Life had no place for them. There were no jobs. If they had parents, they were a burden to them. The army struggled forth living skimpily on the country as it moved.

"For these youths the Civilian Conservation Corps, the CCC, was formed. The army vanished from the roads. A monument will some day be raised to the inspirer, if he can be identified, of that plan.

"Since 1933, 2,600,000 youths have been taken from the highways, housed comfortably in camps, and put to work improving the Nation's production plants. They have built conservation dams, planted forests, done the thousand and one things needful to conserve the forests and save the soil.

"With the work went study. Education and industry, a great partnership, moved in step. The CCC saved men and it saved the resources by which men live.

"In seven years $2,000,000,000 have been spent in this work. The saving of 2,000,000 young men and unnumbered acres of timber and soil has cost the price of 30 first-rate battleships. Enough work remains to keep 1,500 CCC camps busy for another 50 years, says the director of the CCC.

"The life of the CCC expires, unless Congress meanwhile extends it, on June 30, 1943. Can private industry by that time catch the secret of making private work for all who want to work? If not, it is CCC extension or youth again out on the roads.

"WALTER LOCKE."

THE FORGOTTEN MAN

He was dubbed the forgotten man number one, by one of the local news broadcasters. You know, one of those fellows who seek the human interest side of events as they are recorded in the daily paper and afterwards flower it up with pathos or humor as the story warrants. Even before I heard Bill Key's broadcast on the afternoon of July 28, 1933, over radio station WGST in Atlanta, I knew the full story up to that date, of the conception of the plan that gave to America the CCC and the heartbreaks and struggle for recognition that came to its creator. I don't know why he ever came to me and chose me to be a confidant for his troubles; perhaps it was because I am in the printing business and he wanted to have his idea copyrighted and he couldn't do so until the manuscript was printed. I glanced over the typewritten pages and informed him it would cost quite a sum of money to print even the few copies he wanted and that my price was cash, in advance. I couldn't afford to have my money tied up in a lot of type which I could never use again except to melt it up for the metal. Too many printers were going under doing that and I didn't want to be one of them. Anyway, he left the article with me, and having a fairly good idea what it was all about, I chose a time when I had plenty of leisure to read it and get a thorough conception of what he had worked out. Until I read that article, I had always looked upon the man as a sort of crackpot with a lot of wild ideas. He would take some problems that confronted mankind and attempt to solve them in his own way. The fact that engineers with scientific data available had failed for years to find a solution, probably never crossed his mind or if it did he ignored this fact. The net result was that he spent a lot of time creating things that never worked, or if they did, they died for lack of financial support.

I remember once it was a gadget that was going to help pilots overcome the earlier tendency to pull into a spin while flying blind. He had a large ball with mercury inside and a lot of small lights on top. When he sat it on my desk, it worked perfectly, a little tilt in any direction would cause one bulb to light, further tilting would cause others to light, you could tell at a glance at what degree the instrument was tilted. But he didn't know that if you put the gadget in a plane centrifugal force would keep the mercury on the bottom of the ball and the lights wouldn't work. I tell you this so that you may get an idea of just what kind of fellow this Joe Wilson is.

Secretly, I laughed when I heard he was attempting to help solve the unemployed problem, and when he came into my shop that day with his first draft of his solution, which was in the form of a letter he intended to mail to Governor Roosevelt, I was somewhat annoyed with him. But, having nothing better to do, I read the letter. Any intelligent man who would read it would have readily admitted it contained merit. I am a confirmed believer in the law of averages—a man who tries often enough is bound to make a strike eventually, and it looked like this Joe Wilson had finally hit the jack pot.

There naturally arose several questions that my mind groped for the answers. He had been in to see me every day for several months before he brought in the letter. He was an ardent follower of the famous and widely read columnist, the late Arthur Brisbane. To him can be attributed the inspiration that started Joe Wilson seeking the solution of our unemployment problem. He, like most columnists, believed our unemployment problem would be solved when the master minds really began to work on a solution. He constantly urged his readers to think, assuring them that rich rewards awaited those who were not afraid to think.

Joe Wilson lapped up these editorials like a cat does milk. Ten minutes after the paper hit the street, he could almost quote verbatim Mr. Brisbane's entire column. One day he came in flushed with excitement and announced that he had it. Then followed a period of almost a week before I saw him again. That was the day he came in with the letter. The next day he was back again and I plied him with the questions whose answers I had been unable to find.

I had no doubt but that his idea would prove helpful in a part solution of our problem and events proved my reasoning correct. "But how," I asked him, "do you contemplate collecting on this idea?" In reply he asked me a question.

"Harry, do you remember reading an editorial the other day that stated—'To the genius, who will devise some plan that will aid in putting any large number of these (speaking about the then acknowledged 13,000,000 unemployed) people to work, America will ever be grateful. He will be showered with all the luxuries of life as long as he lives and his memory will be perpetuated even beyond the grave.'" I remembered reading the piece and was sure he was quoting it exactly as it was written. But, I reminded him that that was only the expressed idea of some editorial writer. Congress or no authorized Government agency was offering any such reward.

"Look, Harry," he said, "don't you believe that any man who comes along and creates something that will put millions to work would be entitled to see that prophecy fulfilled?"

"Yes," I agreed, "he certainly would. But how do you figure you will collect even if they use your idea and it proves successful?"

"Your approval," he said, "of the thoughts expressed in that editorial indirectly makes you a party to that contract and the millions that read it and concur in the statements it contains are also parties. As you know, I am virtually one of those 13,000,000 unemployed and not being able to obtain work at my trade, I am taking what part-time work I can get, which is about 1 day a week. If there was any employment agency that could obtain regular employment for me for a period of a few months, I would gladly pay them $10 for their services. There are millions like me and I have an inherent belief in the fairness of the American people. It wouldn't be necessary for them to donate any such sum as $10 to see that prophecy fulfilled. This plan is going to put millions to work if I can get it into the proper hands and maneuver it just right. As for the monument, I don't want any; all I would expect for my efforts is to know that I have provided a measure of security for myself and family.

"There is still another angle to this thing. There is hardly a business in America that isn't going to reap some benefit from this. Take Ford, for instance, if he had a man in his organization, a sales manager or someone that could promote any idea that would sell thousands of cars and trucks for him, don't you think he would be handsomely rewarded?"

I agreed he would be. You would have, too. This took place in the early part of 1932 and in order that you may get a full, comprehensive picture of the hopeless mess we were in it may be necessary for you to read some of the pathetic appeals that were carried by the daily papers of that time. However, I remind you that unemployment then exceeded today's figure and there were no PWA, doles, relief, or surplus food distributing agencies. If the same condition existed today with radicalism as it now is, revolution could not be avoided.

There is no way for me in so short an article to give you a complete picture of the immeasurable and valued service this man rendered the Nation. The documents upon which this story is based were left with me one by one. They are but a minor part of the whole. I shall quote from them piece by piece in verification of the story as I know it actually happened.

I first became acquainted with the man at a lodge meeting. Some months afterward he came to me with one of his gadgets and wanted me to finance it. It was true that I had some capital invested in different enterprises on which the returns were questionable, and one more or less wouldn't have made a great deal of difference to me. As I only had little to speculate with on any enterprise, my loss could not have been great. I had no doubt but that this particular one would do all he claimed for it. It was by nature a protective device against bank holdups. When installed the deliberate tripping of a foot bar would lock specially constructed revolving doors so that ingress or egress was impossible. I considered it from the public's point of view. If the bank where I made my deposit installed this device I would withdraw my account. I would take no chance on being locked in the confines of a bank with a mob of gangsters with machine guns and I didn't think the general public would either. Therefore, I turned him down. He came again and again with some gadget or other and each time I turned him down because I couldn't see the practicability of the device. So, I wasn't surprised even though I was amused when he set out to solve the unemployment situation.

It was in the early part of 1932 when he first told me he was working on the idea. It was the latter part of May or the first of June when he came in with the first draft of the plan. Believing he had something of merit, I encouraged him by telling him so.

Encouragement to a man of that type is like food to a hungry dog and once you give it you will have him hounding your footsteps for more.

This letter he was sending to Governor Roosevelt was a copy of one he was sending to H. L. Mencken, who was the editor of the American Mercury. He mailed them both the same day and received an invitation from Mr. Mencken, who must have recognized the merit of his plan, to put it in the form of an article. He was elated with this invitation but worried about what Governor Roosevelt's attitude would be. I advised patience as Governor Roosevelt was at that time a very busy man. He was ardently seeking and afterward obtained the Democratic nomination. Upon Governor Roosevelt's return to Albany, he answered Joe Wilson's letter, seeking further information and inquiring how Mr. Mencken regarded the plan.

To say that Wilson was pleased with the way things were going would be putting it mildly. He showed his letter and Roosevelt's reply to everyone who would take the time to read it. Among these was the editorial editor of the Atlanta Journal, who asked Wilson's permission to print the letter on the editorial page. And on July 21, 1932, there appeared the first published piece on which our present CCC plan is predicated. Captioned, "Open Army Enlistments To Provide Employment," the publication verified the editor's belief of merit because on Sunday, July 24, 1932, there appeared a news item stating that the plan received wide praise and the publication of the names of some of those wrote in about it. Any reasonable man would acknowledge that here was a solution for part of our troubles. But, unlike the columnist's prediction of the rich rewards that were to come to the man who created this solution, his troubles began to multiply. Wilson wrote the article for Mencken and as the full plan was contained therein, he fulfilled his promise to Roosevelt and mailed him a copy. He received a rejection slip from Mr. Mencken. But, from Governor Roosevelt, he received a letter of thanks and deepest appreciation and most important of all the assurance the plan would be given every consideration. This assurance coming from the Democratic nominee who was almost assured of election was the biggest item of all. It meant the chance for the plan's adoption and if successful the plaudits of a Nation to its creator. And as Wilson believed, the reward of financial security. America had never welshed on a debt yet and he didn't believe they would this time.

Roosevelt was elected. He drafted his aides and set about putting his New Deal for the forgotten man into a reality. Months of anxiety followed for Wilson. He wondered why, if the President intended to use the plan, he wasn't called into consultation. It being his brain child, he knew or should know more about it and its ramifications than anyone else. He had spent months figuring the answers to every problem that could arise, and the midnight oil he had burned was fruitful in producing solutions. There was no question about it, he knew the answers.

When it became evident he was to be the real forgotten man, he did what any normal man, who had been robbed of credit due him, would do. He wrote letters to the President. His first letters were in an humble tone, but as these availed him nothing they became bitter with the grievance his heart carried. These sacrifices which he made at his family's expense became symbols of injustice which he now set about to correct. I think I should relate one or two of these that a better understanding of this bitterness may be had. The money that Wilson spent for stamps and telegrams to communicate this plan to those who might use it actually took bread from the man's table. Then there came the day when an offer of publication came to him. The offer carried with it an assured fee of several hundred dollars. But it came at a time when the Senate investigating committee was debating the plan's fate. When a hostile section of the press was referring to the plan as reactionary, unorthodox, impractical, and visionary. At the time Miss Frances Perkins was winning fame and being crowned as the plan's originator by her witty answers to that hard-boiled committee (see the Literary Digest of April 15, 1933).

I advised him to accept this offer, but he pointed out to me to do so might place the plan in jeopardy as should its humble origin become generally known it would really give the unfavorable element, something to ridicule.

"Although I desperately need that money," he said, "what is a few hundred dollars compared to that promise of, 'All the luxuries of life as long as he lives'? No, Harry; I am playing for higher stakes. That plan is going to be a success and the American people are not going to let me down."

When Wilson became certain that he was to be ignored, he sought outside aid. He carried his story to the local papers with proof enough to convince any man. But Roosevelt was at the height of his popularity. They wouldn't touch it. Wilson went to Florida in an effort to find work and while there induced the Democratic paper of Governor Cox, the Miami Daily News, to print a small piece about it on July 3, 1933.

He returned to Atlanta, where his next break came when Bill Key aired the story in his newcast. The fact became known to Georgia's Governor, Eugene Talmadge, who owned and edited his own paper, the Statesman. His paper on August 5, 1933, tells of Wilson's predicament and, under the caption "Another war debt unpaid," had this to say:

"Mr. J. D. Wilson, Atlanta truck driver extraordinary, is a case in point.

"This gentleman is, beyond question, the originator of the national reforestation plan. He has a letter from the President, written when he was Governor of New York, acknowledging receipt of the details of the plan. Mr. Wilson also has letters from the editor of the American Mercury, leading publishers in several States, and official correspondence which proves unquestionably his right to the claim as originator of one of the most important phases of the New Deal. And that is all. He, too, has become a forgotten man. As one of our local radio broadcasters remarked recently, 'Something ought to be done about it.'"

Walter Winchell, whose championing of the underdog has won him more friends and readers than his newsy scoops, on August 17 wrote of the paradoxical position occupied by Wilson; that of putting a legion of men to work through his idea while remaining unemployed himself. He agreed that something ought to be done about it. Wilson obtained another part-time job of driving a truck to New York. When he reached Washington the next day after Winchell's publication, he called at the office of the Washington Herald with his correspondence with Roosevelt regarding the plan. The morning paper carried the story and a picture of Wilson, stating he was there to see the President. Even with this advance notice and the undeniable proof of Wilson's claim, he was refused an audience with the man from whose shoulders he had lifted at least two major problems. Further explanation on this later.

When Wilson reached New York he called at the office of Walter Winchell to thank him for his kindness and to inform him of his unsuccessful call at the White House. There he met Miss Ruth Cambridge, who promised to see if Winchell wouldn't air the story. Some weeks later he did. But with all these appeals Wilson still remained the forgotten man. As the story became more locally known friends of Wilson began to write their Representatives in Washington in an effort to have justice done. Some communicated directly with the Democratic National Committee. And typical of many is the reply I now quote. It is addressed to a well-known Atlanta doctor and is signed by the chairman, James A. Farley, in the now famous green ink. It reads:

"Thank you for your letter of August 31 in which you indicate your interest in Mr. J. D. Wilson.

"I want you to know that Mr. Wilson's case is receiving consideration, and your letter has been placed in his file for reference in connection therewith.

"Thank you for writing."

After many attempts, Wilson finally got a letter of credit due from the White House. But its stinted generosity (I shall have more to say of this later and cite a comparison) robbed it of value. Had Wilson received this when he first sought it, it would have lifted him from obscurity and enabled him by his own merit to earn that promised reward. But it came a year too late. From it I quote:

"MY DEAR MR. WILSON: I have shown your latest letter to the President. He asks me to tell you again as he wrote you on September 12, 1932, that he was glad to have the benefit of your views. He asks me to tell you further that you were undoubtedly one of those who originally conceived the idea of putting the unemployed to work on public improvements, and especially the idea of using people on conservation work with a base pay of a dollar a day. However, it is fair to say that a good many other people were arriving at the same thought in other parts of the country at about the same time. There would seem to be plenty of credit due to all of those who were thinking along the same line at that time, and, of course, as one of those you also deserve credit.

"Very sincerely yours,

"M. A. LEHAND,
"Private Secretary."

Even with this letter Wilson remained unemployed although the Government was passing out jobs by the millions and he applied to every agency. Furthermore, his friends in an effort to see justice done constantly besieged Congressmen, Senators, and responsible agents in an effort to have some measure of a reward, if only a job, given to him.

I had watched this fight for justice proceed through almost 3 years of the administration's regime. I saw the stubborn determination of this man turn to understandable bitterness. Some of this must have caught the imagination of Tarleton Collier, the South's foremost columnist, who has won a wide reputation for his accuracy and the tenacity of adhering to and reporting provable facts only. Mr. Collier on March 28, 1936, wrote as follows:

"Now that Washington has given assurance that the CCC will be maintained, thus responding to an outcry that arose at suggestions that drastic reduction in the service was contemplated and thus establishing a public estimate of its high value, many Atlantans recall the case of J. D. Wilson (long unemployed) who back in 1932 proposed the identical plan as a solution of the unemployment problem.

"Details of the plan which Mr. Wilson submitted to Franklin D. Roosevelt after the latter's nomination appeared later in the projects undertaken when the New Deal set about to remedy conditions of unemployment and need by public works—enlistment of men in an organization which afterward became the Civilian Conservation Corps, reforestation, drainage, and mosquito control projects, irrigation, dredging, canal cutting, and practically all the others now in operation.

"The validity of Mr. Wilson's suggestion was hailed and his right to authorship was defended in many a column of commentators and editorial writers over the country, but the reward to which he feels he was entitled is still to come. Ironically, he remains himself unemployed, and he is filled with a grievance that is deep-seated."

"Filled with a grievance that is deep-seated!" Well, it must have exploded when he received this letter from his Congressman, under the date of April 13, 1936. From it I quote:

" 'As much as I regret to do so, I must tell you that I am at a loss as to what further I might do in your case. As you know, I have had this matter up with the national committee on various occasions, and also with the Director of the Conservation Corps, the Forest Service, and other agencies of the Government.

" 'I have been greatly disappointed that my efforts in your behalf have not been successful, but frankly I do not know what else could be done.

" 'If you have anything to suggest, I would be delighted to follow your suggestion because I assure you that I am anxious to do anything possible for you.

" 'With best wishes, I am,

" 'Sincerely yours,

" 'ROBERT RAMSPECK'."

When such efforts of a Congressman fail to correct a piece of injustice, it looks hopeless for a humble citizen to continue the fight. And I personally know that Bob Ramspeck did everything in his power to help. But Joe Wilson was not beaten. He tried to force the issue in court but the administration with wise dexterity side-stepped an issue that would have landed Mr. Wilson in prison for criminal libel if he, like myself here, didn't possess documentary proof of his every statement. When he failed to make a court issue of it, I thought he would give up the fight, but early in October he came to me and said:

"Harry, people tell me that before I can get anywhere with this I have to make front-page headlines." His eyes were filled with that old-time enthusiasm that had been missing for months, and when I asked him how he was going to accomplish this miraculous feat, all he said was: "Wait and see. You will read all about it."

For some reason it worried me. Then, on the morning of October 7, 1936, I read where he had gone to the White House and slashed his wrists in a fit of despondency. But I knew better. He had made front-page headlines. But, as I feared, it availed him nothing but a lot of additional trouble. Through friends his release from St. Elizabeths Hospital, where he was held for observation (I question this reason for his detention), was effected. Upon his return to Atlanta, I secured him a job and for more than 2 years he made a valued employee. For 14 months he studied law at night and on his second trial successfully passed the Georgia bar examination. Any man who can accomplish this isn't even remotely crazy. It was my knowledge of his case and this feat that makes me question the reason for his detention.

That's the story with the exceptions of the explanations I promised. For these it is necessary that I quote most of his letter that contained his original draft of his plan. The letter that was mailed to Roosevelt, and afterward printed in the Atlanta Journal. This letter alone will prove beyond all doubt that the President's letter of credit due was steeped in stinted generosity and that he did solve two major problems for which Roosevelt received unwarranted praise.

The letter:

[From the Atlanta Journal of July 21, 1932]

"OPEN ARMY ENLISTMENTS TO PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT

"EDITOR THE JOURNAL:

"Many editorials have been written on the question, 'How to End the Depression.' However, there remains one probable remedy that, to the writer's knowledge, has not been touched upon editorially.

"Why not ask the Government to throw open the doors of the enlistment bureaus and allow every man, of reasonably sound health, who wishes to enlist, the opportunity? Give him the rudiments of a military training (the ex-service man, who already has this training, could be placed at once), then place these men at work on such projects as building levees, draining the Everglades of Florida, the Okefenokee swamps of Georgia, the marshlands of Louisiana and Mississippi, cutting the proposed canal across northern Florida to connect the Atlantic Ocean with the Gulf of Mexico, building dams to irrigate the fertile, but arid, lands of the Southwest, dredging rivers and harbors that now menace navigation.

"These are but a few of the many great projects that will eventually be undertaken anyway. They are too large for private development; therefore, it would not be a question of the Government entering competitive businesses with established concerns. These projects, when completed, would make this country a better place in which to live by destroying billions of mosquitoes and other vermin, removing the fear of floods that now haunts those who have suffered from this menace in the past, and bring into use millions of acres of land that now lie idle. The Government could retain the possession of this reclaimed land and sell it to individuals for farming purposes, thereby defraying in part some of the expense incurred. The canal would be an investment that in the future would return many times its cost, as the writer is led to believe it would not be necessary to build locks similar to those in use in the Panama Canal.

"Not only would this plan give work to many, many thousands, relieving in part the distress of today, but it would lessen materially the expense of the future by placing many thousands of partially trained men upon which the Government could rely in case of future trouble. (Which is as inevitable as the coming snows of winter.)

"Under this plan the initial period of enlistment would be 2 years, with the first 4 months spent in military training. Thereafter 2 hours each day of training and 6 hours of labor on the projects undertaken. You must realize that such a plan would purge the streets of the class that needs employment most and that there is no industry that would not benefit by the move. Think what it would mean to all transportation companies, cement manufacturers, building materials, supply houses, truck manufacturers, clothing manufacturers, food-supplying agencies, and on down the line.

"Such a plan would remove all doubt whether the veterans encamped at Washington are in earnest in their demand for work or whether they are merely looking for a meal ticket for the remainder of their lives. When such a plan is offered and they refuse work you may be sure that public sentiment now in their favor will be withdrawn.

"I could continue on and on, but I realize your time does not permit, and in closing I wish to thank you for your kind indulgence, and only hope I have given you the germ of an idea for a great editorial.

"Respectfully yours,

"J. D. WILSON.

WILSON SOLVED TROUBLESOME BEF PROBLEM FOR ROOSEVELT

When Roosevelt was faced with this same problem, what did he do? He followed that procedure, he offered the members of the Bonus Expeditionary Forces an opportunity to enlist in the CCC and for this stroke of genius won the admiration of a nation, that rightfully belonged to Wilson. The Literary Digest of June 3, 1933, had this to say, under the caption, "F. D. R.'s Victory Over the BEF."

"We are whipped, and we have to hand it to that smart fellow at the White House.

"So said a leader of the 'die-hard' bonus marchers as he quit Washington with 350 others, leaving behind 2,600 veterans who had accepted the President's offer of enrollment in the reforestation army.

"For the 'die-hards' the President provided transportation to their homes.

"Thus Mr. Roosevelt checks up another victory, and again wins wide praise. It is interesting to sketch the history of the second BEF and to note how the President, in the midst of tremendous problems, cleared up this difficult situation.

"When several hundreds of the veterans reached Washington for a bonus-forcing convention provision was promptly made for feeding and lodging them at Fort Hunt, Va., a move that has been contrasted to the efforts of last year, when after some time the BEF was driven out by force. For a time one group of veterans, known as the 'right wingers,' refused to join the Fort Hunt contingent, because that group suspected communistic connections. There was, however, a recession from that some time after the 'right wingers' had spent several nights in the rain.

"As soon as the ex-soldiers were lodged at the camp President Roosevelt played another card from the New Deal. He issued an order offering the men a dollar a day, food, clothing, and shelter at the Civilian Conservation Corps, working in State and national forests. This was hailed as a wise move to test the sincerity of the unemployed veterans. Thus, it seems to the Detroit Free Press, appears 'something of the President's talent for dealing with refractory human beings.'

"And how was the offer received? 'A dollar a day, not for mine' seems to sum up the initial reaction at Fort Hunt. An Associated Press dispatch to the Baltimore Sun tells us more of the same:

"Satirical remarks were heard repeatedly among the crowd.

"Albert G. Sellers, a field organizer of the Fort Hunt fraction, expressed a hope that the majority of the men will have spirit enough to demand a living wage.

"Joseph Bose, when asked as to his attitude toward the President's offer of a job in the forests, replied:

"'Not for me. It is literally selling yourself into slavery.'

"Bose formerly did clerical work and said he had been out of work for some time.

"E. W. Leach, of Cleveland, expressed the belief that members of the bonus army would be 'fools to sign up (in the forest corps) for a dollar a day.'"

"But as that was the first reaction, it wasn't long before many of the veterans began to see the wisdom of seizing the President's offer. They began to enroll by hundreds. In the final accounting 2,600 were in the corps, leaving only 350 die-hards.

"The President," says the Washington Evening Star, "has followed a policy in dealing with the bonus seekers that by its sincerity and fairness has left them completely disarmed."

"At no time have threats or hints of compulsion been brought to bear in influencing their action. They have been honored by a visit from the First Lady and their leaders cordially received at the White House by the President.

"The President and his advisers knew that such a policy was uncertain. They were following a course that had not been followed before. There may have been doubts, on their part, whether the plan would work or whether the belligerent attitude of some of the professional agitators would be transmitted to the men in the ranks, with resulting trouble and disorder.

"The bonus marchers have removed these fears by their own response to fair and considerate treatment. They have not only vindicated the President's good judgment, but themselves as well."

Do you recall the fate of those veterans? Many were sent to Matecumbie Key, where a hurricane killed most of them.

Hoover was faced with this same problem and the veterans were driven from Anacostia flats by gas. It must have afforded Roosevelt smug satisfaction to watch his adversary in a coming election make such a grave error knowing should he be faced with that problem an unknown had already thought up and given to him the solution.

I now ask you, What salient part of this magnificent program did Wilson fail to cover? I call your attention to that sentence of the letter of credit due from the White House that reads:

"He asks me to tell you further that you were undoubtedly one of those who originally conceived the idea of putting the unemployed to work on public improvements, and especially the idea of using people on conservation work with a base pay of a dollar a day."

This shows that not only was Wilson's first draft used but this article was thoroughly digested for further ideas because nowhere in his original letter was the dollar a day base pay mentioned. But his article did contain this requisite to the plan as well as other things that show conclusively it was his idea and his alone. I am one of the small-business men upon whom the New Deal has taken compassion. In modern conception of commerce, I may be considered only a speck on the apple since my modest printing establishment only employs 11 people. I have read of similar claims like Wilson's, but I have yet to see one substantiated by documentary proof. I will place on deposit $100 in any national bank for any person who can establish such a claim by newspaper clippings or other documentary evidence of publication that antedates Mr. Wilson's claims.

It is possible for two men to have a similar idea at about the same time, even though they are remotely removed from each other. But for them to communicate them to the same individual and receive an acknowledgment and request for additional information is something the law of averages admit can only happen once in a million years, so I know my century note is safe.

This is not an indictment of the Democratic Party or its leaders. I am a Democrat myself, by birth, inheritance, choice, and belief. Born in Georgia of Democratic parents, whose parents were old-line Democrats, I can never be anything else. This story is merely a statement of provable facts wherein justice miscarried.

Address by Louis Johnson, Secretary of Defense, Before American Legion Convention at Charleston, W. Va.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARLEY M. KILGORE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, August 28 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an address by Hon. Louis Johnson, Secretary of Defense, before the commanders banquet, the American Legion Convention, Department of West Virginia, in Charleston, W. Va., on Saturday, August 26, 1950.

There being objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY LOUIS JOHNSON, SECRETARY OF DEFENSE, BEFORE THE COMMANDERS BANQUET, THE AMERICAN LEGION CONVENTION, DEPARTMENT OF WEST VIRGINIA, CHARLESTON, W. VA., SATURDAY, AUGUST 26, 1950

It is always good to be in West Virginia. I am happy for the opportunity of being here in Charleston tonight, to break bread with my friends in the American Legion. I am glad to meet with my comrades who have served our country in two World Wars. Association with you both under arms and in time of peace or semipeace has always been inspiring. Continuously from the early days of 1919 when the American Legion was born and I had the honor of representing West Virginia as your national executive committeeman, I have enjoyed this association. Working with you and with our comrades from every part of America, and with other patriotic American citizens, all dedicated to the cause of world peace and the task of maintaining world peace by making our Nation stronger, has been and is one of the great satisfactions of my life. I am particularly glad, therefore, to be able to be with you tonight, at this critical moment in American history.

At the outset of my remarks, I want to pay tribute to our soldiers and marines, and especially the troops in the combat units. They have borne the brunt of the Nation's battles from Bunker Hill in Massachusetts to the Naktong River in Korea—usually with insufficient strength at the outset. Despite these initial disadvantages they have taken their losses and won their battles while they traded their lives for time. No more difficult combat task falls to the lot of a military man yet these courageous, gallant young men from American farms, mills, offices, and homes who are now fighting in Korea, ably assisted by the men of the Air Force and the Navy, have proved themselves worthy of their forefathers in arms.

I know of no better tribute to our fighting men than the words of General MacArthur, who, in a recent message to President Truman said:

"The skill and valor * * * displayed in successive holding actions by the ground forces * * *, brilliantly supported in complete coordination by air and naval elements, forced the enemy into continued deployments, costly frontal attacks and confused logistics, which so slowed his advance and blunted his drive that we have bought the precious time necessary to build a secure base.

"I do not believe that history records a comparable operation which excelled the speed and precision with which the Eighth Army, the Far East Air Force and the Seventh Fleet have been deployed to a distant land for immediate commitment to major operations * * *."

With your permission, I should like to devote much of my time this evening to a discussion of two related matters: First, some of the implications of the ebb and flow of the battle in Korea; and second, our need for universal training legislation.

At the request of the United Nations, armed forces of the United States are in Korea today in order to repel Communist aggression. By our actions, we are proving that the United States intends to adhere with more than mere lip service to the great goal of world peace. All of our efforts in Korea, and all of our efforts elsewhere in the Western Pacific—in common with the measures we are taking throughout the world—will continue to be addressed to establishing and maintaining peace.

The Communists of North Korea invaded the Republic of Korea in the early morning hours of June 25. Twenty-four hours after the invasion occurred, the Security Council of the United Nations, armed with a prompt and up-to-date report from its own Commission in Korea—a Commission which consisted of representatives of Australia, China, El Salvador, France, India, the Philippines, and Turkey—concluded that the Communists of North Korea were guilty of acts of aggression. Having ascertained the facts from its seven-nation Commission, the Security Council, by a unanimous vote of all members present and voting, called on all members of the United Nations to assist in the restoration of law and order in Korea. Together with the other nations which share our aspirations for a peaceful world, we responded to that call.

Subsequently, when it became apparent that the Communists of North Korea had no intention of ceasing their lawless aggression, the Security Council of the United Nations adopted two more resolutions. The first of these resolutions was a request for the use of armed force to repel the North Korean aggression, and the second of these resolutions authorized the United States to designate a military commander to head the forces of the United Nations in their encounter with the forces of aggression—a position to which President Truman promptly named Gen. Douglas MacArthur.

Bitter as it is to all Americans to have to be fighting again 5 years after VJ-day, it is nevertheless true that this entire episode may well prove to be a turning point in the long history of man's quest for peace. The prompt action of the United Nations, and the response to this action by free peoples all over the world, may prove to be the decisive event marking the transition from the rule of force in international relations to the rule of law.

The fighting in Korea has been hard and bloody. The brilliant delaying action of the forces under General MacArthur's leadership, however, has succeeded in preventing North Korea from making a fait accompli out of its adventure in chaos—and this fact, coupled with the fact that the forces of many nations are now pledged to fight side by side to repel aggression, spells out in terms that all men can understand the fact that the free world intends to remain free.

The world now knows that the lesson which the democracies failed to learn during the thirties—namely, that appeasement leads only to war—this lesson has been learned, and will not be forgotten, in the fifties. Whatever the military situation in Korea may be today, and whatever it may be in the hard days immediately ahead, the clearly defined intentions of the free world constitute the fact of transcendent importance.

For the free world has made it clear, through the United Nations, that acts of aggression, whether by outlaw bands or by maverick nations, will be met with force.

The event which I have just been describing is an event which transcends in importance any event of recent years. I refer, of course, to the coalescing of the forces of the free world, and the clear knowledge that now exists throughout the world that these forces—both the armed forces which are now in existence and the forces which we are capable of mobilizing—will be used to maintain world peace.

The decisions that have been made were vital to the maintenance of our national security. The national security, in broad terms, is the proper balance of the strength—political, economic, psychological, moral, and military—that the United States, our allies, and the other peace-loving nations must maintain in order to meet the two-pronged threat of world communism.

That threat is two-fold because Soviet Russia seeks to conquer the free world either by military aggression or by psychological, political, and economic pressure. This second route of conquest would combine subversion within the United States with constant threat from without, maintained over the years in the hope that the cost of idle maintenance of large military forces would eventually bankrupt our economy and our free institutions. Consequently the elements of our strength must be adjusted to meet and overcome the Soviet threat as the situation develops.

The national security must, by its very nature, be relative. Absolute security is no more possible of attainment for nations than it is for you and me as individuals. Relative security is governed by the nature and degree of the Soviet threat. It is attained through the willingness and determination of the public and the Congress to make the necessary adjustments, in accordance with our continuing estimate of Soviet capabilities, to our military strength and national economy.

The policy by which we strive to maintain relative security was outlined in a speech I made in New York last December—more than 6 months before the Communist invasion of Korea. At that time I said: "The watch word must be military security first; economy second. And if we are realistic, we must face the fact that our military requirements are not static, but flexible. They are bound to be affected by major shifts in the international situation and new developments in science and warfare * * *. This means," and I am still quoting from my December speech, "that our military organization must be adequate, efficient and readily adaptable to change; our planning must look to the future as well as the present. We must have an up-to-date fighting force in being, rapidly enlargeable in wartime, capable, in concert with our allies, of defeating any potential enemy. The maintenance of that kind of fighting force, backed up by a sound economy and high public morale, will give us relative security."

The United States is now embarked on a program of major increases in the size and effectiveness of our own Armed Forces. We are also embarked on a program designed to assist our allies to increase the size and effectiveness of their armed forces. President Truman has submitted to the Congress recommendations for increased appropriations for our Armed Forces in the amount of $11,500,000,000, together with an additional $4,000,000,000 to provide additional military equipment for our allies. In order to round out the picture, there remains only one vital action which we must now take—and that is the enactment of legislation providing for universal training for the youth of America.

Let me review with you, for a moment, some of the things which President Truman has said and done, in the five years since VJ Day, in his effort to secure the enactment of this vitally needed legislation.

In President Truman's first address to a joint session of Congress after VJ-day—on October 23, 1945—he stressed the need for universal training. On that occasion, President Truman said:

"In the present hour of triumph, we must not forget our anguish during the days of Bataan. We must not forget the anxiety of the days of Guadalcanal. In our desire to leave the tragedy of war behind us, we must not make the same mistake that we made after the First World War when we quickly sank back into helplessness * * *. In order to provide this general reserve (of trained manpower), I recommend to the Congress the adoption of a plan for universal military training."

Again in March 1948, in addressing a joint session, President Truman strongly urged that the Congress enact the necessary legislation. In his 1948 address, the President said:

"I recommend prompt enactment of universal training legislation * * *. I believe that we have learned the importance of maintaining military strength as a means of preventing war * * *. Aggressors in the past, relying on our apparent lack of military force, have unwisely precipitated war. Although they have been led to destruction by their misconception of our strength, we have paid a terrible price for our unpreparedness. Universal training is the only feasible means by which the civilian components of our Armed Forces can be built up to the strength required if we are to be prepared for emergencies."

In addition to his personal appearances before the Congress in 1945 and 1948, from which I have just quoted, President Truman has submitted written recommendations for universal training to each session of Congress.

My predecessor and friend, Secretary of Defense Forrestal, testified before the Senate Armed Services Committee in support of universal training legislation in March of 1948, and said:

"We require more manpower than we have today. The comfortable assurance of a push-button war is an illusion. The enormous complication of the machinery of total warfare of today rests upon manpower—not in the mass, but diffused through thousands of specialties * * *. Reserve forces in readiness are a necessary component of our military strength. In this component (which includes the National Guard and the Reserve Corps) we are now seriously deficient. The Reserve component in time of war will take its place alongside the Regular forces in our defensive and offensive effort."

Between the time of Secretary Forrestal's testimony, from which I have just quoted, and the time of the Communist invasion of Korea, we did build up the strength of our forces, both Regular and Reserve—a very substantial build-up, as the record will show. The combat potential of our regular forces increased materially between March of 1948 and June of 1950. In addition, the strength of the ready Reserve forces of the Army, Navy, and Air Force, including the National Guard, increased by almost 100 percent during this 2-year period. The total number of National Guard and Reserve personnel in a drill-pay status in all of the services—which stood at 435,000 on March 31, 1948—stood at 834,000 on June 30, 1950.

But this increase, even though it approaches a strength increase of 100 percent, is not enough. We need to expand our Reserve and National Guard forces to an even greater extent, and, in addition, we must recognize that much of the increase between 1948 and 1950 was made possible because of the patriotic response of the veterans of World War II.

Our force in being must be sufficient to meet the immediate threat that we face at any given time. But it will avail us nothing unless the materials—manpower as well as munitions—are ready for speedy mobilization to back up that force in being. In global war our manpower has been, and in the future would be, mobilized according to democratic principles. That means selective service, under which the individual's abilities are applied where they will best serve the Nation's needs. The only sound democratic base for such a democratic system of mobilization is universal training.

Furthermore, from the standpoint of the individual, the young man who will be called into military service in war has an inalienable right to training for service before the occasion is upon him. It is not sufficient that some Americans are ready for the threat of war. It is essential that all should be in such readiness.

Such readiness to assume the greatest obligation of citizenship would strengthen our mobilization base as no other form of citizen-militia can ever do. Furthermore, such readiness on the part of American citizenship—not merely a part of our citizenship, but the total thereof—together with strong forces in being, will encourage our allies as no other form of insurance against aggression can ever do. The strength of American industrial might is stupendous. But it can only make itself felt as a force for world peace if American manpower is ready to carry the arms that American industry produces.

Universal training is the certificate of readiness of the American citizen to answer any threat to world peace and to the family of free nations. It is a certificate that will never fall below par among our friends of the free nations.

When the Compton Commission made its unanimous recommendations to the President, after many months of careful study, it offered six essentials of an integrated national security program. Those six essentials are the same today as they were then and probably will continue to be valid throughout the predictable future. These were the essentials of an integrated program, in the opinion of the Commission:

1. A strong, united, healthy, educated, and informed population.

2. A coordinated intelligence service.

3. A program of scientific research and development.

4. Industrial mobilization and stock-piling.

5. Regular Armed Forces—a mobile striking force, relying heavily on air power, together with adequate strength for Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marines.

6. A program of universal training for all young men in our Nation.

Just as democracy is everybody's job, so it is that the Compton Commission's program is everybody's job. Every American wants to help his country become stronger, healthier, more united, educated, and informed. Every American wants to defend his country. But desire to defend one's country is not enough. The conditions of modern war, which have telescoped time and space, demand that every qualified American be trained and ready to fight when the need arises.

If President Truman's advice with respect to universal training had been followed in 1945, how different would be our situation today. Even if President Truman's renewed plea for universal training had been heeded in 1948, how much stronger would we be, in the Reserve and National Guard forces which constitute the backbone of our military effort in time of mobilization.

But all of that is past and gone; we cannot turn back the clock and accomplish, yesterday, the things which we should have done yesterday. But we can accomplish, today, the things that we failed to do yesterday—and, in my opinion, universal training stands at the head of the list in this respect.

Earlier this week, I testified before the Senate Armed Services Committee, in support of universal-training legislation. Your own national commander, George Craig, also testified most persuasively and effectively. General Omar Bradley, who occupies an almost unrivaled place in the esteem and affection of all Americans, testified to the same effect.

It is my hope that both the Senate and the House of Representatives will, in the near future, adopt universal-training legislation—in order that we may have on the books, subject to taking effect at such time as the President may feel that international circumstances so warrant, the universal-training legislation we have so long needed, and which President Truman, members of his Administration, and the American Legion, and other patriotic veterans' organizations, have so long advocated.

If we take this action now—together, with the other measures we are taking to increase the strength of the free world—I believe we will, with God's blessing, achieve the peace which all Americans so devoutly seek.

The Antarctic Continent

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. USHER L. BURDICK

OF NORTH DAKOTA

Monday, August 28, 1950

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present herewith a letter and very enlightening article of the Antarctic Continent by Miss Kendall, of Washington. It is now well established that Antarctica is not a string of islands, as was once considered, but a continent twice the size of the United States and although we have spent public money in exploring that area we have never made any claim to that territory. It seems Russia has her eye on this continent for as late as this year she has demanded representation in any conference which may be held to discuss the various claims to that territory.

This splendid article will advise the people of the United States about the magnitude of this continent, and through Congress as representatives of the people some action will be taken to have our rights recognized. The letter and article follow:

ARLINGTON VA., August 26, 1950.

HON. USHER BURDICK,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BURDICK: It was very good of you to give a former North Dakotan a little time the other day. Together with the fact that Antarctica is fascinating, there is the point that some of my tax money has gone into recent expeditions and some of my great grandfather's tax money probably went into Wilkes' tax-supported voyage.

For your interest I have set out below a brief chronological list of United States activities in Antarctica. You will note a great gap between 1840 and 1928, which is surprising, but we probably were busy growing as a Nation. There is another gap between 1948 and today that is astounding in the light of our wealth and technological advancement.

I have merely mentioned the activities of other countries, although they have kept at it through the years, with the United Kingdom and Norway seemingly in the lead. Their brave work cannot be minimized; after all, each expedition profits by the successes and failures of the ones who have gone before.

Our work has been wonderful, but why do we halt it? The apathy of our people and Government is amazing. At this particular point in history let us dust off the cobwebs and polish up a United States policy regarding Antarctica that will reflect our capabilities and our faith in a better world even here on this old planet—let us be at least constructive while we are here.

Sincerely yours,

MISS E. A. KENDALL.

The United States does not own one single square inch of Antarctica, the six-million-square-mile South Polar continent. Other nations do have claims.

It would seem that by neglecting our Antarctic rights the Congress is neglecting its constitutional duty to "provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States." Perhaps the question of United States claims in the Antarctic should enter into every debate in Congress covering economics, taxes, defense, unemployment, conservation of natural resources, stockpiling of rare materials, and like matters.

The Antarctic Continent is only a little smaller than South America and abounds in mountain chains and probably in minerals; outcroppings of iron, copper, coal, nickel, gold, and silver, at least, have been found to date. The location is of great importance in weather studies and cosmic ray investigations and, of course, the whole continent has many interests for scientists. Antarctica is valuable as a training ground for Arctic workers. Another point is that its northern peninsula reaches toward Cape Horn and it would seem that the protection of Cape Horn and the whole Western Hemisphere might include attention to this Palmer Peninsula, as it is only a little over an hour's ride by jet plane from South America. Not quite all the coastline of Antarctica has been photographed and not even nearly all has been adequately mapped and the greater part of the continent has not yet been seen by man. But we do know the scenery is grand.

Below I have outlined United States activities to date, but first I might mention a few reasons why the United States may well give attention without delay to her rights.

1. There are today no inhabitants and no industrial installations. No imperialism involved.

2. There are several nations claiming great sectors at least on paper and some have tiny permanent settlements; and some maps, atlases, geography books, histories, political essays and dictionaries show these claims as apparently authentic. (Usually, the claims of Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, France, Norway, Argentina, and Chili are shown, some overlapping.) The British alone have seven bases on Palmer Land. How penetration in the Western Hemisphere has continued I do not understand, inasmuch as we have the Monroe Doctrine. In 1908 Britain established the Falkland Islands. Dependencies actually including parts of South America, but the Letters Patent of 1917 modified this claim and now the British claim only islands and a great sector of Antarctica in the Western Hemisphere. Argentina has bases and claims dating from 1904 (see Antártida Argentina Islas Oceanicus Mar Argentino, revised by command of the Naval Operations of the Marine Ministry in June 1948). Chili has island bases also. The French have an expedition on the continent now. The 1949-52 joint Norwegian-Swedish-British expedition is busy with scientific work and exploration now. The United States has no expedition now.

There remains only one sector (sometimes called the American or Pacific) with no claimants and it may be gobbled up at any moment, as there is no reason why not, and several nations interested for years in whaling are now eyeing the continent proper. The Soviets, for example, have mentioned lately that any conferences on Antarctic claims must include them or they would not honor any decisions made; I believe their latest diplomatic note was delivered to our State Department on June 9, 1950.

3. The United States, while making no claims to territory, has excellent rights and, in some cases, prior and superior rights to other claimants, both historically and factually, and by the latter is meant our explorers have actually seen with their eyes great tracts and our expeditions have done some of the most valuable experimental and scientific work and our number of men and dollars has been greater than that of other nations, much of the money being taxes—in other words, our investment as a whole on the continent proper probably has been greater than that of any other country, and still we refrain from making our rightful claims. Possible internationalization has been proposed by the United States State Department (1948) but other nations did not approve the idea and the plan has fallen through, whatever its merits may have been.

I would not minimize the bravery and sacrifices of the exploring heroes of other lands, but neither would I minimize the glorious achievements of our own Antarctic explorers and scientists, and the present United States policy in regard to the Antarctic seems to do just that.

In 1820, Nathaniel B. Palmer, captain of a sealing ship out of Stonington, Conn., sighted the mainland of the Antarctic Continent, he being the first man of record to do so. Col. Lawrence Martin, former head of the Map Division of the Library of Congress, has studied Captain Palmer's log books extensively and his manuscript maps, now in the possession of the American Geographical Society in New York, and in October 1940, the Geographical Review carried a monograph by Colonel Martin on Captain Palmer. Captain Palmer sighted land near 60°10′ W., 63°45′ S. The Russian Admiral Bellingshausen was on an Antarctic expedition sponsored by the Czar and the two navigators met shortly thereafter in that vicinity. Baron Bellingshausen was perhaps the first to use the name Palmers Land—1821 or a little later—and the British and French map makers and writers used it a little later and since 1912 all United States Federal maps and charts use the term.

In 1830, Dr. James Eights of Albany, N. Y., on a trip to Antarctic regions deduced the existence of 480 miles of the littoral of what is known today as Ellsworth Land, west of Palmers Land, although he made the mistake of thinking he saw a string of islands.

In 1840, Charles Wilkes in command of the United States exploring expedition skirted between 1,500 and 1,800 miles of shore line and sighted mountain peaks in what is now known as Wilkes Land, in the Eastern Hemisphere, proving there was a continent and not just a group of islands. This voyage was authorized by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the United States House of Representatives in 1828, partly at the behest of J. N. Reynolds who had been to Palmers Land and who made a report to the Secretary of the Navy in 1828 (23d Cong., 2d sess., H. Doc. 105, 1835). By 1836 the Congress had appropriated $300,000. The boats left in 1838 and returned in 1842.

Norwegians were the first men to set foot on the continent proper (1895).

The dash to the South Pole occupied the aspirations of men in the early part of the twentieth century. In 1911 Amundsen, of Norway reached the Pole, in 1912 Scott of England did so but died on the return journey, and in 1929 Byrd of the United States reached the Pole by air.

In 1928, Sir Hubert Wilkins, the famed Australian explorer, aided by United States citizens' funds in part, was the first person to see Antarctica from an airplane. He has made other trips since. He now assists the United States Army.

In 1928–30, Richard E. Byrd, of Virginia, headed his own first expedition, a private one; he reached the Pole and also established his base known as Little America on the ice of the Ross Sea.

In 1933–35, he led another private expedition with which many are familiar through his writings.

In 1935, Lincoln Ellsworth and Sir Hubert Wilkins, traversed by plane a great tract. Ellsworth dropped the United States flag where the plane crossed the 80° W. longitude meridian, and he raised the United States flag near 104°10′ W., 79°12′ S. This trip and other Ellsworth trips through 1939 were privately financed. When he came home Congress took formal account of his work by giving him a gold medal under the act of June 16, 1936, for his claiming for us 250,000 square miles of territory between 80° and 120° W. This does not mean Congress claimed the land, but just that Congress gave a medal to Ellsworth. He is now a resident of New York City.

In 1939, Ellsworth discovered and claimed for the United States about 75,000 square miles inland on around the continent west of Wilkes Land.

In 1939–41, Admiral Byrd led an official United States expedition, financed from public tax funds mainly. On this trip he reestablished his west base at Little America and an east base in Palmer Land and he flew over a great deal of the Ellsworth Land tract, some of which was covered by sledge also from the east base, Richard B. Black in command. Byrd land covers the sector from 120° to 150° W. which is "claimed publicly by Byrd as a private United States citizen," to quote Colonel Martin in his chapter found in New Compass of the World (1949).

In 1947, Admiral Byrd had charge of another official United States expedition. On this "Operation High Jump" about 310,000 square miles were discovered, rather than reexplored, including what Wilkes had seen in 1840. Admiral Byrd maintains offices in Washington and Boston.

In 1947–48, Finn Ronne led a small private expedition with some aid from the United States Government. He established his base at Stonington Island, the former east base, and made field trips from there, claiming for the United States hundreds of thousands of newly explored land, the boundaries of which he filed officially with the State Department. Commander Ronne proved definitely that the Palmer Peninsula is an integral part of the continent proper. Members of Congress may care to note, in studying United States rights, Commander Ronne's account of his contacts with the British near his base, especially the two letters, as given in his book Antarctic Conquest (1949). It is of interest to United States citizens that Edith M. Ronne, wife of the commander, is one of the first two women ever to winter in the Antarctic, and possibly the first woman to set foot on the continent. Commander and Mrs. Ronne reside in Silver Spring, Md.

In 1949, a United States Navy expedition which was preparing to sail for the Antarctic was called off by Government officials on the grounds of economy.

In 1949 and in 1950 a few United States patriotic societies went on record with resolutions favoring requesting foreign nations receiving United States taxpayers' assistance to cede lands or grant royalties on their claims in the Antarctic.

In 1950, as mentioned before, the Soviets demanded representation at any Antarctic conference.

In August 1950, 130 years after Palmer's discovery, the United States still remained silent regarding official claims to Antarctic territory rightfully hers, although she does claim to be the most technologically advanced nation and thereby would seem to have the means and the will to lead in development of the world's most difficult continent.

Presentation of the X–1 by Gen. Hoyt S. Vandenberg

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1950

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, last Saturday, during ceremonies at Logan Airport, in my home city of Boston, Gen. Hoyt S. Vandenberg presented to the National Air Museum of the Smithsonian Institute the Bell X–1 supersonic research plane in which man first crossed the sonic barrier and successfully flew faster than the speed of sound.

The air age was born in the United States 47 years ago when Orville and Wilbur Wright successfully sustained a heavier-than-air plane in flight at Kitty Hawk, N. C. The first great period of the air age came to an end, and the second began 3 years ago when Capt. Charles Yeager, of the United States Air Force, successfully flew the X–1 through the sonic barrier.

The X–1 is not a military plane. It was an instrument of research and the sturdiest airplane ever built. It passes into the possession of the Smithsonian Institute in our National Capital to an honored place beside the plane of the Wright brothers, the plane in which Lindbergh flew across the Atlantic, and other famous aircraft, as a lasting memorial of the technical superiority of American genius, and as evidence of our ability to discover and control the forces of nature.

The remarks of General Vandenberg in making the presentation are a concise statement of the history of this plane, and of its use in developing principles of design which will be embodied in other X–1's. I think that, to complete the story of a plane that has figured so often—and so dramatically—in the public news, the General's felicitous remarks may well find preservation in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The general spoke simply and effectively and concluded his remarks with a tribute to the American people who can accomplish so much through the combination of engineering, scientific, and military talent. Such a combination of talents has brought us our present prosperity, and on such a combination of talents we must depend for our present and our continued security. General Vandenberg's remarks follow:

REMARKS BY GEN. HOYT S. VANDENBERG, CHIEF OF STAFF, UNITED STATES AIR FORCE, UPON PRESENTATION OF THE BELL X-1 SUPERSONIC RESEARCH PLANE TO THE NATIONAL AIR MUSEUM, DURING CEREMONIES AT LOGAN AIRPORT, BOSTON, MASS., SATURDAY, AUGUST 27, 1950

Forty-seven years ago no man had ever flown. No man really knew that flight was possible Then the Wright brothers built a flying machine. In a few seconds it was proved that man could fly, and the age of flight was born.

Three years ago no man had ever flown faster than the speed of sound. No man knew that it was possible to fly at such a speed. Many experts believed that it was not possible. But on October 14, 1947, an airplane flew faster than the speed of sound. That flight demolished the so-called sonic barrier which many had believed impossible to penetrate. It marked the end of the first great period of the air age, and the beginning of the second. In a few moments the subsonic period became history and the supersonic period was born.

That event occurred almost 44 years after the first flight at Kitty Hawk. But the second epoch making flight, like the first, was an American achievement. The X 1 was conceived, designed, and constructed through the collaboration of the Bell Aircraft Co., the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, and the United States Air Force. It was first flown at supersonic speed by a pilot of the Air Force. These facts mean that our country has maintained the air leadership won for us by the genius of the Wright brothers half a century ago.

Scientific and technical leadership, like all leadership, is expensive. It brings responsibilities and burdens. In recent months we Americans have become acutely aware of burdens. But let us make no mistake. Either we maintain our scientific and technical leadership, whatever the cost, or we submit to the domination of others. The people of the United States are but a small minority among the peoples of the earth. Although we do not stand alone, we must recognize that our most dependable allies have no masses of manpower to send to our aid.

We will never coerce or enslave other peoples to fill our needs. Yet we are challenged today by ruthless forces ready to sacrifice great masses of slaves and puppets in their efforts to destroy us. Our survival depends upon our superior ability to understand, control, and employ the laws and the forces of nature.

I consider the X-1 the most convincing evidence of our ability to discover and control the forces of nature since the original Wright airplane. Although it was sponsored by the Air Force, it was not designed as an implement of war. It was an instrument of research. Although we were then at war, the Air Force asked the Bell Co. to study the possible design of a supersonic airplane in 1944.

One year later the X-1 was completed. Even then many influential people urged abandonment of the project because they considered supersonic flight to be impossible. But somebody had to take that leap into the unknown. Several planes and pilots had been lost when mysterious forces seized them as they approached the speed of sound.

The mysterious forces were so violent and so destructive that very little was learned from those tragic experiences. The conviction grew that there existed a shock-wave barrier—at something less than the speed of sound—which no plane or pilot could penetrate and survive.

The X-1 was the sturdiest airplane ever built. The Bell Aircraft Co. and the NACA believed that it would withstand the unpredictable buffetings of the transsonic speed range. The Air Force wanted to know and Captain Yeager was anxious to find out.

After careful tests and many experimental flights the attempt was made. We are here today because the attempt was a success. It is especially true that neither the X-1 nor Captain Yeager would be here if the experiment had failed.

For several months the achievement remained the greatest secret in the history of aeronautics. Meanwhile, more flights were made, and more data accumulated. After the facts became known, the President of the United States—on the forty-fifth anniversary of the first of all flights—awarded the Collier Trophy for outstanding achievement in aeronautics to Lawrence Bell, John Stack, and Captain Yeager.

Today we honor these men again and all the others of the Bell Co., the NACA, and the Air Force whose faith-inspired efforts made supersonic flight a reality, and an American achievement

After the Collier trophy award Captain Yeager dispersed with the B-29 launching and flew the X-1 from the ground for the first time. He reached 23,000 feet in 100 seconds. During the flight he had to depend entirely on instruments, because the climb was so steep that the horizon was far beneath his view. But after this ceremony, the X-1 will not again climb to new horizons.

Other X-1's will carry on the research which is so vital to us today. Other planes now being built, will embody, in their design and their performance, all the lessons the X-1 has taught us. And the first supersonic plane goes to occupy a place of honor in the National Air Museum.

I have the honor to present to the National Air Museum the Air Force X-1. It could have no more appropriate resting place. The X-1 has flown many times at great altitudes and unprecedented speeds, but it remains exactly as it was first built 5 years ago. Its design was a stroke of genius, for it has met every requirement and every test without a single modification. Fortune has smiled upon it, for it has suffered no damage.

I am sure that in the National Air Museum the X-1 will serve as a reminder that new frontiers still challenge us. It will be an example of what can be accomplished through the combination of American engineering, scientific, and military talent. It will show how we can use the forces of nature to add to our prosperity and our security when we make the effort. And it must help to insure that the great effort necessary to guarantee our confirmed security will be made now.

Dr. Wetmore, the X-1 is yours. I know you will be just as proud of it as the Air Force has been.

Employment of the Handicapped

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. LYLE, JR.
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 28, 1950

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, a young lady from my congressional district, Miss Peggy Lord, of Cuero, Tex., recently won a $1,000 award contributed by the Disabled American Veterans, Inc., in the national essay contest sponsored by the President's Committee on National Employ the Physically Handicapped Week, of which Vice Admiral Ross T. McIntire (MC) U. S. Navy, retired, is chairman. In her essay Miss Lord has so captured the basic philosophy on employment of the handicapped that I wish to insert it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in order that others may read it. The essay follows:

HIRE THE HANDICAPPED, IT'S GOOD BUSINESS

(By Peggy Lord)

The young man stumped slowly down the street, his crippled leg dragging slightly as he walked, but his eyes had the light of hope in them, and surrounding him was an air of good will and expectant joy which caused all who approached him to glance at him with a smile; not a pitying smile directed at his lame leg, but a smile which reflected his own happiness.

As the boy walked along the sidewalk he watched the addresses on the buildings. His thoughts turned, unbidden to the day almost exactly 2 years ago when the threshing machine had borne down upon him. Then came disconnected pictures of the hospital where he nearly lost the leg; home where he fumed helplessly because he was so useless; and finally, the office of the vocational rehabilitation division, where he learned how to treat his leg, and was taught the trade of bookkeeping.

He was so glad he had applied for assistance—but he would pay it back. His reflections were broken by the appearance of the proper house number. Taking a deep breath, he entered the building.

When the boy explained to the receptionist, with just a trace of nervousness, that he was the new bookkeeper, she smiled professionally and directed, "Your office is down the hall."

His office. He beamed his thanks, and haltingly stepped down the hall. On the threshold of the indicated office he met his new boss, who greeted him with a genial wave of the hand and a businesslike nod.

"You're on time. Good. I always say that the tardy worker is a more costly embezzler than the one who just takes cash."

With this auspicious beginning, the boy was emboldened to ask the one thing which had been bothering him. "Sir," he faltered, "I couldn't help but wonder—did you want to hire me for the work I do and not just because of— how I am? I want to work. I couldn't accept charity." He drew himself up proudly.

His employer stared at him. "What!" he boomed. "You surely don't think—come on over and sit down. I'll tell you." As they seated themselves, he continued in a quieter tone, "You're the bookkeeper, and are entitled to know this, anyway, because money is involved. You see, we make money by employed the handicapped." Noticing the repulsed horror on the boy's face, the employer continued, "No, I don't mean that we exploit the handicapped. It's just on the principle of a penny saved, a penny earned; and the disabled help us to save pennies through their sense of responsibility and loyalty to the job."

"Oh, do you mean that there are several handicapped people working for you?"

"Yes, by all means. Didn't you notice the receptionist at the desk? That's a wheelchair she's sitting in. She's paralyzed from the waist down, but the best worker I ever had. Then, there are several others who do office work, and the janitor."

"And they save you money?" the boy pursued.

"I'll say they save me money. The money they save me in taxes alone would persuade me to hire handicapped workers even if they didn't have such outstanding characteristics. Why, until a short time ago, I didn't know that it cost less to rehabilitate an injured worker than it does to support him."

"You're right, sir. It costs only $300 to rehabilitate a worker, and the Government has to pay from $300 to $500 to an injured worker who is not being rehabilitated."[1]

"And not only that, boy, but the worker pays taxes after he gets a job. Why, he pays $10 in taxes for every $1 expended on him during rehabilitation.[2] That sure does save my pocketbook. After all, I'm one of the Americans who has to help pay that $3,000,000,000[3] which is spent each year on employable workers without jobs. Think of the saving that both the businesses and the Government would have if these were employed."

"But aren't there other ways that you save?" the boy asked.

"Definitely. It's good business to hire one of those disabled fellows. They have many good characteristics, and almost invariably make a better employee than the unimpaired."

"What are the other ways?" he persisted.

The man cast a sympathetic glance at the lad and explained. "The average handicapped worker has a feeling of—well, gratitude. They're so glad that they can really support themselves again that they do much better and more conscientious work than their unhandicapped brothers. It's a case of 'you never miss the water until the well runs dry.'

"They are less restless than unimpaired workers. They don't change jobs often, which minimizes the trouble and expense of frequently initiating new workers, and makes any business run more efficiently. They are time savers: It's very seldom that a disabled employee lags on the job, or unnecessarily misses work, or is tardy. These all save time, and in business time is money.

"They are so pleased with their opportunities that they are more loyal, less likely to strike. An impaired employee wants to justify his employment, so he tries to surpass the record of the worker who came before him. He knows that he must constantly prove himself, because any mistake or poor work is blamed on his disability. Their production is therefore excellent."

"Yes, sir. I read a recent survey which stated that impaired workers produce 3.6[4] percent more for every hour worked than do their unimpaired coworkers. Their output is better, and as a rule, the disabled worker is more careful, and thus less apt to be hurt while at work."

"Have you noticed that those who have been rehabilitated are happier in their jobs and have a better record in all ways than those who haven't?"

"Oh, yes; that's true," answered the boy, "although I did know a girl named Jane who trained and treated herself and is now an excellent and well-loved teacher. And I know several others who have surmounted the obstacle alone."

"And some of those who don't seek the help of the Texas Employment Commission have difficulty getting jobs, because there are so many employers who are prejudiced against the handicapped."

"I was, once, but I've come to my senses. If others could only see the list of the general characteristics of an average handicapped employee which I've compiled, they would capitulate, too. Handicapped workers are credited with being determined to make good, responsible, independent, always on time, good workers, loyal, and usually highly skilled."

"Of course, there are some jobs disabled workers can't perform, but there are others which are not affected, and still other jobs for which nature's compensation makes handicaped workers ideal. For example, the blind can feel better than other people, and the crippled are skilled with their fingers.[5]

"Really all in all, I think the handicapped worker is the best that can be had."

"I'm glad to hear you say that."

"I'm glad to be able to say it. Rest assured, if any worker meets the usual handicapped employee's standards, he is doing wonderfully."

Speech of Secretary of the Air Force, Hon. Thomas K. Finletter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1950

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, at the end of last week the city of Boston enjoyed the privilege of entertaining the fourth annual convention of the Air Force Association. I am quite sure that all who attended that convention enjoyed the hospitality for which Boston and Massachusetts are famous. I know that I can speak for my constituents in saying that they welcomed the opportunity to hear the distinguished speakers who appeared before this convention of an organization established to preserve and foster the spirit of fellowship among former and present members of the United States Air Force.

I was particularly struck by the thoughtful speech of the scholarly Secretary of the Air Force, the Honorable Thomas K. Finletter. It was, to be sure, exactly the sort of speech to be expected from one who had already distinguished himself for the efficient but quiet job he is doing in directing the Department of the Air Force. It proved, however, to be more than a report on the Air Force, and what that service is doing in the Korean war. It was a sober analysis of the significance of Communist aggression in Korea, and of the action taken by the United Nations to stop it. It was likewise a reasoned admonition of the course we must follow in our devotion to the cause of peace.

Mr. Finletter, though Secretary of a military department, recognizes that Communist aggression in Korea has a special significance beyond its military significance. It is the great test of the United Nations—and may well prove the action that will strengthen the United Nations for the prime task for which it was organized—the enforcement of peace. But in pointing this out, Mr. Finletter uttered the sober warning—

Nothing but the highest wisdom, character and willingness to envisage new solutions of a kind which the nations have never embarked upon before can give us any real assurance that the possibility of a world of permanent and enforced peace can be attained.

Mr. Finletter paid tribute to the courage and fighting quality of our associates of the Korean Republic, and to the performance of our own Air Force and Navy's carrier-based planes that have assured our overwhelming air superiority. This tribute is also accompanied by a warning.

We must not be misled by the specialized events of the Korean aggression—into wrong ideas as to the nature of the Defense Establishment we need to carry out our basic strategy.

An orderly and agreed procedure has been established by the Joint Chiefs of Staff for building up our strength now, both for use in the Korean war and for our strategy in the event of total war. What this procedure is, what form our combined effort must take, and what the responsibility of Congress is, is clearly and forcibly set forth in Mr. Finletter's adroit presentation, which I ask leave to insert in the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It follows:

REMARKS BY THOMAS K. FINLETTER, SECRETARY OF THE AIR FORCE, AT THE FOURTH ANNUAL AIRPOWER BANQUET OF THE AIR FORCE ASSOCIATION, HOTEL STATLER, BOSTON, MASS., SATURDAY, AUGUST 26, 1950

Most, if not all, of you are Air Force veterans of World War II. Your courage, sacrifice, and skill were essential factors in achieving a great military victory. Your success established the United States Air Force as a major element in our defense structure. It is particularly appropriate, therefore, that I talk to you tonight about our present position—of the events in Korea and of the effect which the Korean war has had on our Defense Department.

Communist aggression in Korea, of course, has great significance for our Defense Establishment and therefore for air power. But the special significance is not military. The controlling point about this Communist aggression in the Far East is that it is the great test of the United Nations. It is the first time that the United Nations has stood up as a body to oppose its force to the force of aggressors.

This is a hopeful thing; for in a United Nations, backed by adequate strength, lies our hope for peace. Terrible as all war is—and this one is no exception—the Korean aggression does have possibilities for good in it. For it may be that if we of the free world act with sufficient determination and wisdom we may have started the long-needed strengthening of the United Nations for the great task for which it is intended—the enforcement of peace.

It is important to understand the nature of the American decision to play our part along with other United Nations in resisting the Communist aggression in Korea. This decision was not a United States decision alone. The United States resolutely and actively joined with other countries of the United Nations in determining not to put up with this latest attack on free peoples by misguided armies acting under the direction of authoritarian breakers of the peace.

The United Nations has a special responsibility with respect to Korea. The Republic of Korea, limited to that part south of the thirty-eighth parallel because of Soviet refusal to permit a free election north of that parallel, had been born under the auspices of the United Nations General Assembly. It was established as a sovereign government by the free vote of the people of that area, in an election which was supervised by a United Nations Commission. That Commission was not permitted by the Russians to enter the territory which they were occupying north of the thirty-eighth parallel. The Republic of Korea has been recognized by the majority of the free nations of the world and by the United Nations as the only legitimate government for the area. In accordance with a United Nations resolution American troops were withdrawn from Korea, and their withdrawal was observed and verified by the United Nations Commission on the spot. The same resolution provided for the withdrawal of Russian forces but the United Nations Commission was not permitted to verify the withdrawal. To help train the forces of the Republic of Korea in the defense of their country the United States set up a military advisory group and this Government has furnished about $500,000,000 worth of military and economic aid to the Republic of Korea to enable them to strengthen their economy and prepare themselves for defense.

The question must immediately rise in your mind: "Why then were the Communists so successful in their attack on the Army of the Korean Republic?" The answer is that the invaders, aided by matériel and training from the outside, prepared themselves well for their act of violence. It seems to be the rule that it is difficult for those who wish to live in peace to prepare themselves for war, but that those who are bent on murdering their neighbors prepare themselves quite effectively for the event. This is what happened in Korea. The so-called Peoples Army of North Korea was splendidly equipped with Russian and Japanese matériel which had been captured by the Russians. The invading army was exceptionally well trained—especially for night operations. When the Red aggressors started over the thirty-eighth parallel their army was vastly superior in power to anything that stood to resist them in the Republic of Korea.

Across the straits, about 400 miles away, stood the American occupation forces. I emphasize the term occupation forces. The American troops in Japan were not intended for a land battle against aggression in China or Korea. The American forces in and about Japan were intended to carry out the duties of occupation and to defend a disarmed Japan against attack by air or sea.

This was a correct disposition of military power. While recognizing our treaty obligations and that areas of special strategic importance exist, it was not and it must not be the purpose of the Defense Department to dispose of forces in being—especially ground forces—capable of resisting aggression at all parts of the world. Any such military concept would be absurd; it could not possibly be carried out.

This point bears also on the original American determination to support fully the decision of the United Nations to resist authoritarian attack on the Korean Republic. The decision of the United States Government to do its share in resisting this aggression was not made because of the presence of the American forces in Japan or because the forces we had offered a chance of easy success. The decision was on a much higher ground. It was on the higher principle and the higher aspiration that the free peoples in the United Nations had determined that only through resistance would they be able to put an end to the recurring jabs and irritations of those who use war to further their own imperialistic and subversive purposes.

We are now paying the price for our determination to fight for the cause of peace.

It is of the highest importance that the United Nations continue its support of the Korean operations and that as many troops of as many nations as possible get into the defense against the northern aggression. In the nature of things, the American troops, being on the spot, have had to carry, with their allies of the Korean Republic, the burden of the fighting. But other nations have participated in the United Nations defense on the sea and in the air and ground troops are coming. We can look forward dimly through the haze to the world of peace which may evolve from this united strength of the free world.

Let us not, though, underestimate the difficulties of the campaign. The aggressors are fighting close to the lines of supply of those who are furnishing them with the materials of war. They are in a position to obtain additional manpower from regions close to them. We of the United Nations on the other hand have to transport our men and supplies across thousands of miles of land, sea, and air.

I must mention at this point the highly favorable reports that have come to us as to the courage and fighting quality of our associates of the Korean Republic. The Korean Republic's troops have recovered from the original assault and are fighting with determination, skill, courage and success.

It has not been pleasant to read of the steady advance of the Communist forces. But if we realize the vastness of the preparations of the aggressor and the small numbers of American troops who were available in the early days, we must have a sense of admiration for the skillful delaying action which the smaller numbers of American and Republic troops have carried out.

But the number of miles per division which the United Nations forces have to defend is still large and the reserves on the spot are not what we would like them to be. Nevertheless, we can look with pride on the improvised but heroic defense which the United Nations troops have put up.

Naturally you will be interested in the role which air power has played in the Korean conflict. The Air Force planes in Japan, in accordance with the purpose for which they were intended, were a mixture of jet intercepter planes of the F-80 type, a light bomber group equipped with B-26s and three fighter bomber groups equipped with F 80s. The F-80 is not the ultimate in fighter bombers but it has proved itself an effective interim weapon. All objective reports from Korea support the fact that this conclusion, based upon peacetime tests, has been confirmed fully by the greater test of war. The range of the F-80s was extended by improvising large wing tanks so that the F-80s could remain over the battlefield for a substantial period of time—even close to the ground where the highest consumption of jet fuel takes place. The F-80s drove the enemy planes from the air, and the United Nations have had from the beginning practically total air superiority. The Communist forces did use at the outset some piston-engine Yak planes but the presence of the F-80s has driven them from the air with insignificant resistance on their part.

Other planes too have been used. Because of the complete air superiority assured by our jet fighters we have been able to use some older types of aircraft also. The World War II piston-engined F-51 and the twin Mustang F-82 have also played important roles as ground attack and fighter bomber by night as well as day. Navy and Marine planes too have been effective in close support.

The medium bombers, the B-29s, have also been used in the land battle. At the outset we had two-thirds of a group of B-29s on Guam and these were brought to Okinawa. The Air Force augmented this force by 4 groups of B-29s which since then have bombed the rear areas of the Communist army to carry out the fundamental strategic purpose of denying the sources of supply to the fighting enemy at the front. The B-29s have even been brought into the tactical effort and on occasions have bombed concentrations of troops, bridges, and other military targets close to the battle area.

You may be interested in some of the hasty comments that have been made relative to the capacity of the jet F-80 as contrasted with slower conventional fighters such as the World War II F-51s. It has been suggested that the F-80 is so fast that it cannot hit its target as well as the slower F-51. I don't know what conclusion should be drawn from this statement but I suppose the conclusion would be that the Air Force should reduce its emphasis on jets and should substitute the slower piston engine planes for them.

Any such policy would be disastrous. The first task of an air force is to get air superiority and this can be done only by having airplanes which are fast enough and have fire power enough to drive the enemy from the skies. In tactical warfare only the modern jets can achieve this air superiority. The slower piston engine planes of World War II would not last long against a force of fast jets. If the enemy were to make the mistake of putting in jet planes to contest our superiority we would soon find out the importance of the F-80s in unmistakable terms.

I do not mean to suggest that there must not be specialization in the types of planes with which the Air Force will be equipped—especially in the tactical field. Even though, as I have said, planes are adaptable and can be used for purposes other than their primary mission, the kind of Air Force we need will have to be equipped with specialized planes, some designed for interception, others for close support, others for deeper-in attack bombing and strafing, and others for night fighting and for bad weather conditions. The characteristics needed for each of these functions of course varies. There may well be, with an Air Force of sufficient size to permit such degree of specialization, a role for slower planes for certain purposes. But any suggestion that the jet will not be heavily relied on in the future is incorrect.

One further point. The overwhelming air superiority which we possess in Korea has meant not only that the Air Force and the Navy's carrier-based planes have destroyed the basic supplies which feed the enemy army, such as the gasoline and oil located in tank farms, but we have also knocked out substantially completely the main lines of communication from the rear of the enemy's lines to the front. The railroad lines have been seriously interfered with, the bridges are down, vehicles have been destroyed, modern communications from the rear to the front have almost ceased to exist. This is paying dividends and will continue to pay dividends. We are all looking to the time when the cumulative effect of this attrition of supplies will play a decisive and perhaps overwhelming role in the defeat and destruction of the invading army.

Now we must not be misled by the specialized events of the Korean aggression into wrong ideas as to the nature of the Defense Establishment we need to carry out our basic strategy.

As I see it, we must know what out strategy would be in the event of total war before we can calculate the kind of Defense Establishment that we must have. We must first examine the tasks we have to perform before we can pretend to determine the kind of force we want to have.

As I see it our fundamental tasks are the following:

First, the United States must have in being a force which is capable of defending our own country against strategic air attack by the enemy.

We must build up our radar techniques and installations and our intercepting forces and our specialized missiles which will, to the greatest extent possible, blunt the attack of the enemy's strategic bombing force.

In this role, as in most of the roles which our Defense Department will have to play, the combined operations of the Air Force, the Army, and the Navy (including the marines) will be required.

Second, we must have in being a force of unmistakable power which will destroy the enemy's capacity to fight in the event that he makes the mistake of starting an aggressive war against our free world. I refer of course to the strategic Air Force, aided to the maximum extent possible, as in all tasks, by the Army and the Navy. This strategic Air Force must be unmistakably good. No effort must be spared to see to it that this strategic Air Force constitutes a defensive countermeasure of such violence that it will make it clear to anyone who thinks of attacking us or the society of which we are a part that it will be a most mistaken thing to do.

I know that all of you are fully aware of the importance of this strategic air arm, but I must lay special emphasis on it, even before you who understand it so well. Winston Churchill said recently that it was this force which was defending the peace of Europe and of the world. This was no overstatement. It is a curious thing this preparation of violence in the interests of peace, but that is the way it is. The more violent the potentiality of our air arm the greater is the hope that it will never be used.

The next task of our strategy is to maintain the lines of sea communications as free as possible from enemy attack. For the defense of this free world, centering as it does in large measure around the North Atlantic Treaty arrangements, is indispensible in the kind of society which we think right is to survive in the world of today.

The arrangements for the defense of the free world, and in particular for the defense of the West, are mixed military and political matters into which I will not go in any detail tonight. I will say only that it requires a combined determination of the major powers of the free world, each to do his share and to take seriously the matter of defending our common society even at the cost of heavy sacrifice.

The United States, I think, stands ready to play its part. The recent recommendations for substantial military defense-assistance programs—the recommendation for an increase of $4,000,000,000 over the present amount of one and one-quarter billions for the current fiscal year—shows, I think, the temper of the United States and its willingness to do its part.

But the effort must be a combined one. It must be one in which all of us, preferring liberty and decency to authoritarian rule, will be willing to make serious sacrifices. For I believe that the determination to resist the aggressive forces let loose in the world contains at least the hope that aggression may be banished. If we combine the determination not to be destroyed by aggression with the willingness to go far in agreeing to new ideas which will make aggression impossible, or at least improbable, we can have the hope that world war III will be avoided and that a regime of peace which will control these awful modern weapons of destruction will be established.

I am, as you see, cautious in my statement of hope, for I believe that nothing but the highest wisdom, character, and willingness to envisage new solutions of a kind which the nations have never embarked upon before can give us any real assurance that the possibility of a world of permanent and enforced peace can be attained.

I would like to make a few remarks about the way in which we are building our increased defense forces. The aggressor's strike at the Republic of Korea brought in vivid terms to the American people and their Government the necessity for a stronger Defense Establishment. It therefore became necessary to lay the plans quickly for this build-up in our military force. I am glad to be able to say that the plans for this build-up were formulated sensibly, in accordance with commonly agreed plans, and with complete harmony among the three services. This came about in the following way.

For months the Joint Chiefs of Staff had been studying the kind of military forces which they believed to be necessary to meet the responsibilities of the United States in the world of today. Their conclusions had been just about made final by the time the Communist attack took place in Korea. A few days after that attack occurred, the Joint Chiefs of Staff were able to make an agreed recommendation as to the build-up of the Army, Navy, and Air Force which in their opinion was necessary. In the case of the Air Force, as you know, the build-up was to be 58 groups as a result of additional appropriations over the normal appropriations in the fiscal year 1951, with a target program of 69 groups. Corresponding increases in the Army and Navy and a supplemental appropriation for the Navy to buy reserve planes for their carriers, all approved by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, were agreed upon.

These recommendations of the Joint Chiefs of Staff were approved by the Joint Secretaries, the new organization composed of the Secretaries of the Army, of the Navy, and of the Air Force which is doing, I think, an important work in helping achieve the unification of our services. They were then submitted to the Secretary of Defense, approved by him, relayed to the President of the United States, and made the basis of his recommendation for increased military appropriations totaling about eleven and a half billion dollars of additional appropriations for fiscal 1951 over the basic budget of about $13,000,000,000.

Now the point about this, and it is a very important point indeed, is that an orderly and agreed procedure has been established, and I hope is here to stay, for the determination of the military needs of the country. If this precedent is maintained—and every effort must be made to see that it is maintained—the size and striking power of our Defense Establishment will be determined by orderly processes by those charged with the duties of making these determinations. We can, I hope, count in the future on expert advice as to what the country needs for its military purposes. To be sure, these statements of those who have the responsibility for the defense forces must always meet with the approval of the civilian authorities whose responsibility it is to make the final determination. But the importance of this orderly arrangement within the Defense Establishment itself is a happy augur for the future.

Under this arrangement, the build-up of the Air Force will be, in my opinion, satisfactory. This is not to say that there are not many things which have to be done to strengthen our air arm. The heavy reliance which the country, and indeed all of the free world, places on our Air Force in being is such that we must spare no effort to see to it that this force is right. We will therefore move on urgently to strengthen our air arm. We will seek to build those installations, acquire the equipment and make the plans and missiles which will make our Air Force capable, within the limits of present applied science, of carrying out its task. I am sure that the American people expect nothing less.

I will not say that I am satisfied with our air arm as it now stands. It is good. Under the able leadership of my predecessor, Stuart Symington, and the present Chief of Staff, General Vandenberg, the Air Force has been made into something of which the country may be proud.

But I assure you that we are not complacent or self-satisfied about our Air Force—even at the 69-group level. We are searching out and will continue to search out every possible deficiency in our air power—in our bases, our installations, our planes, the training of the men and everything else that goes to make up a fighting Air Force. We will remedy deficiencies as we find them. We intend to have the kind of Air Force the country needs in the air age. I pledge you we will leave nothing undone which can lead us to this end.

Primer for Americans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. RICH

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1950

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following from the September 12, 1950, issue of Look magazine:

PRIMER FOR AMERICANS

What is Americanism? What do we stand for? What are the simple rock-bottom, down-to-earth American principles?

Nearly everyone has an answer—but rarely do two answers agree. Lacking agreement, how can we teach our children the principles of Americanism? How can we explain to the world what we stand for?

How can we recapture for ourselves the confidence, the enthusiasm, the shining faith in our country and in our way of doing things that earlier generations of Americans had * * * and that we now must have if we are to meet, and match, and beat the fanatic fervor of those who would change Americanism for isms of another sort?

What follows is not the Book of America. It is at most a Primer—a try at stating our American principles clearly, simply, in primer fashion so that anyone, child or adult, American or foreigner, can understand them.

For if we can agree upon our basic American beliefs, then we can grasp them, hold fast to them, and make them once again an exciting, active, guiding force in our lives, in our country, and in the world.

The principles of America are these:

1. Each person is of importance and value as an individual. This is the cornerstone—the foundation of all our other beliefs in the individual's right to live his own life, to speak for himself, to choose and change his leaders.

From it comes our hatred of those isms under which the individual has no value or importance as an individual, but is only one of many faceless beings in a voiceless herd called "the people."

Coming directly from that first principle are two other principles—two basic beliefs that are also part of the foundations of Americanism.

2. We believe that all men should enjoy personal freedom.

3. We believe that all men are created equal. It is worth noting that the Declaration of Independence expressed the belief that all men are created equal. It did not state or imply a belief that men develop equally or have equal ability, or that they should ever be forced to an exact equality of thought, speech, or material possessions.

That would be equality without freedom. Americans have always believed the two should go together.

From the days of the Declaration of Independence and the writing of the Constitution, Americans have been wise enough to know that even though life, liberty, and other unalienable rights are granted to man by his Creator, they require some protection by man, himself.

So, in our Constitution, and in other laws of our land, there are set down principles to protect the rights and freedoms and equality of individuals. And these, also, are part of the foundations of America.

4. The right to freedom of speech. This includes freedom of the press, of radio, of motion pictures, of every means by which man may express his thoughts on any subject.

5. The right to freedom of assembly. As we believe in the right of individual action, so we believe that individuals should be free to act together for the benefit of all. This is democracy.

6. The right to freedom of worship. Not only is the individual free to worship as he will, but religions themselves are free and equal—regardless of their size or their beliefs.

7. The right to security of person and property. Not just one, but three amendments to the Constitution (fourth, fifth, and fourteenth) protect against illegal search and seizure, or loss of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.

8. The right to equal protection before the law. As individuals are equally important, so laws must apply equally to all, without special privileges for any particular individuals or groups.

9. The right to freedom from slavery. This includes the right to quit, for no individual may be forced to work for another.

10. The right to petition the Government. The legally guaranteed right of the individual to petition the Government for redress of grievances is evidence of the American belief that government is the servant, not the master, of the people.

11. The right to vote for the person of your choice. This is the individual's most potent weapon in the protection of his rights and freedoms * * * a weapon that to be effective must be constantly and wisely used.

The principles of Americanism hold that every man has—

12. The right to a good education.

13. The right to live where he pleases.

14. The right to work where he wants to.

15. The right to join and belong to an organization.

16. The right to own property.

17. The right to start his own business.

18. The right to manage his own affairs.

19. The right to make a profit or to fail, depending on his own ability. There are other, similar rights of individual action which are Principles of America, but all of these individual rights may be combined in these two broad principles.

20. Every man is entitled to freedom and equality of opportunity.

21. Every man may earn his living when, where, and how he wants to.

There are also limiting principles. Principles of individual freedom sometimes clash with those of individual equality. Therefore our rights as individuals must be limited, and those limitations are themselves principles.

22. The rights of any individual shall not interfere with the equal rights of other individuals. Your right to swing your arms stops where the other fellow's nose starts.

23. The rights of any individual shall not interfere with the welfare of the people as a whole. Freedom of speech does not give the individual the right to shout "fire" in a crowded theater.

24. Every individual owes obedience to the laws under which he lives. The individual has the right to talk against a law, to work and vote to change that law, but not to disobey that law.

Principles that are patterns of behavior. Many of our principles of individual freedom and equality are guaranteed to us by law.

But we have other beliefs, other general rules of action and conduct that have grown to the status of principles. They have stood the test of time. They have worked. They have become a basic part of the way we live and of the way we look at things.

These principles, too, are foundations of Americanism. They are as true, if not more true, today than they were in 1850 or in 1750.

If America stays free, they will still hold true in 2050.

25. Every man shall be judged by his own record. A man's family background, his racial or religious group, is not as important as what that man himself can do, for Americans believe a man must stand on his own feet.

26. Every man is free to achieve as much as he can. We believe that where the laborer's boy may become President, where any man may achieve greatness, there is the greatest incentive for every man to do his best.

27. To achieve anything a man should be willing to work. Americans have always known that "you don't get something for nothing," that to get anything takes a willingness to work and to work hard.

28. Achievement also depends upon the ability to do a good job. Add to "willingness to work" the ability to produce results and the combination is the basis for most individual achievement in our country.

29. Every man has the right to a fair share of the results of his work and his ability. Because of this belief, America has not only produced more goods, but they have been more fairly and more widely shared by more people than in any other country.

30. Security is the ability of a man to provide for himself. The only true security for any individual is the opportunity, the ability, and the determination to work and plan and save for his own present and future. Self-reliance is vital to individual independence and personal freedom. No man can be "proud and free" who depends on others for his security.

31. When an individual cannot provide his own security, the responsibility should be assumed by others. We believe that no one should starve, or be without adequate clothing and shelter, so those who have more than their basic needs share the responsibility of providing the essentials of security for those who need help.

32. Every individual must deal fairly with other individuals. Honesty, fairness, and personal integrity are virtues that help free and independent individuals get along with each other without losing their independence.

33. Fair and free competition is a good thing. Americans have always believed that competition among individuals or groups encourages greater effort which in turn brings greater benefits to all.

34. Cooperation among individuals is vitally important. General Eisenhower has said: "The freedom to compete vigorously accompanied by a readiness to cooperate wholeheartedly for the performance of community and national functions, together make our system the most productive on earth."

Principles of individual responsibility. Freedom for individuals carries with it an equal responsibility to use that freedom wisely. Therefore, if we wish to remain free, we must faithfully fulfill our responsibilities as free men.

35. The individual is responsible for himself and his family. He must protect them and provide for their present and future well-being.

36. The individual has responsibilities to the groups of which he is a part. He must give of his best to his community, his church, his employer, his union, and to every group in which individuals cooperate for their mutual benefit.

37. The individual has responsibilities to his country. He must be an active citizen, interesting himself in local, State, and National government, voting wisely, thinking and speaking and acting to preserve and strengthen freedom, equality, and opportunity for every individual.

38. The individual has responsibilities to the world. Man's horizons have expanded. What happens in the world affects him, and his actions can affect the world. Today, therefore, each man has a responsibility to act—and to encourage his country to act—so that freedom and cooperation will be encouraged among the people and the nations of the world.

FOR AMERICA'S FUTURE

Most of us are still confident of ourselves and of our country. We do not claim perfection. But we have faith in our ability to move forward, to improve, to grow, to provide more and more free, equal, individuals with more and more of everything they want and need in life.

If we, the people of the United States, want to have more material benefits, we must believe in and follow these two principles.

39. The only way we can have more is to produce more; and

40. As we produce more, we must make it possible for more and more people to enjoy that which we produce—if we, the people of the United States, want to have a better life, spiritually as well as materially.

41. We must stand firmly for our beliefs, our rights, our principles. Walt Whitman, writing nearly 100 years ago, put it this way:

"There is no week, nor day, nor hour when tyranny may not enter upon this country if the people lose their supreme confidence in themselves."

There are those who would chip away our confidence so that their special brand of tyranny might creep into America. They must not succeed. So, let us ask of every plan, or act, or idea: Is it with or against the principles of America?

Is History Repeating Itself on Shipping Legislation?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 28 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, current deplorable conditions in the American shipping and ship construction industries deserve the attention of thoughtful citizens everywhere. Strenuous efforts have been made during the present Congress to impress upon legislators and citizens alike the need for a well-considered program to rehabilitate the two industries which are essential alike to American prosperity and to American security.

There is striking similarity between present efforts and similar efforts to rehabilitate the shipping industry which were initiated during the Sixty-seventh Congress. A review of these previous activities is interestingly presented in an article entitled "Is History Repeating Itself on Shipping Legislation?" published by the Association of American Shipowners.

In view of the vital need now for constructive action in this important field, I ask unanimous consent that the attached necessarily abbreviated copy of the article be published in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IS HISTORY REPEATING ITSELF ON SHIPPING LEGISLATION?

Quietly gathering dust in Senate and House libraries is a very fat volume of hearings held before the Joint Senate and House Committees on Merchant Marine and Fisheries during the second session of the Sixty-seventh Congress. The volume, which is about 6 inches thick and is titled "To Amend the Merchant Marine Act of 1920," contains 2,508 pages of testimony taken from April 4 to May 19, 1922, on a comprehensive bill to aid the United States merchant marine.

The bill, H. R. 10644 and S. 3217, was drafted by the United States Shipping Board and advocated by President Harding in a special message to Congress. It was the fruit of a careful study by the Shipping Board as to what was necessary and the best methods to utilize in an effort to revive American-flag shipping in foreign trade, which then was practically defunct as far as private operations were concerned. Debate on the legislation in the House and Senate filled hundreds of pages in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and continued intermittently until February 28, 1923, when the bill died in the final hours of the Sixty-seventh Congress.

There are two sharp differences between these dusty records of maritime legislation 28 years ago in the Sixty-seventh Congress and what is happening to shipping legislation currently in the Eighty-first Congress:

1. The 1922 bill proposed a number of both direct and indirect aids which were to be available equally to all American-flag vessels serving the foreign trade of the United States. Shipping bills in the Eighty-first Congress, while they sought to broaden the availability of aids to American shipping, restricted under the 1936 act to the few companies subsidized to operate on essential routes, were not nearly so comprehensive in their application as the 1922 proposal.

2. The 1922 legislation was proposed and supported vigorously by the Republican administration then in power and was supported by the majority of Republicans in Congress, while the opposition of the Democratic minority to any kind of subsidy for shipping, direct or indirect, finally killed it. The 1936 act, on the other hand, received its impetus from the Democratic administration then in power. In 1950, the opposition of the present administration to any broadening of subsidies, combined with apparent apathy of congressional leaders in Congress toward the maritime bills, has so far prevented their passage even though they had strong bipartisan support in both House and Senate committees.

Similarities between what happened in 1922 and is happening today on maritime legislation are as revealing as the differences:

1. Then, as now, the legislation had the almost unanimous support of the entire maritime industry, as well as the support of the overwhelming majority of the business community.

2. Then, as now, relatively substantial profits made by the shipping industry during the recent war made it an easy and popular target of attack, furnishing opponents of legislation with effective ammunition, even though the current, peacetime problems of the industry were critical.

3. Then, as now, the industry suffered because of its relatively small size and the fact that it had relatively few Members of Congress who could or would spend the time and energy necessary to understand its problems thoroughly and advocate vigorously their solution.

4. Then, as now, for the reason cited above, other legislative business took precedence over maritime problems. Attendance of House Members at hearings was fair, but not more than one or two Senators would find time to attend them.

5. Then, as may happen again, legislation which was the result of many months of effort by the industry, Government bureaus and the congressional committees, reached the floor of Congress only to fail of final enactment.

World War I caught this country completely unprepared insofar as shipping was concerned, and throughout the war we had to rely primarily on our Allies to transport our troops and supplies while we invested huge sums in developing almost from scratch a shipbuilding and shipping industry. Few of the hundreds of ships built here during World War I were finished in time to carry any cargo in that war. The situation was somewhat better in World War II which found us with the nucleus of a shipbuilding industry which, given time, was capable, at a huge expense, of expansion into a tremendous production industry.

Who can guess how much stronger we would have been when World War II struck us if the legislation proposed in 1922 had been enacted then, and how much could have been saved in the cost of providing the ships that were necessary? Failure then to recognize the necessity of a strong merchant marine to our changed obligations in the world undoubtedly both weakened us and increased heavily the cost of World War II.

In that respect, our situation today is analogous to 1922. While we do have today a much stronger merchant marine than we had in 1922, we also have tremendously greater world-wide commitments which can in turn be fulfilled only if our strength on the high seas is relatively far greater than we needed in 1922. In spite of our stronger maritime situation today, the Government had to dip heavily into the reserve fleets almost immediately to meet the shipping demands of a relatively small war in Korea. And Korea is only one of many commitments we have undertaken as part of our foreign policy, all of which, by their very nature, demand a much stronger active merchant marine than we now possess. An observer may be forgiven for wondering how many wars it will take before the American people and Congress finally awaken to the vital importance of the American merchant marine to our security and prosperity.

The story of the 1922–23 effort to strengthen the United States merchant marine is worth recounting briefly, first, because it was a far more comprehensive effort than any that has been made since, and second, because the bill which came so near passage was the result not only of lengthy hearings before congressional committees, more extensive even than those in 1949–50, but also of a careful study made by the United States Shipping Board with the full support of the executive branch of Government.

Major emphasis in H. R. 10644 was on indirect aids to American-flag shipping, and the bill's provisions may be summarized under three headings—indirect aids, direct aids, and general, as follows:

INDIRECT AIDS

1. Earnings of United States-flag vessels in foreign trade would be exempt completely from Federal income taxes for a period of 10 years after enactment of the proposed bill, providing that owners of such vessels set aside for investment in construction of new vessels in American shipyards an amount equal to double the amount of income taxes so forgiven.

2. Capital gains realized from the sale of United States-flag ships would not be taxed if placed in a fund to be invested in construction of new vessels in American shipyards.

3. The United States Shipping Board, in cooperation with the Treasury Department, would draft the depreciation rules to be applied to American-flag vessels in foreign trade, with a directive to permit an accelerated write-off during the 5 years 1922–26 of the excessive depreciation of ship values after World War I.

4. Any person or corporation importing or exporting goods in an American-flag vessel would be permitted to deduct 5 percent of all freights paid for such transportation from the Federal income tax otherwise payable by such person or corporation. (Note that the deduction of 5 percent of freights paid is from the tax payable, not the net income.)

5. Any direct aid received from the Federal Government would be excluded from gross income of a ship operator in determining income for tax purposes.

6. At least 50 percent of all immigrants to the United States would be required to travel to this country in American-flag ships, and detailed rules for carrying out this provision through immigration visas, country by country, were set forth.

7. All employees or officials of the United States traveling abroad and all Federal Government supplies shipped abroad would be required to go in United States-flag ships. (Administration witnesses placed considerable emphasis on this provision in their testimony, insisting that the United States merchant marine lost prestige when its own Government did not use it exclusively and asserting that all other maritime nations did utilize their own merchant marine exclusively for Government transportation.)

8. The Armed Forces, wherever practicable, would be required to utilize privately owned American-flag shipping to transport personnel and supplies abroad.

DIRECT AIDS

1. The United States Shipping Board was authorized to sell ships it owned at the world market price for tonnage. Sales generally were to be made on advertised bids, but the Board was authorized to sell ships without bids on vote of five of its seven members. Interest on unpaid balances was to be charged at 4 percent.

2. Proceeds of ship sales would go into a $125,000,000 revolving fund from which the Shipping Board would be authorized to make loans for new ship construction in United States shipyards up to two-thirds of the total cost of the new ships, charging interest at 2 percent or more on the loans.

3. Any United States-flag vessel of 1,500 gross tons or more serving the foreign trade of the United States (including vessels in cross trades if they touched a continental United States port once each year and also industrial carriers if they were open to carry cargo other than that consigned to the owner company) would be entitled to direct aid from the United States Shipping Board ranging from ½ cent to 2.6 cents per gross ton per 100 nautical miles steamed in foreign trade. The aid would be graduated according to the speed of the vessel, beginning with ½ cent at 13 knots and with a top of 2.6 cents at 23 knots.

The Board would be authorized to increase the direct aid payable to any vessel in a particular service up to double the amounts specified in the bill if the Board found such increase necessary to assure an essential service. The Board also could decrease aid where it found the full amount was not needed.

Recipients of this direct aid would be required to (a) permit the United States to take such vessels for national defense or public need at any time, paying fair value; (b) make repairs to vessels in United States shipyards whenever possible; (c) carry United States mails (but not parcel post) abroad free; and (d) carry crews at least two-thirds of whom were United States citizens and the rest eligible for citizenship.

If profits of any shipping company receiving such direct aid exceeded 10 percent on the capital employed in the business, 50 percent of excess profits above the 10 percent would be repayable to the Shipping Board up to the full amount of aid paid.

The direct aid would be paid from a revolving merchant marine fund established under control of the Shipping Board, into which would be paid: (a) all recaptures of aid under the 10 percent profit limitation clause; (b) all tonnage and port fees paid by vessels under United States laws, which would be increased 100 percent by the bill; (c) 10 percent of all tariff duties collected on imports to the United States; and (d) all amounts which the Post Office Department otherwise would pay for carrying foreign mail.

GENERAL

1. A Naval Merchant Marine Reserve would be established, to be recruited from officers and seamen in the merchant marine, each member to receive ansually one month's pay of the equivalent United States Navy rating.

2. The Shipping Board and Interstate Commerce Commission would be directed to develop jointly rules affecting both rail and water transport and railroads would be permitted to own competing water transportation facilities.

The House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, which did most of the committee work on the bill, developed two new versions of the bill, the second one of which, H. R. 12817, was passed by the House that fall and reported favorably by the Senate Merchant Marine Committee on December 9, 1922.

The major changes made in the original draft of H. R. 10644 by H. R. 12817 were as follows:

The Shipping Board was directed to maintain its service to major shipping areas of the United States, defined as the North Atlantic, South Atlantic, Gulf and Pacific coast areas, which then were being served by Government-owned vessels operated under general agency contracts, until it was satisfied that private operators could maintain adequate service to such areas. For the first 2 years, the Board could not sell vessels serving such areas without the approval and support of the domestic communities in such areas. (This emphasis on then existing services and major shipping areas grew out of demands made at the hearings and was the forerunner of the so-called essential route concept written into the 1936 act.)

The provisions for free carriage of foreign mail by ships receiving direct aid, and for payment into the Merchant Marine Fund of amounts which the Post Office Department otherwise would pay for such mail carriage, were eliminated. Main reason given for this change was the fear that inequities might result if some vessels were required to carry much larger volumes of mail than others receiving the same amount of direct aid.

The provision permitting industrial carriers to receive direct aid was eliminated from the bill.

The section establishing a Naval Merchant Marine Reserve was stricken from the bill. (Union representatives opposed this section bitterly in the hearings.)

The provision for joint rule making by the Shipping Board and the ICC was struck out, although the clause permitting railroads to own competing water carriers remained in the bill.

The provision for a revolving Merchant Marine Fund was struck out, and the direct aids payable made subject to annual congressional control by requiring appropriations each year.

All of these changes represented concessions to the Democratic minority opposing the bill, and the Republican majority made it clear that it believed some of them unwise, particularly the elimination of the revolving fund and the denial of direct aid to industrial carriers. The majority argued that to encourage the flow of private capital into shipping an assured continuity of aid was essential, which could not be obtained if aid was subject to congressional approval of appropriations each year. The majority also felt it was a mistake to deny benefits of direct aid to industrial carriers, since many of these already were being operated under foreign flags and it would be very desirable to have them under the American flag.

Page after page of statistics to show the difference in operating costs between American-flag and foreign-flag ships were placed in the record at the hearings. Then, as now, the big differential was in wages, with the difference in wage costs per month between American and British ships placed at various figures from $800 to more than $2,000 for an 8,000-ton freighter, depending on the wage and manning scales used. The average differential in operating costs cited in the hearings, covering both wages, was slightly over $1,300 per month, as compared to a current difference of more than $400 per day estimated by the Maritime Administration.

All operator groups in the maritime industry strongly supported the bill at the hearings, as did all the organizations of licensed officers. The late Andrew Furuseth, on the other hand, testifying for the International Seamen's Union, opposed any form of subsidy and devoted several days of testimony to attacking various features of the bill. The American Federation of Labor also opposed the measure on the general proposition that it opposed subsidies of any kind.

The National Grange opposed the bill because it opposed any form of subsidy, while the American Farm Bureau was both for and against it. The Farm Bureau representative said that his organiaztion opposed subsidies as a matter of principle, but also was strongly aware of the need of a strong merchant marine and therefore inclined to favor the bill if the subsidy features could be made temporary.

Hundreds of chambers of commerce and similar business organizations from virtually every State in the Union supported the bill, either by direct testimony or through telegrams, letters, or statements printed in the record. Representatives of these associations, particularly from the Gulf, Midwest, and Pacific coast areas, were the first to raise the question of preserving the existing shipping services to various geographical areas then being served by shipping board fleets in any new legislation. Fears were expressed that New York and the Atlantic coast might monopolize the benefits of the bill unless additional safeguards were written into it. As might be expected, their plea met a very sympathetic response from the committee.

Hostility of most minority committee members to the whole concept of the bill became evident very early in the hearings, and every proponent of the bill was cross-examined by them at considerable length. Representatives Rufus Hardy, of Texas, and Edward L. Davis, of Tennessee, were particularly dogged in their cross-examination of administration witnesses, outdoing the other members in that respect.

The controversy continued through executive consideration of the bill, which took place first in the House committee. There, the modifications noted above were made in two successive drafts of the bill offered by the committee and in floor amendments adopted before final passage by the House after several days of floor debate. The concessions did not mollify the minority. Democrats voted almost solidly against the bill and were joined by enough Republicans to cut the majority to only 24 votes on its final passage by the House.

Once the bill, now H. R. 12317, had been passed by the House, the Senate committee moved rapidly and reported it with only minor amendments to the Senate floor on December 9, 1922. Five Democrats—Senators Fletcher of Florida, Sheppard of Texas, Dial of South Carolina, Simmons of North Carolina, and Caraway of Arkansas—signed a blistering minority report opposing the bill in toto.

Senator Jones, Republican, of Washington, and chairman of the Senate committee, opened debate on the bill December 11. From then on until February 28, 1923, the bill was debated continuously in the Senate except for time taken out to pass appropriation and other essential bills. On the latter date, just a few days before the Sixty-seventh Congress was due to expire on March 4, the Senate voted on a motion to recommit the bill made by Senator Robinson of Arkansas, leader of the minority. The motion lost, 48 to 36, on almost a straight party vote.

By its sponsorship of the so-called long-range shipping bill in the current Congress, the maritime industry has indicated its unanimous belief that there are serious deficiencies in the Merchant Marine Act of 1936. But a review of what happened in 1922–23, when shipping legislation had stronger support in Congress and the administration than it apparently has today, warns that a considerable task may require early accomplishment to educate not only the public and Congress, but also the executive branch of Government on both the value and needs of a strong American merchant marine. Otherwise we may again encounter dangerous and costly delays before we can provide ships and shipbuilding facilities suitable and necessary for our security and for our economy.

The War and Wool

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LESTER C. HUNT

OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 28 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HUNT. Mr. President, I request unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an article titled "The War and Wool" from the Wyoming Wool Grower of August 17, 1950.

This article reviews the wool situation for approximately the past year and clearly indicates that had the Munitions Board of the Government started their wool-purchasing program many months ago when the Subcommittee on Stockpiling of the Armed Services Committee suggested they do so millions of dollars would have been saved by our Government.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WAR AND WOOL

Naturally everyone is wondering what effect the Korean war is going to have on wool. Up to date, of course, the principal effect has been an advancing wool market throughout the world.

Long before there was any idea of war in Korea our Senator HUNT repeatedly urged the Munitions Board to stockpile wool and to increase their stockpile of other strategic material. Later Senator HUNT was appointed chairman of the Stockpiling Committee of the Senate Armed Services Committee, in which position he continued to emphasize the importance of stockpiling wool.

At the time Senator HUNT urged that wool be stockpiled, there was considerably more wool available in this country and throughout the world than is available at present.

Some of us can remember that about 15 months ago, when the woolen mills lacked business and were closing down, we suggested to the defense authorities that they place orders for their woolen requirements in order not only to create a stockpile of goods, but also the help the woolen mills over the hump. The defense authorities paid just as much attention to our suggestions as they have to the suggestions of Senator HUNT. Had they followed our suggestions in the spring of 1949 and placed orders for the Army's requirements, they would have saved the Government untold millions of dollars because there was ample wool available and the mills needed business and would have taken the business, practically on a cost basis. Had the authorities taken heed of Senator HUNT'S request when it was first made, when there was wool available throughout the world, which was selling at a much lower price than it is today, it would have saved the Government millions of dollars.

We mention these facts of background because it was recently announced in Washington that the Quartermaster General was preparing invitations for bids to seven mills making 10,000 yards each of uniform cloth containing 70 percent wool and not more than 30 percent synthetic fibers.

This is to be a trial order and the goods containing the synthetics, when manufactured, will be subjected to severe field tests.

We believe the people of the country generally and, of course, the wool growers in particular, will object to the use of synthetic fibers in soldiers' uniforms.

We do not believe the specifications for uniforms should be changed from the present all virgin wool requirement so long as an adequate supply of wool is available, and on the basis of the orders now being placed for delivery until April 1 of next year there would seem to be ample wool to take care of the Army requirements.

Senators HUNT and O'MAHONEY vigorously protested against the use of synthetics in Army uniform cloth, both Senators pointing out that if the Government would stock pile wool, the use of synthetics in uniform cloth would not be necessary.

Senator O'MAHONEY, who is always alert to protect not only the wool grower, but the soldiers of the country, when Major General Feldman, Quartermaster General of the Army, was testifying before the Senate Appropriations Committee, asked General Feldman concerning the use of synthetic fibers in uniform cloth and General Feldman is reported to have replied that he did not favor the use of synthetics in uniform cloth and preferred to use the proverbial "all wool" in all Army uniforms.

General Feldman, in writing a member of the Armed Services Committee of the Senate on August 8, said, "This office, however, has not and does not intend to take any action to change our standard textile fabrics so long as wool supplies are available."

It is our opinion that there is no necessity for using synthetic fibers in uniform cloth. Our members will recall that during World War II there was a great drive on to require the mandatory blending of synthetic fibers with wool in all civilian fabrics. Wool growers, manufacturers, and others resisted this movement and pointed out there was still plenty of wool for all Army requirements, and while the supplies of woolens and worsteds for civilian use were somewhat restricted, those who desired to purchase virgin wool garments were usually able to do so.

We assume that the same people, who were pressing so hard for mandatory blending during World War II, are those who are insisting that the Army authorities use synthetics in uniform cloth.

Recently it was announced that the Quartermaster General had requested the Munitions Board to take steps to create a stockpile of 130,000,000 pounds of wool. While the wool growers have always insisted that any stockpile should be in the form first of cloth and uniforms, next of yarn, and next of wool tops, and lastly of wool, we believe the wool growers would not object to the wool stockpile of 130,000,000 if the stockpile were converted into cloth.

Press reports indicate that the authorities in Washington are attempting to negotiate with the Government of Australia for the purchase of wool in that country, when the new clip comes onto the market at the auctions starting the last of this month.

It will be remembered that during the past year Russia has taken considerable wool from Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and South America. When Russia wanted wool, they bid up the price until they secured wool. It is reported that the Russians have recently used the same tactics in South America and have purchased considerable wool there.

Fairly reliable statistics indicate that the total purchases of wool for the Russian account in Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and London during the past marketing year was approximately 100,000,000 pounds, but it was always noticeable that whenever the Russians were in the market, they secured the wool by bidding higher prices.

There is another matter that the Army authorities could profitably study instead of thinking about the use of synthetics. They could change their specifications to permit the use of lower count wools in all of the Army requirements. Everyone knows that there is a world shortage of fine wool and if the Army specifications were lowered so that the medium wools could be used, it would make much larger stocks of wool available for Army use. This has been suggested to the Army authorities for the past couple of years and while they have made some changes, they have not, in our opinion, gone far enough.

In the recent invitation to bid on 3,300,000 yards of Army serge, they used the official standard of the Quartermaster Corps for wool tops. This wool top is understood to be slightly lower in grade than the top used a year or two ago. In the past, when the Army called for the use of a 60s top, it was generally agreed in the trade that the top would be 62s rather than 60s and apparently the top to be used in the serge contracts is what would be known of as commercial 60s. However, they recently issued invitations to bid on 3,300,000 yards of 18-ounce olive-drab serge. They received offers on something over 4,844,500 yards of this serge at prices ranging from $4.792 to $6.02. Most of the bids were in the range of $4.792 to $5.23.

It is interesting to note that on the last order for 18-ounce Air Force serge last May the low price was $3.74 per yard. During World War II, when wool prices were fixed by the OPA, the prices of 18-ounce serge ran from $2.83 to $3.14 per yard.

Everyone is waiting to see what form the control legislation will take and many people are fearful of a roll-back in prices.

So far as textiles are concerned, both Senate and House bills have provisions that would protect them, providing that no ceiling shall be established or maintained for any agricultural commodity below the parity price for such commodity, or an average price received between May 24 and June 24 this year. So it would seem that if a roll-back is used it will be limited.

Secretary Jones, of the National Wool Growers Association, has been in Washington for about 10 days and we assume will report fully in the next issue of the National Wool Grower. We are of the opinion that until control legislation is finally passed and approved and the authorities start issuing the regulations under such control legislation, it is going to be difficult, if not impossible, to make any forecasts.

We are attempting to keep in close touch with the situation in Washington through Senators HUNT and O'MAHONEY and Congressman BARRETT as well as other sources, and we will advise our members just as quickly as possible after any important steps are taken.

In the meantime you may be sure that any reports regarding roll-backs, etc., are entirely without foundation

Senators HUNT and O'MAHONEY are following this matter very closely and can be depended upon not only to keep us fully advised but to protect our interests.

Let the Church Speak Up for Capitalism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. H. ALEXANDER SMITH
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 28 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, in the Reader's Digest for September 1950, there is an article by Dr. Norman Vincent Peale entitled "Let the Church Speak Up for Capitalism."

Dr. Peale is one of America's foremost Protestant ministers and for 18 years he has been minister of the Marble Collegiate Church in New York City.

As the title indicates, Dr. Peale is making an appeal for the church to face the whole issue of capitalism and the attacks made upon it and his remarks are of such importance that I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LET THE CHURCH SPEAK UP FOR CAPITALISM

(By Norman Vincent Peale)

Recently a successful businessman not a member of my church came to my office.

"I am an active church member," he said. "I have been loyal to my church and supported it with time and money. Now, however, my loyalty has had a severe shaking."

As he laid an unfamiliar magazine on my desk, opened to a marked page, he said, "The other evening my 18-year-old son asked how

I reconciled being a capitalist with being a Christian. I told him I didn't see anything inconsistent in that: it seemed to me possible to try to be both. That, my son, said, is not the way the church looks at it, and he handed me this magazine."

I picked it up and read: "In the first half of the twentieth century, capitalistic totalitarianism was Christianity's greatest enemy. * * *" There was much more in the same vein.

"That magazine," said my visitor, "is an official publication of my church, published for circulation among college-age people. This particular article was written by the magazine's editor as a midcentury message to the young people of my denomination."

He handed me half a dozen other recent issues. They pictured America as an almost total economic and social paganism. That there had been any important American progress in human betterment was hardly hinted at. Let me quote a few samples:

"Communism proposes that something drastic be done about the economic situation. The American position is by and large that the status quo should continue; that it is the duty of the United States to protect its standard of living, to hold on to what it has even if it should take atomic bombs and diabolical poisons to do it."

"The god of the machine has so deadened the social conscience that it is really an open question whether the wiping out of our present mechanized civilization would not be the most direct way to the establishment of God's kingdom on earth.

"The freedom of the people, the workers, everybody, is our Christian goal and that is hardly attained by what many mean by 'free enterprise.'

"So long as the United States of America, in her anxiety to suppress communism, supports reactionary and Fascist elements * * * so long as she refuses to do justice to her minorities, she loses her moral right to leadership in the modern world."

I understood why, for the first time in his life, this Christian layman was in doubt about his church. In recent months I have met many other church members of numerous denominations who are similarly disturbed. They have asked:

"Is there any place for me, a businessman, in a church which promotes the idea that our American business system is inherently un-Christian? Does it make sense that I should continue to contribute from my earnings from capitalism to those who use my gifts to undermine it? What am I to think of the honesty of church leaders who, believing that capitalism is un-Christian, solicit my capitalist-produced contributions?"

I have urged these laymen to continue to support the church. I have known many of our church leaders for years. I do not know any Communists among them. I know a great many rank-and-file ministers. Most of them believe it is their business to help people to find God, to help them to get along better with themselves, their families, their associates, to encourage them to begin where they are to build a better world after Christ's pattern. Most of the preachers I know work hard and devotedly at their calling.

Yet there is evidently a determined minority whose aims, if their words mean anything, are not the aims of the church. They have maneuvered themselves into positions in our theological schools, on our church publications, on the boards of ecclesiastical organizations and into the pastorates of some of our great churches. They are not the church. But they use the church as a means through which, in the name of religion, they misrepresent and discredit America and the American economic system.

If the Protestant church believes that the American economic system is unchristian and a failure, it should say so, openly and without doubletalk. If the facts indicate that that system is and increasingly can be productive of Christian values, the church should forthrightly say that and discontinue the coddling of its pink minority.

Recently a well-known professor in one of our leading theological schools made a statement to the effect that Christianity has no stake in the survival of capitalism. I do not know how the professor got the authority to deliver Christianity's vote against capitalism. As a Christian minister, I am not voting against it. I believe that Christianity has a considerable stake in the survival of capitalism. I intend to vote for it until I see a system more favorable to Christian progress.

I believe that Christianity grows when the church does. That is why I want the kind of society which encourages the growth of all churches.

In a Fascist or Communist society, the church is suppressed or enslaved. Under Socialism it declines. The reasons, in each case, are the same. To the Christian church the supremely important value is the individual. Its great concern is his redemption and his freedom and growth. Fascism, communism, socialism, each in its own way, put the state where Christianity puts the person. The state is everything, does everything. As the state enlarges, the church inevitably diminishes.

Let us see what is happening to the church in capitalist America. Today 55 percent of all the people belong to some church. That is not enough, to be sure. But 70 years ago only 20 percent were church members; 30 years ago, only 40 percent. In the last 10 years members of the 15 leading Protestant denominations have more than doubled their giving to Christian causes. Gains for Catholics and Jews were also great. In addition, American Protestants this year have planned or are building a record number of new churches at a cost of more than $1,000,000,000.

Religion is enjoying the biggest boom it has ever had in our country—a boom made possible by an amazing upsurge of Christian devotion and generosity. That it is happening in capitalist America proves something about capitalism.

I can hear the foes of our economy say: "Sure, it proves that America is the richest country on earth." I am not ashamed of the fact that America is. I rejoice in it. In the parable of the talents, Jesus did not condemn the five-talent man for having so much or bless the one-talent man merely because he had so little. The five-talent man put his talents to good use and was commended. The one-talent man buried his talent and was condemned as a "wicked and slothful servant." The little he had was taken away and given to the servant who already had a great deal, but had proved he knew how to use it.

There seems to be a popular notion that America has become rich solely because, with the natural resources available, we couldn't avoid it. If that were true, a good many other countries, rich in natural resources, would be further along than they are. The promise of America is being fulfilled because something different took place here.

The founders of this Republic put their faith in the Christian idea that man, under God, should be his own master. They said that he is endowed by his Creator with certain unalienable rights. The securing of those rights is what they meant by freedom. Thus, the church and the social order were not divided in America—the one set against the other. On the contrary, the social order was fashioned to express the belief, preached by the church, of man's importance and his unlimited capacities.

There resulted, politically, a successful democracy. And there has been an equally notable economic success. The economic promise of our resources is being fulfilled because free men, in our free system, have worked on them. That is not only a vindication of our system. It is a vindication of Christianity.

Mankind is indebted to American capitalism. So is the church. The Christian minister should be the first to admit it.

Of course, our prayers and appeals would not bear much monetary fruit if capitalist America did not believe that religion is worth supporting. That it does so believe is largely due to the fact that the roots of our system are religious and we have expected it to produce religiously worth-while consequences. John Wesley, the founder of methodism, expressed this idea of an economic system in league with Christianity when he told his followers: "Gain all you can, save all you can, give all you can."

"Within the last 5 years," quotes the Christian Science Monitor, "the American people have performed acts of international generosity which cynics would have judged impossible for any nation." I believe this was possible for us not chiefly because we had the means but because of the strength of the idea among us that our means should be put to uses which, essentially, are Christian. As an article in Fortune points out, it is a distinctive quality of our economy that the gospel of production has never crowded out the gospel of service. I have seldom heard an American businessman speak of dollars-and-cents success as though that were an end in itself. There is great pride in the extent to which that success has been translated into increased well-being for more and more people.

The convictions one hears increasingly from business leaders were recently summed up before a meeting of Harvard Business School alumni by the head of a large corporation: "The human problems of industry are the big problems. I believe that business leadership is nothing less than a public trust, that it must offer a message of courage and hope to all people, that it can help an economically strong America lead other nations to lasting prosperity, freedom and peace."

The preacher could hardly ask for more than that. If the men who write the resolutions for some of our church assemblies would face all the facts, their expressions of social concern would include an ungrudging tribute to our system for the extent to which it has proved to be an effective instrument for human betterment.

I have read many attacks on our system. But no one attacks the standard of living which that system—helped by our Christian beliefs—has made possible. The system's enemies seem to want to persuade us to move out of this capitalist society into something which they imagine would be a Socialist paradise. But I gather they would insist on taking the fruits of capitalism with them: the highest wages, shortest hours, greatest security, and most widely shared abundance of good things, from automobiles to college educations and homes of our own. Without these capitalist fruits, socialism, even to the Socialists, would not be paradise.

As a Christian minister I want to do all I can to make capitalism more Christian. But before I join the advocates of some other system, I want to know how large a place the church and its teachings would have and how well our Christian idea of man and our hope for his progress would fare.

If, in human terms, capitalism sometimes falls short, so does the Christian church. Both are human institutions. Both, therefore, suffer from the same trouble: people. And people—not economics, politics, or social philosophy—are my first business in the Christian ministry. They were Jesus' first business.

I am not going to quit the church because I know there is some hypocrisy in it. I know there is much more that is good in it. To reduce the hypocrisy I am going to work on the hypocrites. I am not going to make war on capitalism because I know there is some paganism in it. To reduce the paganism I am going to work on the pagans.

No one claims that we have yet made America an earthly paradise. But let the church rejoice at how far, under our system, we have come. Let it rejoice at the men and women—many of whom sit in its pews on Sunday—who aim, through that system, to help us further forward. Let the minister rejoice that his is a calling to raise up more of their kind.

The Constitution of South Korea and Government Structure of South Korea—Explained by Los Angeles County Superior Court Judge Hon. Stanley Mosk

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE DOYLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 24, 1950

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, knowing that the Honorable Stanley Mosk, judge of superior court, Los Angeles County, was collecting copies of the written constitutions of the new nations given birth and created since the close of World War II, I am pleased to herewith present for your information the treatment of this timely and important subject by this distinguished jurist. The judge informed me that the document itself had been sent to him by the Minister of Justice at Seoul several months ago, by cooperation through our own State Department.

Mr. Speaker, I know you and my colleagues and all who read will appreciate this timely information from the judge who graciously allows me to give it to you. It follows:

Outbreak of the Korean war, and American-United Nations intervention, caught most Americans in a state of abysmal ignorance of the little peninsula, its life, traditions and institutions. Subsequently the press and radio have brought some information about the area, the people and their leaders.

But what of the governmental structure, the fundamental law? Since the nation was conceived by the Allies, released by the United States, and nurtured by United Nations, what manner of government has it been?

On July 12, 1948, the constitution of the democratic Republic of Korea (now popularly known as South Korea) was proclaimed in the National Assembly, composed of duly elected representatives. The basic document consists of 10 chapters containing a total of 103 articles.

According to the preamble of the constitution, the people of Korea are determined "to consolidate national unity by justice, humanity, brotherly love and the elimination of all kinds of social evils, to offer equal opportunities to every person, to provide for the fullest development of the equality of each individual in all fields of political, economic, social, and cultural life, and to promote the welfare of the people, to maintain permanent international peace, and thereby to assure security, liberty, and happiness of ourselves and our posterity."

Like our American form of government, Korea has a system of checks and balances, with executive, legislative, and judicial departments of government.

The legislative power is exercised by the National Assembly, which is composed of members "elected for 4-year terms by universal, direct, equal, and secret votes."

The executive branch of the Government consists of a President and Vice President elected by the National Assembly by secret ballot. Both are limited to two consecutive 4-year terms.

The President in turn designates the Prime Minister, with the consent of the National Assembly and the State Council, consisting of between 8 and 15 ministers.

The judicial power of the Government is vested in courts, the highest of which is the supreme court. The chief justice of the supreme court is appointed by the President with the consent of the National Assembly. The other judges, and their qualifications, and the organization of inferior courts are not prescribed in the constitution, but are left to be determined by law. The constitution does limit the tenure of judges to 10 years, but states that they "may be reappointed in accordance with the law."

An analysis of the terms of the constitution relating to social and economic problems indicates clearly that the governmental structure of South Korea is progressive and, in terms of many points of view in America, actually radical. Certainly the document cannot be said to illustrate charges of reaction and decadence hurled by North Korea Communists.

Written into the constitution is the generalization that "the principle of the economic order of the Korean Republic shall be to realize social justice, to meet the basic demands of all citizens, and to encourage the development of a balanced economy."

The following article, No. 85, provides that "mines and other important mineral resources, marine resources, water power, and other natural powers which may be utilized economically, shall be owned by the state."

In addition, farm land is required to be distributed to self-tilling farmers, the nature and manner of distribution being left to the legislative body to determine.

Article 87 of the constitution provides that "important transportation and communication enterprises, financial and insurance institutions, electricity, irrigation, water supply, gas, and any enterprises having public character shall be managed by the Government."

The Korean Constitution also provides basic civil liberties for its people, guaranteeing freedom of religion and conscience, the independence of politics from religion, freedom from unlawful search and seizure, privacy of correspondence, freedom of science and art, and due process.

The constitution further provides for equal opportunity for education, and free compulsory schooling for at least elementary education.

Article 18 maintains the right of freedom of association and collective bargaining by labor. Article 19 guarantees the right of aged and incapacitated persons to protection by the state.

Poland: The Great Betrayal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KATHARINE ST. GEORGE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 28, 1950

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by William Henry Chamberlin, in the last issue of Human Events giving the history of the betrayal of Poland. This is appropriate as on September 1 the eleventh anniversary of the invasion of Poland will be marked.

This is a black mark against our country and one that it would be well for us to remember, so that those guilty of this betrayal may be known to the American people, and not whitewashed and forgotten. The article follows:

POLAND—THE GREAT BETRAYAL
(By William Henry Chamberlin)

There is a relentless unbroken line of connection between the appeasement of Stalin which was a cardinal policy of the Roosevelt administration and the commitment of American troops to battle in Korea, under unfavorable logistical and geographical conditions, in 1950.

The most glaring example of this appeasement was Anglo-American acquiescence in the destruction of Poland's independence and territorial integrity at the Tehran and Yalta conferences and in the many intermediate diplomatic steps which made Tehran and Yalta possible. Now, as the eleventh anniversary of the beginning of World War II approaches, we should remember that the global conflict started with a German-Russian invasion of Poland.

One wonders what would have happened if the British Government, when it offered its guaranty against aggression to Poland in the spring of 1939, had added this warning:

"You must understand that this guaranty is valid only against Germany. If the Soviet Government proposes to take almost half of your territory and to impose a Communist-dominated government on what is left of Poland you cannot count on our help. On the contrary, we will make no serious effort to prevent the Soviet Government from accomplishing these designs and will even support its case against yours.

One may also speculate as to how the Yugoslav Government of 1941, pushed and prodded by the Roosevelt administration into entering an unequal struggle against Germany, would have reacted if some candid and far-sighted American diplomat had said:

"Your country will experience all the sufferings of foreign occupation. More than that, there will be a savage civil war. In this war the Moscow-trained Communist Josip Broz Tito will win the support of America and Great Britain. You and other Yugoslav non-Communist patriots will be lucky if you save your lives in exile or in obscurity at home."

And it would be interesting to know how the American people would have felt if some forthright spokesman for the administration or the State Department in 1941 had said:

"Our policy of inflexible support for Chiang Kai-shek's regime in China will almost certainly lead to war with Japan. This war will be prosecuted to the ruin of Japan and its destruction as a great power. But we will not worry about Soviet and Communist aggression against China. In fact we will bribe Stalin, at China's expense, to join in our crusade against Japan. As late as 1945 high State Department officials will be giving Communist sympathizers access to confidential information. The upshot of all this will be that China will fall under the domination of Communists, disciples of Moscow, who will show the bitterest hostility to this country."

Such things were not said by people in positions of influence in the years of decision about America's entrance into the war. But they are a faithful record of what has happened, of what a reasonably intelligent student of foreign affairs might have expected to happen.

II

The betrayal of Poland was the greatest and most flagrant of the three, because the Second World War began ostensibly over the issue of Poland's independence and territorial integrity.

The Soviet Government, in fullest agreement and complicity with the Nazi dictatorship, set out to blot Poland forever from the map of Europe. The record on this point is unmistakably clear. The Soviet-German so-called nonaggression pact of August 1939 was really a pact of mutual aggression against Poland. Its secret clauses, providing for a partition of Poland and for the inclusion of the Baltic republics in the Soviet share of the spoils, are now well known.

Molotov made the Soviet attitude plain when he declared at a session of the Soviet parliament on October 31, 1939: "Two swift blows to Poland, one from the German Army, the other from the Red Army, and nothing remained of the ugly offspring of the Versailles Treaty."

Annexing and incorporating into the Ukrainian and Byelorussian Soviet Republics almost half of Poland's territory, inhabited by about one-third of the Polish population, the Soviet Government tried to insure its position by familiar totalitarian methods. About a million and a quarter people were deported to the Soviet Union, the majority being sent to slave labor camps. When the Polish Government was able to investigate what had happened to these deportees, during the period of Soviet-Polish rapprochement which followed Hitler's invasion of Russia, it reached the conclusion that about a quarter had perished of hunger and maltreatment.

Especially sinister was the mysterious disappearance of some 10,000 Polish officer war prisoners. Letters from these men ceased abruptly in the spring of 1940. For almost two years Polish diplomatic representatives in Russia, furnished with detailed lists of names, sought vainly for information about what had become of these prisoners.

The case was repeatedly taken up with the Soviet Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and was brought to the attention of Stalin himself. At no time was it stated that the prison camp in which the officers were confined had been overrun and captured by the Germans. Only evasive and general replies were given.

This matter came to a head when the German radio announced that thousands of bodies of Polish officers had been discovered in the Katyn forest, near Smolensk, in western Russia. The Polish request that the matter be investigated by the International Red Cross was seized on by the Soviet Government as an excuse for breaking off diplomatic relations with the Polish Government. The virtual certainty that the Soviet authorities were responsible for this massacre of war prisoners was confirmed when the International Tribunal at Nuremberg, certainly not lenient in its attitude toward alleged war criminals, did not find Germans guilty of this atrocity.

III

From the time when relations were broken off with the generally recognized Polish Government in exile in London, the Kremlin stepped up its pursuit of its two main objectives in Poland. The first was to retain almost all the Polish territory which had been acquired as a result of Stalin's deal with Hitler. The second was to prepare for the new Poland, mutilated in the east, artificially enlarged in the west by the addition of regions which were overwhelmingly German in ethnic composition, a made-in-Moscow government.

Both objectives were achieved with the acquiescence or, at most, the very weak opposition of Washington and London. When Anthony Eden, as British Foreign Minister, went to Moscow in December 1941 he found Stalin inclined to demand the recognition of the annexation of eastern Poland as the price of signing an Anglo-Soviet treaty of alliance. A firmly negative attitude on the part of the American State Department blocked acceptance of this demand at that time.

But the American attitude weakened, curiously enough, as the American military position grew stronger. Less is known about the Tehran Conference, held at the end of November 1943, than about Yalta. But the comment of a Polish diplomat of long experience in the United States holds true: "Our territorial integrity was sacrificed at Tehran, our national independence at Yalta."

Certainly Churchill launched a vigorous campaign, in parliamentary speeches and in private communications to the Polish Government in exile, upholding Stalin's claim to the so-called Curzon line frontier. The factually absurd argument was used that Russia had twice been invaded by Germany through Poland and was therefore entitled to security. This overlooked the historical truth that at the time of the First World War most of Poland was part of the Russian Empire, while at the time of the Second World War, Poland's territory had been partitioned between Stalin and Hitler. In neither case was Poland in the slightest degree a partner in the German invasion of Russia.

IV

The Yalta Conference, held in February 1945, placed the final seal on the betrayal of Poland. No representative of Poland was present at this meeting. The Polish Government-in-exile, the successor of the regime with which Great Britain had concluded a treaty of alliance, was treated as nonexistent.

Stalin's territorial demands were accepted after one or two faint and unavailing pleas from Roosevelt and Churchill that the city of Lwow, culturally and ethnically Polish, and the oil wells of East Galicia should be left to Poland. The face-saving verbal assurances about free, unfettered elections and about reorganization of the Communist-dominated puppet government which entered Poland in the baggage trains of the Red army were proved empty frauds by the subsequent course of events, which led to the steady clamping down of a routine Communist dictatorship.

Apologists for the policy of appeasing Stalin which reached its climax at Yalta adopt two lines of argument. Some contend, like the late Edward Stettinius, that Yalta was really a great western victory, because Stalin made a number of promises which he broke before the ink on the Yalta documents was dry. This is about as convincing as suggesting that a man achieved a great financial triumph by accepting a large sum in worthless checks.

Somewhat more intellectually respectable is the argument that America and Britain needed Soviet military aid and could not effectively restrain Stalin's moves in eastern Europe. This line of reasoning, however, overlooks the fact that the Soviet Union was more dependent for its own security on maintaining the coalition than was the United States. There was certainly no valid moral or political reason why the United States and Great Britain should have actively cooperated in the territorial mutilation of Poland and in recognizing a government that was a complete negation of Atlantic Charter principles and violently hostile to the West.

Today's headlines from Korea furnish eloquent, decisive proof that the wartime appeasement of Stalin was a practical failure as well as a confession of moral bankruptcy.

More About Republican Advance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 26, 1950

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, Raymond Moley, in Newsweek, issue of July 31, 1950, has an enlightening discussion regarding the so-called Republican advance movement. It is entitled "Republican Advance and the ADA" and should be read by all Members of Congress, and especially those who fell for Russell Davenport's efforts to destroy the two-party system of government. Under permission to extend my remarks, I include Raymond Moley's article:

REPUBLICAN ADVANCE AND THE ADA

(By Raymond Moley)

The belief prevails in the minds of several sharp political observers in Washington that the so-called Republican advance is a part of a general plan inspired by the left-wing Americans for Democratic Action to infiltrate both major parties with promoters of more and more Government and less and less personal liberty.

Coincidences favoring this theory were pointed out as early as last April by Frank C. Hanighen in his shrewd weekly newsletter titled "Not Merely Gossip." He noted that at the very moment when the ADA was meeting in Washington early in April, several members of and sympathizers with that group broke out with a rash of articles telling the Republican Party what it must do to be saved. Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., Marquis Childs, and Herbert Agar were mentioned. Later there appeared Eleanor Roosevelt's piece, If I were a Republican Today, probably written in April.

The ADA, meanwhile, adopted a platform affirming its political independence and promising to work for candidates of whatever party, so long as they agreed with the ADA.

Meanwhile, Robert S. Allen, another good reporter, spotted and published an account of a private get-together of liberal Republicans in Washington, of which Russell Davenport was the chief mover. Allen reported that Davenport was intent upon a Republican ADA. Senator MORSE sounded off on his favorite theme of maverickism, which is political anarchy—everyone for himself rather than the party.

All this offers some relieving humor for dark days. Here are people who have devoted most of their lives to discrediting the Republican Party and to perpetuating the Federal machine role of the Roosevelt and Truman administrations. Can they really want the Republican Party to succeed? Yes; on their own terms. But since the Republican Party is still the refuge of sincere conservatives, it is clear that it never can win on those terms. Hence, the conclusion is inescapable that the end of this strategy would be Republican frustration. Then the Nation would be dominated by a Democratic Federal administration.

After some preliminaries in Rhode Island and other States, the Davenport efforts brought together in Philadelphia a group of Republicans from 10 States. The name selected for the group was the "Republican Advance," and on July 1 a long and windy document appeared.

Almost every real issue is buried in generalities. But specifically, civil rights were stressed. The terms used on this issue could serve for an ADA or Truman declaration.

The Republican Advance editorially is against the Truman-Ewing plan for Government medicine. But it carefully sidesteps the Taft alternative for Federal aid to States for medical aid. It therefore endorses the Flanders-Ives bill, under which the Federal Government would subsidize and probably finally absorb voluntary plans as the Blue Cross and Blue Shield. This is merely seeking a back door for Government invasion of private and cooperative medicine.

Davenport's willingness to serve as a Republican Moses is a wry piece of humor. When he was associated with the late Wendell Willkie, the inference could be drawn that he, like Willkie himself, was acting as the official opposition to the Republican Party. In 1944 he was the moving spirit of Republicans for Roosevelt.

The present movement would hardly be notable, except for the strange editorial sympathy of a few newspapers and the approval of the Advance principles by a handful of Republican Senators and Congressmen. Perhaps, being politicians, the latter are willing to approve anything ambiguous. Certainly, they have not considered what this sort of thing might do to their party.

For while Davenport and his associates may be sincere visionaries, their proposal is inimical to the maintenance of a party that, despite defeats, can still stand for conservative principles. If the Advance should succeed, which fortunately is impossible, it could well kill the Republican Party. A party, like a person, is just as dead when it is the victim of a sincere blunder as when it is blasted by its enemies.

Prize Winning Essay by California Young Democrat Is Entitled "Why I Am a Young Democrat"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE DOYLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 16, 1950

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, the following essay was prize winner in a recent national contest sponsored by the two major political parties. The author of this essay, Darrell P. McCrory, is 27 years old; a member of the Los Angeles Council of Young Democrats and an assistant city attorney of Los Angeles City.

As it speaks for itself, Mr. Speaker, I just wish to observe that it cannot but be invigorating to both political parties, Democratic and Republican, to have these younger men and women in our various States, compete on such topics. I have not yet observed the one written by the young Republican but I look forward to doing so.

For, Mr. Speaker, these younger people are far more important than those of us who are twice or thrice as old. Why? Because they have so much more time than we have in terms of years, to learn in and to serve our great Nation in.

Whether Democrat or Republican the splendid development of these essay contests is apparent and their results to analytical, sound, vigilant thinking and decision is clear-cut and determination for soundness and security in our national experience. The prize essay follows:

I am a Young Democrat because I want to play a part in the forces which will affect the destinies of my generation. More today than ever before, our governments, State and National, play an important part in shaping our lives. Basically, the political parties formulate the policies which become government policy. By taking an active part in a political party I can help to shape the governmental policies which will have such a great influence on the lives of all of us.

I have chosen to work within the Democratic Party because that party is not dedicated to any doctrine, whether laissez-faire or collectivism, as an end in itself. Instead it has sought to advocate such programs and policies which will insure the highest degree of freedom and security for the American people. Performance has been the sole test. In the major segments of our economy, the Democratic Party maintained and encouraged our great system of free enterprise. This system has given many of us the highest standard of living in the world.

FOSTERED SOCIAL SECURITY

However, the Democratic Party has felt free to turn elsewhere in those segments of our economy where a policy of free enterprise has not been entirely successful. The Democratic Party has given us a Government-supported farm program to replace the Republican laissez-faire program of agriculture which wrecked the rural economy in the 1920's and early 1930's.

The Democratic Party recognized that a free-enterprise economy alone could not provide our workers with a high degree of economic security. It fostered the social-security program, a program of unemployment compensation, and labor legislation which has done much to remove the feeling of insecurity from those who must work in our factories and shops to make a living. The Democratic Party has recognized that free enterprise has not been able to adequately house all of our people, nor has it been able to adequately distribute medical care to all those who are in need of it. Therefore, it is advocating governmental programs to alleviate these shortcomings.

OPPOSES ISOLATION

In the field of foreign affairs the Democratic Party has always fostered a program of international cooperation. From its inception it has advocated a low tariff policy; it put into effect the reciprocal-trade program. These policies have sought to foster economic well-being in the world as a whole. More recently, the European economic recovery plan and the Atlantic Pact, fostered by the present Democratic administration, are evidence to the world that we as a Nation have abandoned isolationism and that we are accepting a position of world leadership. Based on its record, the Democratic Party will eventually lead us toward a limited form of world government.

All vital Government programs must first be political programs put forward by a political party. It is because I want to have a part in molding the program of Government that will affect me that I have become a Young Democrat.

Lindsay C. Warren

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE R. HOEY
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, August 29 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HOEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a very splendid article appearing in the News and Observer, Raleigh, N. C., on Sunday, August 27, 1950, relating to the Comptroller General of the United States, Lindsay C. Warren.

Mr. Warren formerly served for many years as a Member of the House of Representatives and obtained great distinction as the Representative from the First District of North Carolina. Since his appointment as Comptroller General he has added to his high reputation for patriotic devotion to his country and has rendered outstanding service in this important capacity. He officially represents an agency which is the arm of the Congress and therefore I think it is most appropriate to have inserted in the RECORD this tribute to him.

There being no objection the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TAR HEEL OF THE WEEK—LINDSAY C. WARREN
(By Jack Riley)

Profiteers who made millions filching the Government during World War II will not do it during another war. A beetle-browed North Carolinian with a foghorn voice stands between them and the United States Treasury.

He is Lindsay Carter Warren, 60-year-old former Congressman now serving as Comptroller General of the United States. He has richly earned the more common title "watchdog of Federal spending."

A writer once described him thus: "Warren is tough. His speech smarts. Spray salts his face. Memories of Blackbeard the Pirate light his eyes. He's a lusty skipper straight from the stormy banks of North Carolina."

The reference to Blackbeard was apt; for Warren has uncovered present-day pirates in the guise of patriots who make Blackbeard look like a piker. His 10 years' bossing the General Accounting Office—biggest auditing office in the World—have tracked down and returned over $700,000,000 to the United States Treasury.

ALSO PROTECTS CITIZENS

His job also demands protecting citizens who deal with Uncle Sam. Each year he settles a half million such claims. Some are fantastic. Once, for instance, a rural lady wrote: "I wish to file claim against the Government for personal injuries received when a defective privy, constructed by the WPA under Government supervision, relapsed with me." She was answered firmly but kindly.

Such claimants worry him far less than the big boys who filch the Government through legal loopholes. With thunder in his booming voice and power behind his 200-pound bulk, big Lindsay Warren wades into them, fighting what he likes to consider the individual taxpayer's battle against thieves. He has been doing public battle ever since he got out of law school as a youngster and turned to politics.

The taxpayers love him for it, too, especially in the First Congressional District which he served for 16 years.

HEADS BACK HOME

Nothing pleases him more than to grab a 10-year-old fishing hat and flee from the clatter of calculating machines. He invariably heads for home and fishing jaunts between Currituck and Oracoke. His fishing partners are Marine Cen. Hal Turnage, United States Marshal Ford Worthy, and Col. George Combs of the Baltimore Sun.

Warren knows every nook and cranny of the outer banks, as well as their history and legend. He knows most of the people and they know him. He holes up frequently at Nags Head, where his fishing trips are like fiestas. Friends and neighbors flock in to see him. Every lighthouse keeper is his crony. Coast Guard boys rank him second only to God. God takes care of them at sea, and Warren on land.

His passion for fishing is rivaled by his love for football. He will rise early and drive hundreds of miles to see Carolina play.

Fish is his favorite food and he says Maryland terrapin is "the only sea food north of the Potomac worth eating," and that comes from North Carolina.

He avoids the Washington social whirl in favor of quiet evenings with close friends at his home in Chevy Chase, Md. He is the center of a closely knit family. Sons Lindsay, Jr., and Charles are following in his footsteps at Carolina Law School. He has one daughter, Mrs. Emily Warren Jones of Lynchburg, Va., and a 2-year-old granddaughter, Diana. Mrs. Warren is the former Emily Harris. They were married January 28, 1916.

LOVES HOME

Life in Washington, D. C., never dimmed his urge to return to Washington, N. C., where he was born December 16, 1889. His home faces the mile-wide Pamlico River and that remains his favorite anchorage.

As a boy he roamed the river as city youngsters today roam the street. He lived with boats and fishing tackle, and the sound of the waves was soothing to his soul. He quickly learned to take care of himself in foul weather.

At 13 he shoved off for Bingham Academy in Asheville, where half the boys were Texans. He finished Bingham in 1906 and attended the University of North Carolina for the next two years. He didn't graduate. His father died, money ran low and Lindsay Warren left school to work in a bank.

RICH ANCESTRY

But barrister corpuscles pulsed through his blueblood veins. One of his great grandfathers signed the Constitution. Another uncle was an early Governor of Tennessee. A forebear of 1776 was a great judge. His grandfather Edward J. Warren was one of North Carolina's outstanding judges. His father, Charles F. Warren, was a distinguished lawyer, helped to organize the North Carolina Bar Association and became its second president. It was natural that Warren used his bank job to finance an education in law. He returned to the university in 1911-12 to study law and was admitted to the bar in 1912. Thirty-four years later, University of North Carolina conferred an LL. D. on him.

Law led to politics and Warren was elected county attorney of Beaufort County as a comparative youngster. His career moved swiftly thereafter. He served as president pro tempore of the State senate, keynoter of the Democratic State convention, delegate to a Democratic National Convention, trustee of the university, member of the constitutional commission.

With a term in the House and two in the State Senate to his credit, he ran for Congress in 1924 and won the Democratic nomination hands down against four opponents. For the next 16 years, he had no opposition whatever. The explanation as one old associate put it: "Lindsay conducted politics on personal contacts, not issues. He knew every voter by his first name. Every chance he gets he rushes back home to North Carolina."

OTHER CALLS

Occupied with a distinguished career in the House, Warren turned a deaf ear to the ceaseless drum beat at home. It went, Warren for Governor, Warren for Senator, Warren for anything.

Warren arrived in Washington while Texan John Nance Garner's star was ascending. They became fast friends and when Garner became Speaker, Warren became a potent member of the kitchen cabinet. Garner's favorite reference was: "That boy will stand hitched. If I were going to rob a bank, I would want Lindsay Warren at my side, for I would know he would never run away from me." After Garner moved to the Senate as Vice President, Warren was one of a few who ran the House under Senators Byrnes and Bankhead.

Twice he was elected Speaker pro tempore and served a week at the time twice while Speaker Bankhead was ill. He presided over more important legislation than any 50 Members, including establishment of the FEC. He demonstrated ability as a parliamentarian and his decisions still are cited in the House as precedents.

REMEMBERED OWN DISTRICT

He never forgot his First North Carolina District, and every county in it today can see his handiwork. Small pleas were never brushed aside. He sponsored the Roanoke Colony memorial coin, the Virginia Dare postage stamp, the Cape Hatteras National Seashore Park, the Wright Memorial at Kitty Hawk and so much seagoing legislation he won the sobriquet, "Admiral of the Coast Guard."

President Roosevelt rewrote Warren's reorganization bill so as to lather the General Accounting Office for the razor. The GAO had been regarded as a habitual stumblebum which had called down the ax upon itself. But Warren said, "No."

He told the President: "If GAO is cut out, the bill will never become law."

His stand stayed execution of GAO, but the agency continued to flounder, moving ineptly along, first brusque and then timid. Warren's fight for it perhaps accounts for his presence as its director today. He tried to avoid the job. He refused it in 1936, again in 1938, and four times in 1940. He was getting accustomed to say "No" to the President of the United States.

FINALLY ACCEPTED

"I'm not an auditor, nor an accountant. In fact, I'm utterly unqualified," he would mutter. Roosevelt persisted. To his fifth appeal in 1940, Warren mumbled a gutteral assent.

The Senate paid him an unusual tribute by instantly confirming his appointment in gl wing terms without the usual reference of the nomination to a committee.

Confirmed July 31, 1940, he remained in the House until he took the oath as Comptroller General on November 1. Meanwhile his friend Speaker Bankhead died, and Warren was appointed acting majority leader. Had he remained in Congress, he undoubtedly would have been elected to that position. Life magazine picked him as one of the 10 ablest Members of the House.

The Office of Comptroller General began with George Washington's administration and carries the longest term of any governmental officer outside the judiciary. He is appointed for 15 years and cannot be reappointed. To recent suggestions that he be made eligible for reappointment, Warren said he would oppose it.

Both Presidents Hoover and Roosevelt had tried to abolish GAO.

His appointment was a signal that President Roosevelt had abandoned his fight to destroy the GAO. With characteristic vigor, Warren set about to make the office click. He made Frank Yates his assistant, opened windows swept out dust and introduced incentive. Where he discovered unused brains, he put them to work.

NEW LIFE INJECTED

Wellington Brink wrote for Hollands magazine in 1946. "The massive red brick sepulcher at Fifth and F Streets began to glow as it hadn't since the old gay days before Taft, when it had been a regular scene of inaugural balls. Warren began to note happily, 'There's right much humanity in this office'."

Right much efficiency went with that humanity.

Warren weeded out hidebound and antiquated methods. Appointed by the President but responsible only to Congress, he is the most independent official in Washington. His office is nonpartisan and nonpolitical. He has never inquired as to the political affiliation of one of the 7,500 persons in the department.

His independence and his duty to watch every Federal expenditure easily could make him the loneliest man in Washington, but his jovial good nature and forthright honesty prevent it. He doesn't pretend to be always right, but when he takes up an issue, he makes it stick.

STOOD HOOVER DOWN

For instance, when the Hoover Commission overstepped its assignment to study the executive branch and recommended transfer of GAO to the Treasury Department, Warren started swinging. Last February, he and Hoover appeared before the Senate Committee on Expenditures.

The Hoover-Warren head-on collision was a corker. Hoover made his stock argument that no agent of Congress should hold the power vested in the Comptroller General. Warren tossed aside his prepared statement and answered the former President word for word. Overwhelmed by his argument, the committee voted unanimously with Warren.

Warren's point was easy to understand. In 10 years, GAO has detected, collected, and turned back to the United States Treasury $700,000,000 that had been either illegally or erroneously paid out.

Warren despises procurement officers who allow themselves to be entertained by war contractors. He holds himself aloof from the faintest suspicion of favor or privilege.

One Christmas, 10 good friends in GAO took up a collection to buy him a deep-freeze unit for his catches of fish. When it arrived at his Chevy Chase home, Mrs. Warren held it up until she telephoned her husband. The wires fairly melted as Warren denounced the gift. Later he dressed down the ringleader in classic phrases. The refrigerator went back, and the chastened ringleader returned the money collected for it.

When Congress summons Warren to the Hill, he usually drives his own car rather than cost the Government a 30-cent taxi fare.

He has ceaselessly campaigned against what he calls the mumbo-jumbo of Government language. His own language is short, sharp, and to the point. He strongly supported the recently enacted Federal Records Management Act to stop creation of needless records, dispose of useless ones and make sensible use of those which are needed.

One of his greatest battles was to improve and modernize Government accounting and financial reporting. Three years ago, the Comptroller General sat down with John W. Snyder, Secretary of the Treasury, and James E. Webb, then Director of the Budget, to write what then was called the joint accounting program. It took months of arguing and knocking heads together to enact it, but now the results are taking. Warren spearheaded the act and testified before committees. The House passed it in 2 hours and the Senate unanimously passed it.

"Only Lindsay Warren could get a bill like this through the House without an opposing vote," said one Member. It gave the Old Eagle Eye much more power, strengthening his hand against waste.

His own office sets an example against waste. During the war it mushroomed to 15,000 employees. Warren has voluntarily cut it back to 7,800. When the 1951 omnibus appropriation bill was before the Senate committee, Warren appeared and asked them to cut the GAO appropriation $2,000,000 below the House figure. He said not to get the idea he had overestimated his need but that since the House action, he had effected economies to save that much. Senators gaped in amazement. Such things as voluntary budget cuts just didn't happen.

Expenditures policed by the Comptroller General range from a $42,000,000,000 item by the Army down to a mere pittance. All get withering scrutiny, but Warren doesn't tolerate picayunishness. Spending $100 to audit $25 items is out. Contrarily, he never turns back once he smells a rat.

Rats were plentiful during the war, great big, pot-bellied rats robbing the United States Treasury under the guise of war contractors. Good-natured Warren exploded:

"Certain contracting officers are dishing out and giving away the property and money of the United States with careless abandon. Some are capable and efficient; some are highly inept and inefficient; and some have been found to be plain crooks and thieves." He called the cost-plus method of contracting "the greatest device ever invented for pumping money out of the Treasury."

APPALLING DISCOVERIES

His discoveries were appalling. One aircraft manufacturer used parts already purchased by the Government from another contractor for $10,000,000 but neglected to credit the Government with that amount. Another company charged the Government over $1,000,000 it already had been paid. One bill was overpaid by $135,000, another by $222,000 and still another for $20,000 was paid twice. The Comptroller General got these moneys back.

Waste and incompetence is so widespread and flagrant, Warren says, that finding examples is child's play. At random, he cites a few:

Failure of a Chicago agency to collect rent for Government property used by a contractor for a cafeteria, $6,019; commission paid to a dealer for a canceled sale, $1,647; one division paid a bill twice, $20,250, and the same division did the same stunt again for $1,078; carelessness of a Government inspector who accepted what was supposed to be a 25-ton crane but later was found to be an 11-ton crane, $6,534; paid for tires that were smaller than the kind billed, $2,160; neglect to collect on land-purchase program, $15,264; failure to deduct cost of transportation included in contract price, $1,110.

There is a story that Warren is so watchful he once cut the fixed fee of the contractor for the atomic bomb from the $1 called for in the contract to 67 cents because the bomb was completed in 2 years rather than the specified 3.

Literally tens of thousands of instances of unbelievable waste and carelessness are turned up. In Alaska, for instance, the War Department paid $2,619 for the rental, for 5 months, of two tractors that cost $500 each when brand new. The owners collected $1,619 more than the cost of the tractors, and still owned them.

These are things Warren deals with every day. A weaker man might surrender in utter disgust.

He appeared before countless committees during the war to warn that independent audit of proposed billion-dollar war-contract settlements was essential to prevent millions in loss. A gimmick in the Contract Settlement Act of 1944, however, hamstrung the GAO into virtual impotence against war crooks. His efforts, however, should prevent a recurrence of such losses.

"I am not a reformer nor a crusader," he says, "but I have insisted that we use just a little ordinary common decency in the expenditure of these vast sums of money."

His reign over the largest auditing house in the world will end in 1955. Lindsay Warren has proved its vital importance beyond question. Apparently he will be glad to retire.

His favorite expression is: "If I can serve out my term, I am going back home and will then sign a bond never to come north of the Potomac River again."

America Is Challenged

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 29 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix to the RECORD a provocative address made last evening by Brig. Gen. David Sarnoff before the national encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars in Chicago. General Sarnoff's speech dealt generally with the challenge which world events today present to America, and specifically with the need for more effective selling of our country to the people of the world. I do not agree with some of his recommendations, particularly those with respect to universal military training, nor do I have much confidence in the present-day efficacy of the Voice of America, for the simple reason that there are relatively few receiving sets of the right kind in the areas in which we are most anxious that our message be heard. If we could bypass the masters in the Kremlin by means of adequate receiving sets in Soviet Russia and the iron curtain countries, the United States might do a terrific job of selling America.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICA IS CHALLENGED

(By Brig. Gen. David Sarnoff)

The patriotism, the high ideals, and the fine spirit of fraternity that characterize the Veterans of Foreign Wars make it a great pleasure to join you in your Fifty-first National Encampment.

In these days of international crisis, it is fitting that this organization should renew its pledge "to preserve and defend the United States from all her enemies, whomsoever."

At no time in our history have we been so gravely challenged, as we are today, to safeguard the traditions and principles of human freedom that have made our Nation great. This is a time for clear analysis and calm appraisal, for careful planning and for positive action.

The time has passed for treading softly in fear of offending the Politburo; for protocol or compromise. The days of diplomatic pussyfooting are over. The sands of patience in the American hour glass are running low.

Communism is spreading its insidious propaganda relentlessly over many parts of an anxious world. Red fascism threatens destruction to life and liberty, and an end to human progress.

I need not tell you, as veterans who have served your country in either, or both, of two world wars, that our Nation and freedom-loving people everywhere are imperiled by this threat. Our salvation as a nation, the preservation of the American way of life and the progress of civilization are now dependent on our power to curb aggression and to stem the tide of international communism.

To quote an illustrious President of the United States—Grover Cleveland—we have a condition before us, not a theory.

Day by day, since the end of World War II, we have witnessed events which, in their bold and devastating aims, have made it clear that the time has come for the concentrated development of our resources—spiritual, industrial, and military. Scattered and unplanned effort will not be effective enough to meet the challenge.

The leaders of the Kremlin have left no doubt that they intend to impose their will on all mankind; not through peaceful persuasion, but by lying, intrigue, infiltration, sabotage, and force. In such a crisis, it is foolish to parry the thrusts of the aggressor with our fingers. Thus we only injure our fingers and do not hurt the enemy. Should it later become necessary to fight with our fists, the injured fingers would make our fists impotent. We must courageously formulate and pursue bold policies on a global scale. In psychological, as in military warfare, defensive strategy alone rarely leads to victory.

The tactics of the Kremlin—the heart of Communist aggression—are clear. They are based on the old slogan, "divide and conquer." By diverting our forces first to one pressure point and then to another, they hope to scatter our strength into ineffectiveness.

The major question is: What next?

Some seem to believe the answer can come only from the Kremlin. I do not believe that. We have picked up the challenge in Korea, and while you and I deplore the loss of life and the general destruction that is now taking place in that unfortunate country, we may thank Providence for a timely awakening to the imminent danger. The stark realism of the Communist aggression has stirred us from an almost suicidal complacency.

America has never stood before the world as a military nation. It is part of the fundamental character of our people to love peace, to be optimistic, to hope for the best, to want to live and to let live. Witness the extent to which we have permited American Communists to spread their evil doctrines among our own people, to advocate openly the same poisonous ideas that have brought strife and misery to other sections of the globe.

Until Communist armies shocked the world by the invasion of South Korea 2 months ago, communism had made its conquests chiefly through political terror. Korea today is proof that the Red leaders are prepared to use military force where their political action fails to achieve their ends. But for Korea, we, as a nation, would have remembered too late that "forewarned is forearmed."

The Communists smother the truth with their falsehoods. Through radio and television, the motion picture and the printed word, we have a great opportunity to reveal the truth to the rest of the world. We must expose the lies and spike the false propaganda that come from behind the iron curtain.

We have worked out a new formula against the big lie invented by Hitler, practiced by Goebbels, and now employed by Stalin and Malik. Our formula is the big truth. As I said the other day at the University of Chicago Round Table Conference, we must tell the big truth about the big lie.

If truth is incapable of overtaking the lie, then there is something seriously wrong with our whole structure of life. But we can reassure ourselves: the truth will prevail; it must prevail. It is the foundation of democracy, and it is the basis of our belief.

Communist propaganda exploits hunger and misery to advance its evil crusade. It promises fulfillment of the legitimate aspirations of the masses. But, what has it brought them instead? Purges and executions; forced labor and police terror; civil war and starvation. Communism makes a mockery of freedom and justice, enslaves its victims and destroys their hopes.

We must expose and denounce the dictators and masters of these betrayed people. At the same time, we should bring them a clear message of hope. We must help these victims to unshackle their chains of slavery and to achieve their own liberation. We must speak to them as people, as man to man—and as good neighbors across a garden fence—not in a weak voice across the hemispheres.

Effective propaganda is inseparable from effective national policy. The Voice of America can state but it cannot create the policies of America. The mind must guide the tongue. If our national policies are hesitant and confused, they can only convey a sense of weakness and uncertainty. Any life line that is offered must be made of stronger stuff.

In a world that is far from settled, where peace is a hope but not yet a reality, our policies and plans must be made and remade to fit the fluid situation. This calls for national unity at home if we are to reflect it abroad. Now is the time for a moratorium on politics. I do not mean that we should stop constructive criticism, for it is a necessary element in any free society. It can aid our Government and our leaders in all fields of endeavor. It can aid the whole world.

What we need is a closer and a stronger link between the brains of America and the brawn of America. The best brains in our country, regardless of political affiliations, are needed to help solve the pressing problems in this time of trouble and to defeat the cunning of the enemy in a cold war or a hot war. Today, as you are well aware, the cold war is rapidly warming up.

Let us not worry at this crucial moment about the dangers of a brain trust. A democracy can deal with it when necessary. But it cannot cope with the perils to the Nation that can come from a brain rust or a brain bust.

If another world war should come, we know that the enemy will be Russia, seat of international communism, of dictatorship and ruthless power politics. Since World War II, Russia has built up a vast military force of men and machines, compelling obedience under the cloak of internal political action upon one satellite nation after another. This is Russia's record at a time when all the rest of the world looked hopefully toward peace.

The record is clear that world conquest is the aim of Russian communism. We have but to recall the tragic subjugation of the Baltic countries; of Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Rumania, Yugoslavia, and Bulgaria in Europe; and of China in the Far East. At this very moment our own soldiers, sailors, and airmen, under the banner of the United Nations, are waging a bitter war in Korea to save another free people from the ever-widening circle of conquests by the Reds.

Under these circumstances, our sudden awakening to the danger that lurks behind the Iron Curtain is a reassuring fact. Another fact, and one that should inspire us with confidence for the future, is the constantly expanding industrial might of the United States. It is beyond comparison with that of any other nation.

It is heartening to know that in this moment of peril our economy has reached heights undreamed of even in the peak of production during World War II. If there is anything that should give pause to would-be aggressors it is America's capacity to produce—and to fight. Kaiser Wilhelm, Fuehrer Hitler and Il Duce Mussolini, learned their lessons too late. Marshal Stalin is wasting his time in studying a new syllabus on philology; he should study military history.

The ambitious Russian program is based upon resources that do not begin to compare with those of the United States. The history of Russia is marked by political, agricultural and industrial ineptitude. Until recent years, she was a backward nation in all three categories and is still far behind the United States in science, in agriculture and in industry. Even with the help of her satellites, Russia does not grow enough food to meet her own requirements.

Until lately, the industrial development of Russia was almost negligible compared with that of England, France, Germany, and the United States. The leaders of the Kremlin have followed one 5-year-plan wtih another in the last three decades, but so far there is no proof that the Soviets have achieved any leadership in industrial capacity; nor have they ever been noted for scientific achievement or technological "know-how." Most of their major industries have been built up largely through the help of experts from other nations. The world knows how Russia obtained the secrets of the atom bomb.

To support her industry, Russia has a relatively small transportation system. Vast though her land area is, the Soviet railroad mileage is only about one-third that of the United States. Moreover, Russia has no great web of motor highways.

Nevertheless, it would be hazardous for us to underestimate the Soviet military potential. It is believed that Russia is presently able to put about 200 divisions on the field of battle. Since the end of World War II, her ability to equip and supply these divisions has been greatly increased by control of the satellite industrial nations of eastern Europe. Moreover, there is no reason to doubt that Russia is producing the atom bomb.

When you add to these factors their devilish cunning in the political arena, their disregard for international law, their distortion and disavowal of agreements, and the likelihood of striking the first blow, when they are ready to do so, the present Soviet leaders represent the greatest threat ever faced by freemen.

We can take courage, however, when we appraise our own strength—both as a great agricultural and industrial power and as a people imbued with the spirit of democracy and individual human dignity. The vast resources of the United States, if handled wisely, should be capable of meeting the challenge we face.

Let us look at our own picture. The agricultural economy of the United States has been developed to a point where we can meet the requirements of our own population and help our friends abroad. From this agrarian activity has sprung the largest food processing industry in the world.

The country's output of goods and services is now running at the staggering rate of $270,000,000,000 a year—an all-time record for America's industrial supremacy.

The electrical industry has reached a generating capacity of 68,000,000 kilowatts per hour—nearly twice the total we had only 10 years ago.

Our steel production is greater today than that of all the rest of the world combined, including Russia.

In the automotive field no other country approaches our capacity to produce 9,000,000 motor vehicles a year.

Substantially the same story can be told about radio, aviation, rubber, textiles, chemicals, and other major components of our industrial economy.

Allned with these vast enterprises are unmatched systems of transportation and communication.

The American industrial machine, already huge, underwent enormous expansion during World War II. Existing plants were enlarged and new ones built. To such war implements as ships, airplanes, tanks, and guns the United States applied the techniques of mass production. Never before were such tremendous quantities of equipment manufactured in so short a time. We supplied not only our own Armed Forces, but those of our allies as well.

In the 5 years since that war our industrial capacity has continued to expand. At the same time, scientific research has been widely extended and new laboratory facilities have been provided.

We learned during World War II that no nation can remain strong if it slackens even for an instant its interest in science. Progress in this field has put America at the forefront and has tremendously strengthened our national defense.

The electronics industry is an outstanding example of the part research plays in our national security. American scientists have pioneered in this field for more than 30 years. Today more than 90 percent of homes in the United States are equipped with one or more broadcast receivers, and radio has become one of the Nation's major industries.

Aside from communications, the electron tube has added immeasurably to the speed and efficiency of America's industrial machine. While serving the Nation in peace, the radio-electronics industry was aware of its vital importance in time of war. With the rapid advance of the airplane, tanks, and other motorized vehicles, only radio and electronics could provide the communications necessary for the strategy and tactics of modern warfare.

You may recall the outstanding contribution to victory made by radar, the proximity fuze, and the infrared "eyes" that could see in the dark. There were under-water sound detectors and long-range navigational devices. When the war ended, radio-controlled flying missiles equipped with television "eyes" were making their appearance on the battle fronts.

Radar, rated second only to the atom bomb as the greatest scientific development during World War II, is the strongest evidence of the value of a major peacetime industry to a nation at war. About $4,000,000,000 worth of radar equipment was supplied to the United States Government during the war.

The expansion of radio and electronic activities during and since the war has been phenomenal. The number of manufacturers in this industry in 1940 was 425. Today, it is 1,200. The value of the industry's peacetime products was a half billion dollars in 1939 compared with the present peacetime rate of two and one-half billion dollars. This is an increase in production of 500 percent.

Most of the electronic industry's postwar expansion has occurred under the impetus of television's remarkable growth. By the end of this year, there will be approximately 10,000,000 television receivers in as many American homes. This means a potential daily audience of between 35,000,000 and 40,000,000 persons. Most of these people live in the great population centers of the Nation. Through television, they form a powerful nucleus for concerted action in time of emergency; for television is one of our greatest mediums for the dissemination of information, instruction, and training.

If we had international television today—and I believe we shall have it within the next 5 years—the Voice of America would be the Voice and Vision of America. What a powerful weapon of propaganda that would give us. For then the whole world would see what millions of American televiewers saw—the wonder of the UN sessions at Lake Success—and the arrogant filibuster of President Malik would have been its own most effective antidote for the Russian propaganda.

Should war come, television will be a vital factor in communications on land sea, and in the air. No matter where a battle is waged, it can be under the eyes of television and may be viewed by the military strategists even across the sea. It is within the range of possibility that the public will watch the action on battlefields while sitting at home in front of television sets.

American industry—of which radio and electronics are a part—represents a great force for peace and a mighty power in war. At this moment our Nation is being alerted. Should the need arise for full-scale war production, you may be sure that our industries know how to convert their products into the necessary weapons of war. American industry and labor will respond in the future as they have in the past, with patriotism and skill.

The story I have been telling you is a part of the big truth about America. It is the story of unmatched agricultural, scientific, and industrial achievement; of opportunities for individual initiative that develop under the free-enterprise system; of national teamwork; of social and economic progress.

But this is not the whole story. The spiritual part of America is even more important. Our freedoms to worship as we please, to think and to speak, to listen and to look, to work and to live where we choose, are precious privileges of our peaceful way of life. All these now are threatened by the enemies of freedom.

Experience has proven that our people want to know the facts and are not afraid to learn the truth. Americans expect their Government to lead the Nation and the world in this time of peril; to formulate sound policies and to prepare practical plans to meet the political, military, and industrial requirements of a menacing situation—a situation that may compel us to wage war on a global scale.

Our foreign policy, I suggest, should provide that subject to suitable controls and practical safeguards, Japan and west Germany will be permitted and assisted to rearm, to the extent that these two countries fit into the over-all plan of resisting Russian aggression.

On the home front, I would urge that we establish immediately universal military training.

Further, we should put high on the list of priorities, a thorough protection against sabotage, which could prove worse than a battle lost.

We must develop promptly a comprehensive system of civilian defense. Public knowledge that such protection exists will allay fear and keep us fit to do our job.

The challenge America now faces makes it imperative that the policies we formulate and the plans we develop shall provide adequate preparedness, in time to be effective. Not by words, but by actions, can we establish our security.

Americans, now as always, will respond to the Nation's call. When its freedom is endangered, America, springing to action, is unbeatable.

Russia Has Our Ships

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, the Russians still have our ships and they have been continuously using them since May 8, 1945, to make themselves strong in their march to force communism on the rest of the world. I am including a news item from the Fremont News-Messenger, of Fremont, Ohio:

WEICHEL CHARGES SOVIET USING UNITED STATES SHIPS TO SUPPLY KOREANS—SANDUSKIAN REITERATES DEMAND THAT RUSSIANS RETURN LOANED CRAFT

WASHINGTON, August 11.—Representative WEICHEL, of Ohio, Thirteenth District Congressman, said today that Russia is using American ships borrowed during World War II to carry military supplies to North Korea.

The Sanduskian added that he is renewing his demands for more energetic efforts to recover hundreds of United States warships and merchant vessels from the Soviet Union.

"They are using the merchant ships to haul cargo that is being used against our forces fighting in Korea," WEICHEL told a reporter. "There is plenty of evidence of that.

"We don't know how they are using the warships. The Navy recently said it had heard a fleet of about 800 large and small Soviet vessels was in Asiatic waters—a pretty menacing thing to my mind—and I just wonder how many of them belong to us."

GOT HIS REPORT

Russia's delay in returning the loaned ships is an old sore spot with WEICHEL. He had a House Merchant Marine Committee subpena served on the then Secretary of State, George Marshall, in 1948, contending the State Department had withheld information he asked about the ships. He got the requested report.

"As far as I can learn," WEICHEL said today, "the Russians still have nearly 100 of our merchant ships and more than 300 of our naval vessels, some of them large ones."

WEICHEL said he would detail his contentions in a statement to the House next week, and "I'm preparing a letter to the State Department now."

The Ohioan said "every one" of the cargo ships has made one or more trips to United States ports under a Russian flag to pick up American cargo.

WANTS ANSWER

"I'm demanding to know why they were not seized then, and how we contemplate getting them back now," he added.

He said he has information that one of the vessels "just a few days ago, while loading in Genoa, Italy, got hurry-up orders from the Kremlin to proceed to another port, probably to feed cargo to the North Koreans."

WEICHEL said the House Merchant Marine Committee, of which he is a member, has information that the Russian merchant fleet consists of about 500 ships, "about a fifth of them the ones they borrowed from us and never returned."

"We hear that the fleet has been very active in carrying cargo to ports feeding the Orient, thus relieving the Russians' Siberia railway so it can carry more troops and munitions," he said.

Connecticut Farm Products

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANTONI N. SADLAK
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. SADLAK. Mr. Speaker, among the membership of the House there are many colleagues who many times stress the fact that they represent so-called farm districts. An editorial appearing in the Bridgeport (Conn.) Sunday Herald of August 27, 1950, will, I feel, be of particular interest to such Members because it stresses the pride that my district, the great State of Connecticut, can also boast when telling of the incomparable products that the agriculturalists of Connecticut produce. The editorial follows:

TELL ALL THE WORLD NOTHING TOPS CONNECTICUT BRAND FARM PRODUCTS

There's been a suggestion made that the State set up standards for our best farm products, establish a "Connecticut Brand" and tout them far and wide. The suggestion is in the Democrats' platform, and doubtless they hope to get some votes with it.

But here is only one truly nonpartisan plank: Palates know no politics but all palates should know the products of our farms and gardens and orchards.

This is a perfect season to sell Connecticut families on Connecticut farm products.

Time has snatched away our strawberries. We had spent weeks buying them from hothouses and hothouse lands; then ours were here, and we ate them desperately fast, knowing that time was short and such rich flavor would soon be gone for another 48 weeks.

Now the housewife, having hocked the family jewels through the late winter and spring months to buy tomatoes from the fabulous gardens of Texas and California, triumphantly puts natives on the table; and all the family again knows what a tomato should taste like.

Corn, fresh from Connecticut gardens, has come into its butter-drenched glory. Peas and beans, squash and cukes, beets and carrots, again taste as they should. Now the housewife can buy lettuce that hasn't grown limp and drab, that still has the green goodness in it. Even cabbages and kings may sit down together, when they are native cabbages.

Our potatoes are smaller than those they grow in Idaho but that is their only inferiority, and who can put a whole potato in his mouth, even a small Connecticut potato? Our onions aren't loud and boastful, neither are they wan weaklings: They are onions.

Cantaloupes and their kin are pearls which fare better than most fruits on long trips from far lands. But who will give them a second thought when he splits open our own heavy-meated melons and comes upon the sweet succulence within? Yes, and sing of the watermelons of the South; but keep them there. Our own are better.

And then, when summer is past, fruited fall arrives and a man may bite clean and ringing into a Connecticut apple, firm and juicy and tangy with a touch of tartness mingled in the sweet, who would exchange a single one for a whole crate of polished and pretty fruit imported dudes of the orchard?

Yes, by all means, let's have a Connecticut Brand. Let's advertise it far and wide, let's sell to all. We'll help Connecticut farmers, no doubt. More than that, we'll transform the edge of our dining tables into the perimeter of paradise.

Evil Things Can Happen to the Soil

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM M. COLMER

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I desire to submit the following brief, but concise and thought-provoking essay written by a young boy in his teens from Hub, Miss., Dennis Barber.

Dennis Barber is just a farm boy in south Mississippi where there are many hundreds of other boys who live on farms, but Dennis Barber is not just a farm boy living on a farm. He is a boy who works his mind as well as his hands.

Several months ago the American Plant Food Council, of which our former distinguished colleague, Hon. Clifton A. Woodrum, is president, sponsored a contest on "Soil Fertility and the Nation's Future." This contest was for the purpose of stimulating the interest of the youth of this country in its greatest heritage, its soil. Prizes were offered for the best essays on this subject. The contest was open to the boys and girls throughout the Nation who live on farms. More than 20,000 boys and girls competed in this essay contest. It is interesting to note that, while the first prize went to a splendid young lad from the sturdy State of Vermont, the second place winner was this fine young boy from south Mississippi, Dennis Barber. The prizes were awarded in person to George and Dennis at Hot Springs, Va., a few weeks ago, where they were the guests of the American Plant Food Council. I am sure that all who love the soil join me in saluting these fine, outstanding young Americans.

The essay of Dennis Barber, my splendid young constituent, is as follows:

The normal geologic erosion that has gone on for ages under natural conditions is a part of the whole complex soil-making process. But when man steps in and cultivates the land he creates conditions that may result in an enormous acceleration of erosion. Under certain conditions this accelerated erosion is the most dramatic and disastrous of the evil things that can happen to the soil.

It is of two familiar types, water erosion and wind erosion. Water erosion occurs chiefly on sloping land removing the soil in sheets or cutting it with many small streamlets or gashing out deep gullies. The steepness of the slope, the soil type, the intensity of the rainfall, and the land use all affect the character and rapidity of this process. Wind erosion occurs on both sloping and level land and it too is affected by soil type. One factor is common to both kinds of accelerated erosion; they both depend upon removal of the natural vegetative cover which includes its complex underground roots and its residue of organic matter on and in the soil. For example, some experiments show that a cover of dense vegetation is 300 times more effective in retaining rainfall than clean tilled crops on the same kind of land. Moreover, the rate of erosion increases as the upper layers of soil are successively removed.

In regions where there is sufficient rainfall, which includes nearly half the United States, forests must be considered the first line of defense against erosion where permanent and certain protection is required on steep slopes, on deep erodible soil subject to gullying, and on abandoned farm land permanently removed from cultivation. To take an example among many; during a storm in northern Mississippi land under forest cover lost 75 pounds of soil per acre while nearby land under cultivation lost 68,000 pounds per acre.

The use of grass and other close-growing vegetation is other great natural methods of controlling erosion and conserving water. Contour furrowing or plowing and planting across the slope instead of running the furrows up and down the hills has long been practiced by intelligent farmers. Strip cropping has proved to be one of the simplest most effective methods of controlling erosion. Terracing, gully control, and crop rotation are also effective means of soil-erosion control. Most of the above control measures are used by most of the farmers in Hub Community through cooperation of the Soil Conservation Service. Over one-half our land is level to nearly level, moist cut over long leaf pine land and we are finding it is more suited to the growing of pine timber and permanent pastures. Therefore, our soil-erosion problem is not as great as where the land is more rolling and more is in cultivation.

Among soil deficiencies that affect productiveness, those of organic matter, nitrogen, phosphorus, and potassium are of special importance.

In general, the fertility of virgin soils is associated with the continuous supply of organic matter they receive from native vegetation, which is in balance with other factors. The mere act of cultivation tends to reduce the supply in many soils. Since agricultural crops are generally removed instead of being left to decay, not enough raw material is added to the soil each year to maintain the natural balance. This rapid reduction of soil fertility may occur even without erosion, but it is true that most cases speed up erosion. One result is a serious loss of nitrogen which is largely stored in organic matter and released by decay. Nitrogen is a fundamental element in the building of protein, the staff of life. Thus, we can see if we only give nature a chance the productivity of our soils will be maintained and our Nation's future secured.

Radio Address by Hon. Guy M. Gillette, of Iowa

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GUY M. GILLETTE

OF IOWA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 29 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address entitled "The Thirty-eight Parallel and Beyond," which I made over Station WGN, Chicago, on August 26, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE THIRTY-EIGHTH PARALLEL AND BEYOND

Thank you. Good evening, fellow citizens of the Midwest.

My primary purpose this evening is to call attention to the one weapon that is in shortest supply for the war in Korea: a positive program for Korea when the war has ended.

We and the world know what we are fighting against in Korea: armed Communist aggression. But so far, nobody, neither ourselves, nor our allies, nor the neutrals, nor our enemies know what we are fighting for.

Neither the United States Government nor any of the United Nations associated with it in this peace-enforcement enterprise has yet come forth with even a general statement of aims, let alone a point-by-point program to be followed when military victory is won. Yet the war is over 2 months old—9 weeks to be exact.

All energy has been concentrated up to now--necessarily I think—on the desperate struggle to prevent the defending forces from being driven into the sea by the superior mass of invading North Koreans.

Yet, without a statement of peace aims that is both lofty in conception and simple for anyone to understand, without an adequate plan for Korea when the Communist invasion has been crushed—all that is gained through military success can be lost through political failure. The peoples of Asia—of all the world—are watching us in Korea; and by our actions, far more than by our words, they are judging where their interest lies. The Asiatic peoples are making up their minds whether alliance with us, submission to communism, or neutrality in the world conflict is the course for them to follow. If the wavering Asiatic nations, among whom Soviet propaganda is daily sowing doubt and suspicion of America's purpose, can be shown by our actions in Korea that alliance with us is the road to independence and higher standards of living, then we will have gained far more by the fight in Korea than merely the stopping of Communist aggression. If, however, action to halt Communist aggression in a country is to mean only slaughter and devastation, followed by years of misery and foreign occupation, the rest of Asia may draw the conclusion that they want nothing more to do with us, and will turn away to neutrality or even to hostility and communism.

Military victory itself may be far more difficult to obtain—if the Korean people and the soldiers in the southern and northern Korean armies do not know clearly what the end of fighting will bring for them. Finally, our own hard-fighting troops and our people here at home need and deserve a higher goal to believe in and fight for, than simply the dogged fulfillment of a UN Security Council directive to repel armed invasion.

The onrush of the attacker is beginning to slow, and, barring new unforeseeable catastrophe, will be stopped in its tracks before long. The process of building our strength in men and equipment for the counter-offensive toward the north is already under way. Unless heavy reinforcements for the North Koreans suddenly arrived from another Communist satellite or from the Soviet Union itself, or unless the deadlock in negotiation at the UN is unexpectedly broken soon, the American troops and those of the other UN members now being sent to join them will, sometime this fall and winter, commence the great drive to sweep the Communists back to the thirty-eighth parallel.

Already people are beginning to ask: Should the UN forces pursue the Communists beyond that thirty-eighth parallel, the artificial dividing line separating North and South Korea, and go on into Communist territory right up to the Manchurian border and along the northeastern seacoast strip that reaches to the Siberian border a few miles below the strategic Russian port of Vladivostok?

The Security Council's order called on the North Koreans to cease hostilities and withdraw behind the thirty-eighth parallel. If, seeing themselves ultimately threatened with defeat, the Communists should now or a few months hence choose to obey that original directive, will that satisfy the members of the Security Council, or will they feel, as the American delegate, Mr. Austin, has already hinted the United States Government feels, that ending the breach of peace in Korea also requires ending the possibility of its being breached again? And if the UN authorizes its forces to cross into North Korea and occupy that part of the country, what will the Russians do? Might they not decide, then and there, to bar the way with Soviet troops, and confront us with the fatal choice of either going no farther north or of entering openly into the first phase of the third world war?

These are questions that are worrying your Government and the other members of the United Nations. These are questions that we all will be required to think through in the weeks ahead.

I do not see how we can justify the agony and sacrifice of our men in Korea by agreeing to stop at the thirty-eighth parallel, and thus restore the very conditions which have just led to this outbreak of armed invasion. Until new facts are presented to me, and until the Russians have given some clear sign of what they will do, I can only say, on the basis of what I know now, that the United Nations must decide to end the division of Korea once and for all, and the United States must press for this decision at the UN meetings. This is the time to unite Korea, as the UN General Assembly has been urging for three long years, under one democratically elected government, in a republic that is independent of all great-power domination, whether American, Russian, Chinese, or any other. If the Russians understand in time that this is to be the UN's decision, they may think twice before moving in their troops to reoccupy the northern half of Korea.

Once we decide the question of the thirty-eighth parallel, we will have decided our over-all political aim in the Korean war: reunification, under UN auspices, of the two parts of the country, reintegration of the industrial northern half and the agricultural southern half, reestablishment of an all-Korean, self-government, viable state of 30,000,000 Koreans.

But I do not for a moment believe that this is enough. After all, unification by itself would have been at least one of the results of a successful Communist conquest from the north. On the matter of unification, oddly enough, all Koreans are probably agreed. The differences among them lie in what kind of a state that united Korea shall be.

Therefore, to the extent that we can spell out now—and by "we" I mean the United Nations as well as the United States—what sort of Korea we intend to bring into being when the war ends, we shall succeed in stating the purposes for which this war is being fought.

I want to propose some basic principles that I believe must govern our program for Korea, principles that should lie behind every political and diplomatic pronouncement on Korea that we make henceforth and that we should guide every military, and nonmilitary action in Korea that we take.

If we adopt these principles we may find to our own surprise that there in Korea lies open to our grasp the great opportunity for which we have been prayerfully and hopefully waiting: The opportunity to seize the initiative in the world from the Russians. By what we do to settle the Korean conflict, the world will know whether we have shifted from a negative program of sheer anticommunism to a positive program for the independence and prosperity of peoples everywhere. We can set the pattern for all Asia, and even offer the first glimmer of promise to the subjugated peoples of the Soviet Union itself.

Starting with the fundamental objective of a united Korea, the UN program for Korea should provide for the achievement of—at the very least—the following political, economic, and social aims:

First. It goes without saying that immediate relief and complete rehabilitation will be vital. A rebuilt Korea is the primary test of UN effectiveness. If liberation from communism is to mean devastation of one's country so terrible that repairs take a generation, the lesson others may draw will be disastrous for us. We should state flatly, at once, that all physical damage to public or private property, whether done by the Communists or by the UN forces, will be speedily and wholly repaired.

Second. We must guarantee the Korean people liberty, including independence from all outside control.

We must make it crystal clear that we don't want Korea as a military base, and that we shall not permit Russia to use it as such. The UN must guarantee that no great power will exercise direct or indirect control over the united Korean republic. And while UN forces are still in Korea, basic steps must be taken to assure individual freedom in a society based on the fundamental rights of the human being.

Third. We must guarantee the Koreans security. The function of security is to defend liberty. It must mean security against both external aggression and internal totalitarian revolt. The UN must guarantee the frontiers of united Korea, perhaps by neutralizing a strip 10 to 30 miles deep, along the land borders, into which no Korean troops and no troops of big powers can enter, to be guarded and patrolled by a strong UN police composed of elements from smaller, preferably Asiatic UN countries. Thus sealed off from penetration or attack, Korea would be as secure as a nation can be in the present permanent world crisis. At the same time, the Russians would be assured that Korea is not to be a jumping-off place for any non-Soviet power against Vladivostok and the Siberian east.

Korea's internal security problem will be what to do with the thousands of defeated Communist troops and guerrillas who do not escape across the borders. Can the UN permit them to be shot en masse? Or can they be held in special camps in Korea or on some Pacific island and undergo a stiff course of reindoctrination and reorientation before being paroled on good behavior? If the war is to be shortened, North Korea's soldiers must be offered some choice but death—but their leaders and war criminals must be told they face trial before an international tribunal.

Fourth, the UN economic program for united Korea must demonstrate what we can do in an area once the Communists are driven out. This means we must stimulate prosperity wherever poverty now prevails, raise standards of living, increase productivity of land and factory, encourage capital investment, train people in technical skills, assure trading possibilities abroad, expand enormously the exchange of students to admit thousands of Koreans for training here and in Europe. Korean prosperity will make that area the envy and model of Asia.

Finally, our fifth guiding principle must be to help the Koreans in all ways possible to build themselves a society of opportunity for all the people—education, fruitful employment, ownership of the land they till, a better future for youth than the oldsters have had.

All these are essential parts, briefly outlined in the short time I have, of the positive program for Korea that we must have as our peace aim when the fighting has stopped over there. This is the weapon we need most to win and secure the victory.

Damage to American Workers and Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, the free and easy use of favored foreign trade agreements has done much to hurt American workers and industry. It is having its effects in northwestern Ohio and I have introduced legislation covering this matter and I am including a news item from the August 27, 1950, Cleveland Plain Dealer, of Cleveland, Ohio:

OHIO INDUSTRIES HURT BY EASY IMPORTS, WEICHEL SAYS

(By Edward Kernan)

WASHINGTON, August 26.—Northwestern Ohio industries are being severely damaged by the administration's free and easy use of favored foreign trade agreements, Representative ALVIN F. WEICHEL (Republican, Sandusky) charged today.

Calling for passage of his measure demanding that the President take immediate steps to halt the flow of low-tariff products from foreign countries, many of which are controlled by Communists, Weichel cited industries in Tiffin, Fremont, and Sandusky as being particularly hard hit by present trade policies.

In addition, he said other industries throughout Ohio are being hurt, directly or indirectly, by the importation of cheaply made foreign goods, which not only cuts at the industries, but strikes at the American workman by destroying his job.

TIFFIN GLASS HIT

"The hand glass industry at Tiffin has been affected by these imports, especially those coming from Czechoslovakia," WEICHEL said. "These agreements were consummated even after Czechoslovakia was overrun by Russian communism."

"Then there is the cutlery industry, with a principal center at Fremont, which makes shears, scissors, and surgical instruments. It has been greatly affected by our trade-agreement policy."

WEICHEL said that the paperboard and strawboard industry at Sandusky and elsewhere has already felt the bite from low-tariff imports.

"Then there is the refractory products industry, pertinent to the manufacture of steel, centered in the limestone region of Sandusky and Seneca Counties where imports again affect not only hundreds in the immediate area but others throughout the United States."

Building a UN Police Force

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GUY M. GILLETTE
OF IOWA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 29 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, on June 29, during the debate on the arms-aid bill, I urged the formation of an international police force to handle the Korean outbreak and similar situations that may arise. I ask unanimous consent that an editorial appearing in the current New Leader, entitled "How To Build a UN Police Force," be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD. The New Leader is a well-known anti-Communist weekly published in New York by persons whom I understand are affiliated with the Social Democratic Federation. While I am not necessarily in accord with the viewpoint of this magazine on many subjects, I regard this editorial as a sound contribution to American thinking on the Korean crisis as it relates to the United Nations. The New Leader's proposal suggests one way in which an international police force might be formed, now.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOW TO BUILD A UN POLICE FORCE

The war in Korea has laid bare a fundamental shortcoming of the United Nations: It cannot halt or prevent aggression, even when it displays the will to do so, because it does not possess the physical power to enforce its will.

The United Nations is not only itself unable to stop aggression, but must rely upon others to do so. Its complete dependence upon individual member states was underscored by the fact that the Security Council, having issued a cease-fire order to the North Koreans, then had to call upon its member states to enforce it.

Further: Of the 44 nations which have offered to aid South Korea, the UN is most dependent upon the United States, for it alone can supply aid in a decisive degree. Britain and France, overtaxed by prior commitments, cannot render much more than token help; and the smaller nations are scarcely able to match even that. In the last analysis, then, the ability of the United Nations to maintain peace rests—at least in the case of Korea—upon the power of one Nation: The United States.

The issue, however, goes far beyond Korea. Threats to peace exist in many areas: Formosa, Indochina, Yugoslavia, Berlin. * * * In the event of aggression in these or other areas, what will the UN do? Will it, in each instance, call upon the United States to act as its policeman? But this will signify complete and permanent abdication of its basic functions to a single nation. Under such circumstances, the UN might as well close up shop and let the United States, in name as well as in fact, carry on as the leader of a formally organized league of non-Communist states.

An international organization of nations which cannot enforce law and order in the world community has no raison d'être. The League of Nations was afflicted with just this disability and inevitably expired. Since the UN, however, unlike the League, has demonstrated in the no uncertain language of the Security Council's three resolutions on Korea that it seriously means to fulfill its functions, it must take the next step and create the armed forces it absolutely requires to make good its intentions.

The UN can, accordingly, act on two levels:

1. The Security Council should dust off the blueprints for a UN naval, air, and military establishment which were long ago drawn up by its Military Staff Committee—but were pigeonholed as a result of Soviet machinations—and enact them into law. If this were done, the UN could arm itself in a relatively short period.

2. Pending the creation of a permanent, full-fledged police force, the United Nations can exercise limited effectiveness in the Korean crisis—and possibly in other crises soon to come—by creating at once an international volunteer army. Exercising its moral hold upon humanity, the UN should issue a clarion call to freemen everywhere to volunteer to serve under a UN-appointed command now.

If the UN broadcast such a global appeal, the chances are that a great many thousands would flock to the colors of the first truly international army in history, an army that would represent more races, creeds, and faiths than any ever before assembled.

In the west alone substantial contingents could thus be raised, for here there are countless men and women whose devotion to peace and freedom would impel them to join an army formed under UN auspices. Such an army would have special meaning for veterans of the wartime anti-Nazi resistance movements and of the Spanish Civil War, who would also bring to the UN army a wealth of experience and training in the art of fighting aggression and tyranny which might prove invaluable in guerrilla operations.

A UN appeal for volunteers would be answered by people in Asia who, unwilling to choose between communism and imperialism (or imperialist puppets), would react positively to an agency not motivated by power interests.

By far the most single fruitful source of UN manpower could be the multitude of refugees from communism who languish in internment camps in western Europe. The 100,000 Soviet officers and soldiers who have defected to the west since the war's end could alone form the hard core for a UN army.

Just as the era of nation-states is past, so is the day of national armies. The cold war is international, the hot war in Korea has international ramifications, the forces now fighting in Korea—on both sides—are international in character, the crises brewing elsewhere in Asia and in Europe are international crises. It is beyond the power of any nation to resolve the problems facing the world. But imagine the impact if, in response to a UN appeal launched across national, racial, and cultural barriers, hundreds of thousands of citizens from all over the globe volunteered to act as policemen to keep the peace.

At once the stock of the United Nations would rise to new heights and people would admiringly exclaim: "Why, the family of nations really does mean business."

The little man, long frustrated because his power of decision has been snatched from him by superforces of all kinds, would at last have a chance to really participate in the events molding his future.

Would-be aggressors, faced with the prospect of having to fight an international army, would think twice before attacking others.

World government, hitherto an impractical dream, would, predicated now upon the existence of effective fighting forces, come nearer reality.

Naturally, there are many obstacles in the way both of building a permanent international police force, and a temporary volunteer army. But if they are not built, there will be no obstacles in the way of the UN's path to oblivion. We call upon the Security Council to proceed at once to the business at hand: the creation of the means by which the United Nations can defend itself.

For a Sound Economy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE R. HOEY
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 29 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. HOEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a very sane article headed "For a sound economy," which appeared yesterday in the Washington (D. C.) Evening Star.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FOR A SOUND ECONOMY

(A statement by Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Beane, underwriters and brokers, New York)

As an American, you have the interest of your country at heart but you may be confused by the various proposals for meeting the country's economic problems.

You are perfectly willing to pay your share of higher taxes to strengthen the military power of the country to combat communism. Yes, you are ready to pay even higher taxes than many in Washington think. But you hope the Government will get your money's worth and you hope, along with every hard-working American, that your savings will not go up in the smoke of inflation.

Price controls? Wage controls? Consumer credit controls? Excess-profits taxes? Nobody wants any of them in normal times, but—do we need any or all of them at present?

When our Government spends more money than it collects in taxes, it must sell bonds to make up the difference. If these bonds are sold to the commercial banks, as happened in the last war, new deposits (additional purchasing power) are created. This is inflationary deficit financing and no amount of controls can permanently hold in check the pressure of the constantly increasing money supply. For the years 1943 and 1944 inflation was held in check by rigid price and wage controls, but once the controls were eased, the effect of the huge increase in the money supply was felt. Price controls do not strike at the underlying illness of inflation, they merely hide it temporarily.

Inflation is an invisible tax that harms everyone Rising costs for the necessities of life squeeze the workingman's standard of living while the farmer has to pay more and more for manufactured products.

In the last war, we introduced a mild excess-profits tax in 1940, made it tougher as time went on. Experience proved that a severe excess-profits tax destroys incentives for management to control costs. Remember some of the wasteful hijinks by the less strictly managed companies? You can remember when questionable and unnecessary expenditures were viewed as costing only 15 cents on the dollar. The same companies found it difficult after the war ended to regain financial discipline. Excess-profits taxes are hard to administer; they are full of inequities. They impose hardship on new companies and limit incentive for growth and the development of new products by dynamic companies. Some of the best minds in Washington know this.

Price controls without wage controls in the last war pinched profits margins with the result that some manufacturers stopped making certain products, cut quality and sought out more profitable but less useful items. This compounded our shortages. Price controls and rationing led to black markets and tax avoidance, costing the Government millions of dollars.

What policies would be most advisable now?

Several steps should be taken immediately:

1. Cut out all Government expenditures not absolutely necessary. Purpose: Reduce deficit financing to a minimum—most important of all.

2. Cut out all public works not absolutely necessary. Purpose: Prevent unnecessary demands for materials and men at a time when there are not enough of either to go around; provide an ace in the hole if it is later necessary to stimulate the economy.

3. Use strict controls over consumer credit and real-estate credit as the primary means of reducing current abnormal demands for autos, appliances, and houses. Purpose: (a) Release materials and men for necessary armament work. (b) Stimulate saving to permit purchase of Government securities by individuals. (c) Restore competition by getting abnormal demand in line with somewhat reduced supply.

4. Substitute a combination of normal and surtax rates for excess-profits taxes, and complement such higher rates with renegotiation to take unreasonable profits out of rearmament. Balance renegotiation with production and cost incentives. Purpose: Although not ringing with the same political appeal as excess-profits taxes, such an arrangement would retain incentives for corporate managements to control costs and prevent waste and inflation.

5. Use price controls and wage controls later (a) if the above measures fail after an honest effort, and (b) if we step up armament production beyond that now estimated. There should be no piecemeal price controls, and price controls should be tied in directly with wage controls right from the start.

6. Raise personal income-tax rates. Purpose: (a) To help defray armament expenditures and reduce need for deficit financing. (b) Siphon off purchasing power in the hands of individuals. (c) Reduce the demand for commodities in short supply.

A healthy economy is as important today as military strength.

Blame for Unpreparedness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW F. SCHOEPPEL

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 29 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, some time ago there were reported in the press a statement and sentiments on the part of high Government officials who sought to place the blame upon the American people for the condition in which we now find ourselves, both from a financial standpoint, and certainly as far as the defenses of the country are concerned.

The people generally have a way of finding out where the blame should be placed. An editorial appeared in the Daily Oklahoman of August 25, 1950, entitled "You Are to Blame." This editorial points out so very vividly some things that I ask unanimous consent that it be placed in the Appendix of the RECORD, where it may be preserved, and where all may read it.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

YOU ARE TO BLAME

As an average American you will be interested in knowing that administration apologists on the radio, in the press, and in speeches, now say that "the American people are to blame for the fact that we now find ourselves unprepared."

The people, say these spokesmen, wouldn't let Congress appropriate the money that was needed for vital defense equipment. By the same token the people are to blame for wasting money and diverting it to useless projects and material instead of investing in tanks, planes, guns, and ships.

This puts a dread burden on you, the average citizen—so great that only a tiny fraction of your sins can be mentioned. However, so you may know the enormity of your misdeeds in this respect, here are some of the items in the indictment:

Out of each $7 of defense appropriations, only $1 was spent for equipment since VJ-day. The rest went for "housekeeping." You did that. You were to blame for putting hundreds of ships and thousands of planes "in mothballs," instead of keeping them in serviceable condition, in Teddy Roosevelt fashion. You ordered a huge aircraft carrier scrapped after construction was under way. You ordered the tearing down of an Army camp in Alaska, at a cost of $16,000,000, then ordered it shipped to Seattle; then you had the ships turn around and haul the material back to Alaska, at a point within 10 miles of where it had been.

You asked for 910 family houses in Alaska to shelter Army personnel, at a cost of $58,350 a house. You ordered $108,290,859 worth of tropical worsted uniforms—$129 each for every enlisted man in the Army. You asked for money to modernize 102 more M-26 tanks than the Army has. (By the way, have those tanks appeared in Korea?) You fired a great admiral because he had the courage to differ with some of the Navy bosses on policies, thus putting a muzzle on that freedom of speech which is absolutely essential to efficient and economical administration.

Then, in a wave of false economy, you took another tack and resorted to frantic slashes. You compelled Government stenographers in Washington to get along with only 3.6 typewriters apiece. You left millions of people off the Federal payrolls who could have been there. You pestered the Army engineers so they reduced their askings for big dams and such—past, present, and future—to a paltry $6,000,000,000. In your Pendergastian parsimony, you spent only $191,081,394,191 in the years of 1946-49, inclusive, whereas the 32 Presidents, from Washington to F. D. Roosevelt (up to 1941), spent almost as much, or $179,020,113,645.

You were so niggardly that you got the country into the pitifully small debt of $256,000,000,000, whereas it might have been a trillion. For tobacco to feed the starving Europeans you only allowed a measly little $258,000,000.

Your reckless pinchpenny false economy went so far as to harass the underprivileged hillbillies of Aroostook County, some of whom got only $100,000 a year in potato subsidies, and had to sell their yachts and discharge their chauffeurs and second maids. That was during the shameful year of 1948, when you gave away only $200,000,000 for potatoes, and, then, grinding the faces of the poor, you extorted 3 cents a bushel for the same potatoes for which they had been paid $2, so they could use them for livestock feed. You took over only 2,000,000,000 eggs and comparable quantities of butter, wheat, and other commodities, under your tightwad policy.

Remember, these are only a few typical examples. The whole story is such as to cause infinite distress to the brave bureaucrats who vainly tried to deter you from taking your mad course.

Aren't you ashamed of yourself?

Hon. William M. Whittington, of Mississippi

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM M. COLMER

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday last the voters of that splendid section of Mississippi known as the Delta, held their primary election to nominate a successor to the Honorable WILLIAM M. WHITTINGTON, the able Congressman from that district. This serves to remind us that the few remaining weeks of this session of the Eighty-first Congress will mark the termination of the long, distinguished, and efficient service of this noble son of Mississippi in the Halls of the American Congress.

Two years ago this outstanding Mississippian announced that he would not be a candidate for relection, after having served for 24 years with distinction and ability. The shock of this announcement was so great for his many friends and admirers that even though several distinguished sons of that section of the State announced their candidacy, the people of the Third Congressional District demanded that WILL WHITTINGTON again offer himself as a candidate for reelection and return to Congress. His popularity and efficiency were so well recognized that the prospective candidates announced their withdrawal upon condition that Congressman WHITTINGTON would reconsider and become a candidate, an incident, no doubt, without parallel in the political history of Mississippi. Battling between conflicting emotions of the desire to withdraw from public life on the one hand and the pressing obligation of duty, he reluctantly reconsidered the decision and was reelected to the Eighty-first Congress without opposition.

Mr. Speaker, on the occasion of the former announcement of my personal friend and colleague's retirement from the Halls of this Congress, I paid my humble tribute to this distinguished Mississippian and able American, and inserted in the RECORD in connection with my remarks a number of select editorials lamenting Congressman WHITTINGTON'S decision to retire and praising his service to his State and country—Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 94, part 9, pages A1372 and A1373.

Mr. Speaker, when the statement of the final and irrevocable decision of our colleague to retire was publicized, the press of our section of the country again eulogized this distinguished public servant. A number of them are submitted herewith for posterity. These spontaneous and unselfish tributes are truly deserved. The record made by WILL WHITTINGTON in the Congress and the fruits of his service will long stand as an enduring monument to a great Mississippian and an outstanding statesman.

The editorials follow:

[From the Greenwood (Miss.) Morning Star of January 21, 1950]

THE DISTRICT NEEDS WHITTINGTON IN CONGRESS

We read with regret that Congressman WILL WHITTINGTON has decided he will not be a candidate for reelection. It is our humble opinion the district and our great State need Mr. WHITTINGTON in Congress. We therefore wish to go on record as favoring a draft WHITTINGTON movement.

It is not our intention to cast any reflection upon State Senator Frank Smith, or any other person who might seek the vacant seat. We have a high regard for Senator Smith, as is shown by our publication of his fine column in our Sunday Star.

The point we want to get across is that no new man could represent this district on so many vitally important committees and in other capacities in Washington, as does Congressman WHITTINGTON. He is one of the most influential and capable men on Capitol Hill.

While the vast flood-control program is yet incomplete, and while controversies rage over roads and highways, Congressman WHITTINGTON is in a key position to render invaluable service to the people of this district and to the entire Nation. He is chairman of these two very important committees.

Congressman WHITTINGTON is perhaps the best-informed man in Congress on the Nation's flood-control program. Certainly none is his peer in this respect. It follows easily that the Delta needs him in Congress.

We are familiar with Congressman WHITTINGTON'S long expressed desire of retiring. We are also familiar with the fact that he was drafted 2 years ago, after announcing his retirement. We believe he is absolutely sincere and that it will require the combined voices of voters all over the district in an earnest appeal before he will give consideration. It is highly possible that he will turn a deaf ear to even the most persuasive overtures.

The Biblical quotation which refers to a prophet being without honor in his home town, applies in the case of men such as Congressman WHITTINGTON. I'm sure we here in Leflore County and area do not fully realize the great service Mr. WHITTINGTON has rendered and is in position to continue, if he remains in the Halls of Congress.

[From the Greenwood (Miss.) Commonwealth of January 22, 1950]

CONGRESSMAN WHITTINGTON

The announcement of Congressman WILL M. WHITTINGTON not to seek reelection as Representative of the Third Congressional District at the end of his term meets with genuine regret throughout the Delta and the State of Mississippi.

Mississippi will lose one of the most notable Representatives in Washington and the whole Mississippi Valley its stanchest leader for flood control. He has been the No. 1 champion and fighter for flood control in all efforts to keep the Mississippi River and its tributaries behind safe and sound levees.

His retirement is a tremendous loss to the country's river valleys and all navigation interests.

He served as chairman of the old House Flood Control Committee and its at present chairman of the Public Works Committee, which authorizes flood control and rivers and harbors projects. In his long tenure of office he has not only served his congressional district but the State and Nation and we are all under obligations to his leadership and sound thinking. He has always been fair in serving where urgency of flood control was needed and did not allow any party affiliation to swerve his actions.

Mr. WHITTINGTON has served for 26 years and on May 4 this year will be 74 years old. All of us know that this long service has been trying and at times vexing, but, despite any circumstance that may have arisen, Mr. WHITTINGTON has always kept his composure and his motives never questioned. He has the valuable asset of thinking matters through, no matter how much voluminous detail is involved. He is today one of our most valued public servants.

The counties in Mr. WHITTINGTON'S district have long depended upon him for information in national affairs and he always found time to give his best thoughts and attention to them. Nothing was trivial to him when it came to serving his constituents. He is noted for replying to the most trivial matter and no matter what station in life a man might occupy, he obtained the best service from his Congressman.

Greenwood is going to miss his valuable service most of all. It is through him that the city enjoys many Federal agencies and benefits, especially in regard to flood-control projects. It was nice to have a Congressman live in your midst where his advice and counsel could be obtained any time. We owe him a debt of gratitude we can never fully repay. His decision to retire is a matter of regret to everybody.

Replacing Mr. WHITTINGTON for the important place he has so long occupied is going to call for much thinking on the part of the voters. Good men who have been serving like Mr. WHITTINGTON will be hard to replace. He has set an example of what the public learns to expect and respect. His successor will have a big place to fill because he has placed his service on a national scale instead of a congressional district.

In Mr. WHITTINGTON'S retirement, it does not mean he will lose any interest in his community or Nation and he will be ready to advise and help in any way possible, as he has always done. And in these troublesome times advice of men like him will be most helpful.

[From the Memphis (Tenn.) Commercial Appeal of January 22, 1950]

WHITTINGTON'S DECISION

No one who knows anything about American flood control policies, projects and progress would deny to Representative WILL WHITTINGTON the rest he intends to seek through retirement from the House. Nevertheless, his retirement will be a tremendous loss to the country's river valleys and to its navigation interests.

As chairman of the old House Flood Control Committee and as present chairman of the Public Works Committee which authorizes flood control and rivers and harbors projects, Judge WHITTINGTON has served the whole country as well as his Mississippi constituents in splendid manner and both owe his efforts much indeed.

He has been a Member of the House for 26 years. When he sought to retire 2 years ago his State's political leaders and his constituents persuaded him to delay. They should defer to his wishes now. Judge WHITTINGTON'S long handling of flood control legislation has been marked by unswerving adamancy in requiring establishment of economic justification of proposed projects. If that was lacking, the project was not approved. In that respect, Judge WHITTINGTON has been every taxpayer's representative.

A flooding Mississippi concurrent with his decision to retire is a sharp reminder of the importance of control works. A few years ago, the present flood could have been a great disaster. That it is not is due to the works for which Judge WHITTINGTON provided authorizing leadership.

[From the Jackson (Miss.) Clarion Ledger of January 22, 1950]

MR. WHITTINGTON'S RETIREMENT A BLOW TO THE LOWER VALLEY

Like thousands of other Mississippians, we received without surprise but with deep and genuine regret Congressman WILL M. WHITTINGTON'S announcement that he will retire from office January 1, after representing the Third Mississippi Congressional District for 26 years; that he has "definitely decided not to be a candidate for reelection."

Mr. WHITTINGTON'S colleagues in the House share the regret that Mississippians feel over his announcement. So do the officials and civic and business leaders of all the Mississippi Valley States. They realize, as do most Mississippians, that WILL WHITTINGTON'S services have been of great value to the whole Valley—to the Nation.

He is recognized in Washington not only as a most able Representative but also as a statesman and as probably the foremost congressional or national authority on flood-control problems and rivers and harbors development.

As all Washington news reports of his retirement announcement emphasized, "Lower Valley Congressmen said the distinguished Mississippian's retirement would be a sharp blow to the entire Valley."

The heaviest loss, however, is Mississippi's and the Third District's.

Nobody can deny that the veteran Representative has earned the rest and rewards of retirement. None can criticize his decision. He is, as he reminds, approaching his seventy-second birthday. He wanted to retire 2 years ago, but yielded to public pleas and insistence that he accept one more term without opposition.

The timing of his announcement reveals a courtesy and consideration typical of the Delta statesman. He announced his coming retirement nearly a year in advance of the expiration of his current term "to give ample time for the nomination and election of my successor." That consideration doubtless is appreciated by announced and prospective candidates.

Whoever is elected to succeed Representative WHITTINGTON will have some "big shoes to fill," an inheritance to challenge the best that is within him.

Meantime, with a great many other Mississippians, we hope Mr. WHITTINGTON derives the maximum pleasure and satisfaction out of his final year of congressional service and approaches his well-earned retirement hale and hearty and filled with the zest of living.

[From the Natchez (Miss.) Times of May 23, 1950]

WILL WHITTINGTON AND THE ROAD BILL

We have said before, and we repeat, when Hon. W. M. WHITTINGTON retires from Congress next year, not only Mississippi but the Nation will have lost one of the most able Congressmen to ever sit in the Halls of our National Congress.

His work in connection with flood control is as well known in Maine and Oregon as it is in Mississippi. He has been the recognized head, and the authority, in matters pertaining to flood control for the past 15 years.

But his work in connection with the construction of America's magnificent system of highways is strangely enough little known. It has been one of his major efforts.

Recognizing that transportation was the major problem of a growing nation, he worked with a will to create State aid from the Federal funds to build thousands of miles of Federal-aid highways. These are admittedly the finest highways in the world.

The House of Representatives has just passed the Whittington highways bill by a vote of 246 to 34. It appropriates $570,000,000 for the next 2 years with which to match State funds in the building of highways in the several States. Of this amount, Mississippi will receive for each of the two ensuing years, in final passage of the law, $8,512,000. Matched by State funds, which it will be, this gives us a $34,000,000 highway program for 1951 and 1952.

This is important because it means the development of rural areas in this State. Following the construction of highways in 1936-44, the rural development increased crop production about 100 percent. Farmers were able to move back on farms formerly abandoned, and produce dairy, poultry, and meat products, and produce and get their crops to market regardless of weather. It put in cultivation a half million acres of land, and the increased wealth has far more than offset the cost, and we still have the highways.

The same thing will happen again. Thousands of farmers will now live on and cultivate lands which were believed inaccessible to market. The program will pay for itself over and over again.

WILL WHITTINGTON spark-plugged this effort in Congress. The law now in Congress is the most far-reaching, comprehensive, and constructive of any such law ever enacted in Congress. It is a great monument to a man who has devoted 26 years of his life to championing the development of the Nation, regardless of geographical location.

We hope he lives many years; but when he passes on we people of Mississippi should build a monument to him as a recognition of his great service.

[From the Jackson, (Miss.) Clarion Ledger of August 7, 1950]

HE'LL GIVE THE JOB HIS BEST UNTIL THE DAY HE RETIRES

"Most Congressmen would be inclined to take things easy in their last few months in office, once they had decided to retire," the Delta Democrat-Times observes. "It is human and understandable to slack off when retirement lies just ahead.

"But WILL WHITTINGTON continues to comport himself in behalf of his constituents just as if he had set his heart on serving another 20 years and was fighting off a dozen strong competitors. Greenville is especially obligated to him for his major contribution toward securing the newly authorized Federal judicial district, and for his continuing efforts in respect to activating the air base.

"All of which makes it more difficult to be resigned to his retirement."

This tribute doubtless was appreciated by many of Representative WILL WHITTINGTON'S friends, but nothing in it surprised anybody at all familiar with WILL WHITTINGTON'S character and habits.

He has throughout all the many years of his service in the House conducted himself as if "he had set his heart on serving another 20 years and was fighting off a dozen strong competitors."

That's why he served many more than 20 years, and could have continued to serve as long as his health held out and he asked for or would accept reelection.

That also is why he frequently had no competitors at all, much less 20 strong ones.

It isn't surprising that WILL WHITTINGTON, facing retirement after so many years in the House, should keep on working just as hard for his constituents and district as if he was seeking reelection. That is his character. He will give the job the best that is within him until the day he leaves it. And that's another reason why Editor Carter is not the only citizen of that district who finds it "difficult to be resigned to his retirement." Thousands of Mississippians who live and vote in other districts but who know the value of Mr. WHITTINGTON'S services, share that difficulty.

Universal Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD MARTIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 29 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial from the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette of yesterday, one from the Pittsburgh Press of last Sunday, and one from the Daily News of Philadelphia of August 23, all supporting universal military training.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette]

FOR THE LONG HAUL ONLY

Americans must plan and act on the assumption that they may have to live in a divided and hostile world for the next 10 to 20 years. In the light of such a prospect this newspaper pointed out a few days ago that some systematic program to provide a continuing and adequate flow of trained fighting men is both indispensable and inescapable.

But the specific program which has come to be known as UMT (universal military training) should be carefully weighed against serious alternatives.

At least 13 of the 14 members of the Senate Armed Services Committee reportedly favor immediate enactment of UMT—if only on a stand-by basis. Other advocates of the program are said to believe that only under the impetus of some such crisis as Korea would Congress dare enact so sweeping a measure. We would accept such a verdict regretfully. But if it should be correct as a matter of legislative strategy, then the citizen should understand clearly what UMT (apart from some of the problems of education and moral safeguards which it raises) can and cannot do.

There is no doubt that quick passage of UMT or any comprehensive military training program would have immense psychological value throughout the world. It would serve notice on the Kremlin that the United States is willing to "sweat it out," no matter how long it may take.

But UMT would supply no men either for Korea or for precautionary mobilization. None of the trainees would be available for military service for 6 months, and those who did not then choose to enlist could not be called for another year. It is doubtful that sufficient training personnel could be spared to put UMT into operation until the Korean war is disposed of and mobilization to meet foreseeable perils is complete. UMT, therefore, is no substitute for selective service or for calling the National Guard and the several reserves.

Nevertheless, and in the face of all these limitations, we are forced back to our original thesis: The United States must move immediately toward some established, systematic means of providing military manpower for the long pull ahead.

[From the Pittsburgh Press of August 27, 1950]

DON'T DELAY UMT

The alarming weaknesses in our defense establishment, as revealed by the Korean war, demanded and continue to demand emergency measures.

Though the highest priority must be granted to the needs of our troops now engaged in battle, it is scarcely less urgent that we begin to build the fighting forces we will need to insure our security as long as the threat of Soviet aggression continues.

A system of universal military training is the first essential in such a program. It should go into operation just as soon as the service personnel can be spared to direct it.

Only compulsory training will provide the men needed to fill the gaps in the ranks of the National Guard and the organized reserves, the two civilian forces which must reinforce the Regular Army in any national crisis.

We dare not wait for an enemy attack to begin training our men. We must have trained troops in readiness to meet on a moment's notice the enemy's trained troops.

It was a national disgrace that we had to send raw recruits into the field against the veteran troops of the North Korean Reds. It was unfair to the men, because they didn't know how to protect themselves.

It was unfair to their families, because many lives were sacrificed when green troops were thrown against an enemy who was their superior in training and equipment, as well as in numbers.

None of those deficiencies would have existed if we had been properly prepared to meet such an emergency.

This shouldn't happened again.

Congress can prevent it from happening again, by adopting the measures and voting the money now to create the military organization needed to defend this country.

We went into both world wars without being being ready to fight.

Our allies had to hold the line for us while we trained our troops.

We cannot depend upon anyone to hold the line for us if there is a next time.

Most of our prospective allies are looking to us to defend them. We will be in the front line on the first day of the war, if there is a world war III. We cannot escape that, because Russia regards us as enemy No. 1.

Russia has 2,900,000 trained men in uniform today. Her satellites have another million or more. Together they have millions more in reserve.

We need not match that professional army, man for man.

But we should have the trained reserves to meet our requirements in an emergency. And since plans call for training only 850,000 men a year, the training program can begin none too soon.

[From the Philadelphia Daily News of August 23, 1950]

UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING

Further delay in the enactment of a universal military training law under which America's youth would be prepared to serve their country as the need might arise is merely procrastinating on one of the most vital issues the Nation has to face. The past five years, since the end of the Second World War, have shown that unless America reveals it is ready and willing to defend, not only its own liberty, but freedom everywhere, aggression will sap and destroy that freedom.

Indications in Washington are that the opinions of Gen. Omar Bradley, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and Defense Secretary Louis Johnson in favor of UMT has swung many dubious Members of Congress toward early enactment. Senator MILLARD E. TYDINGS, Maryland Democrat and chairman of the Senate's Armed Services Committee, has pointed out that "if we do not do it now, we may never do it." And that would be tragic in that it would deprive the Nation of adequate defense.

Experiments at Fort Knox have shown UMT actually is beneficial to America's young men, even if they never are called to fire a shot. The mental and physical development, the instruction and trades they acquire and the self-confidence in their own ability that is engendered in them will stand them in good stead throughout their lives.

In addition, the creation of a reservoir of intelligently trained men, ready to answer their country's call at a moment's notice, can be one of the greatest incentives for world peace. No aggressor, who knows he faces a prepared America, will be foolish enough to strike against the common good. It is only when he believes he can act swiftly and before the United States can train its huge resources of manpower and industry that he is willing to take a chance on a quick victory.

UMT is a national necessity today. There should be no more stalling on its enactment and enforcement.

Democracy Begins at Home

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 29 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article written by Chester C. Diettert, principal of the Kankakee Township School of Tefft, Ind., entitled "Democracy Begins at Home." It was published in the School Board Journal for August 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEMOCRACY BEGINS AT HOME

(By Chester C. Diettert)

When we throw justice out the window with even a minor injustice to one of our fellow men, democracy has been hurt and we have become its enemy. When we use Gestapo methods in leveling general accusations against some of our citizens without giving consideration to their rights, privileges, immunities, and conditions, we are putting them into mental concentration camps just as surely as the Russians and Nazis placed people into physical concentration camps without due process of law. When, in our deliberative boards or policy-making groups, we permit a minority or even a single dictatorial talker to cudgel other members into conformity, we are setting up a little Hitler or a little Stalin and are throwing democracy out the window. Nothing could be more un-American. It is on these local community levels that the danger of communism and fascism begins, not on the usually supposed national level.

When we lack mercy in dealing with our fellow men, even though we may be able to hide behind the cloak of legality, we cannot right the wrong. There is no better formula for the solution of our community problems than mercy, forgiveness, and cooperation. There is no substitute for these that will work democratically.

When we show lack of appreciation for the services of our fellow men to our community, we are slapping down the ideal of service and are encouraging an attitude of "everyone for himself," or "let everyone look out for his own affairs, it's no concern of ours." "Am I my brother's keeper?" This attitude is the beginning of the breakdown of democracy and community cooperation and improvement.

Democracy has always emphasized the individual—his rights, privileges, duties, and immunities. When we disregard these fundamental ideals in our community activities we have started on the road to totalitarianism. And the little Hitlers and little Stalins in the local community who insist by word and deed that they are the interpreters of the popular will and who assume that they know what is best for the individuals in the community, are in reality the enemies of the improvement of the community upon a democratic basis. They are the leaders in the break for totalitarianism, whether communistic or fascistic in nature. Such individuals, when members of our community committees or policy-making boards, will violate legal procedures to secure their ends. Legal protection of the individual stands in their way, and they will avoid it or ignore it even if it is called to their attention. They do not consider a situation upon the basis of merits nor will they counsel with open minds. Consequently, their conclusions and decisions will not be without prejudice, and may even be tinged with malice, or political advantage.

We need to guard democracy at home, at the community level. We need to emphasize the protection of the individual against local usurpers or dictators.

Brief Our Soldiers in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following article from the Boston Sunday Globe, Boston, Mass., August 27, 1950:

WHY AMERICANS BATTLE IN KOREA—WE SHOULD TELL OUR MEN WHO ARE FACING DEATH AND TELL ALL THE WORLD THAT WE ARE NOT CRUSADING FOR DEMOCRACY OR ANY ECONOMIC SYSTEM BUT FOR A PEACE BUILT ON THE CHARTER OF THE UNITED NATIONS

(By James Morgan)

Reports from the battle front have told us over and over again that the Americans don't know why they are fighting in Korea. Many of them may never have heard of the place until they were ordered there.

Why not tell our men who are risking their lives and why not proclaim to all the war-sick peoples of the earth the simple easily understood reason for our being in Korea? We are battling on that little peninsula on the other side of the globe for the same cause that drew us into two world wars to repel an attack on the peace of the world, which necessarily involves the peace of the United States.

When Napoleon said that the moral is as 3 to 1 in comparison with the material element in warfare, he confirmed Shakespeare's line, "Thrice is he armed who hath his quarrel just." Since the GI's have no quarrel with the North Koreans, it is vitally important that they should know why they are killing them and being killed. It is three times more important than guns and tanks and dollars that our people and all the peoples everywhere should understand why we have taken up arms in what may be the greatest and longest struggle in our history.

LOOKING GIFT HORSE IN THE MOUTH

Our purpose in opposing Russia is grossly misrepresented by our antagonists and woefully misunderstood even by those who must be our friends, if we are to win. The recipients of our lend-lease in the war, the Marshall plan aid in peace, and our assistance in rearmament of the Atlantic Pact countries are looking those gift horses in the mouth and uneasily wondering if they are of the Trojan breed.

The world cannot get it in its head that for the first time a great power has risen which needs nothing but to be allowed to prosper in peace, asking for no lands or special privileges. If we say we are fighting for democracy, that word means little outside the United States, the commonwealth of nations and a little fringe of western Europe.

Is our objective freedom? Yes, but that is a far-off hope. There is no bill of rights east of the Rhine, nor south from Pyrenees to the Cape of Good Hope. Our ideal of the dignity of the individual is unknown in central and eastern Europe and clear across Asia. It is even less known from the Mediterranean to the bottom of Africa.

We Americans view communism with such alarm that our more or less socialistic allies across the Atlantic are questioning if there could be some grain of truth in the Russian propaganda that this is a war for Wall Street and American capitalism. A great majority of the people of Asia and Africa, perhaps a majority of humanity as a whole are propertyless, with no land or house and with no freedom to risk, with little else than the rags on their backs. That vast ocean of misery is a perfect fishing ground for the Reds with their slogan, You have nothing to lose but your chains.

The economic system of another country is none of our business. Our legitimate objection to Russian communism is that it is a thinner and thinner disguise for world domination by a barbaric police state. We were just as much against that kind of rule when Hitler, Mussolini, and the Japanese military clique had the backing of capitalism, and Stalin was on our team. The difficulty of our opposition to imperialism is that Asia and Africa notice that the imperialist powers are on our side.

FOR PEACE BASED ON LAW

We should seek and choose and stick to the largest common denominator of our aims. I venture to say that our central purpose is the building of a peace on a foundation of international law. The policy makers in Washington never were wiser than when they invoked the sponsorship of the United Nations for our intervention in Korea.

Of the 59 members of that organization, 47 definitely lined up behind us, with 6 Arab nations more or less evasive and only 6 others voting "No" on the resolution calling for an enforcement of the peace. If some governments are slow to send merely token reinforcements for the battlefront, we must remember that it will take time to develop the habit of such cooperation. To obtain that time, we are in Korea to save the United Nations.

Had we stood aside while the Kremlin moved its North Korean pawns into the Republic of South Korea, established by the United Nations, that organization would have been doomed to go the way of the League of Nations. The League failed when the European powers turned a deaf ear to Secretary Stimson's appeal for joint action to halt the Japanese invasion of Manchuria in 1931. That was the go ahead signal for Mussolini to pounce on Ethiopia. Next Hitler was allowed to parade unopposed into Austria and then into Czechoslovakia.

All the while the great powers were peeping at the day of wrong through the little hole of appeasement. Just as the GI's are asking why they are being killed in Korea, the French asked in 1938, "Why die for Danzig?" And the British Prime Minister dismissed Czechoslovakia, the Korea of that situation, as a remote, almost unknown country.

PLAYED OUT GAME

In simpler days, a war could be localized and confined to two belligerents, with little injury to others. Nations now are so closely tied together in bonds of trade and communication, that a conflict anywhere breaks the peace of the world and becomes general. War has played itself out in our time. It is a hangover, as much of a delusion as witchcraft ever was.

The last war that apparently, only apparently, paid for itself out of the indemnity extorted from the loser was the Franco-Prussian War, 80 years ago. The Allies in the First World War thought they could make Germany pay the bill. They were going to demand shilling for shilling, ship for ship, and hang the Kaiser. But they abandoned reparations when they found that they would have to lend the Germans the money with which to pay them.

By the time of the Second World War, the victors had learned their lesson, and they have been paying Germany and Japan for losing. No sooner had they knocked out those enemies than they helped them to get on their feet, and the victors have spent millions to repair what they had damaged.

Granted that a warless world is an old dream, modern war has become a nightmare since 1914. In the course of those 36 years it has bankrupted all the great nations, except the United States. A third such catastrophe would make the ruin universal.

If we would stop all this confusing talk about subordinate questions and raise our banner against war itself we would have an appeal to the heart of every father, mother, lover on the planet. Even the Kremlin pays peace the tribute of lip service in its effort to pin the label of warmonger on the United States. Here is the great issue, on which no one would dare openly to meet us, and it is all-inclusive.

With peace, democracy, liberty and higher living standards inevitably would spread abroad. Without peace, democracy would be impossible even here in America and civilization would relapse into chaos.

WANTED: A SPOKESMAN

Calling Malik a liar is a waste of breath in shouting an undisputed thing. Let the State Department, our delegate at Lake Success, and the Voice of America keep the emphasis on world law and peace. This past week 28 Senators, Republicans and Democrats, under the leadership of Senator FLANDERS of Vermont, called for "a psychological and spiritual offensive against the Kremlin" and an effort "to bring the Russian and American people into contact and into relations of brotherhood."

Woodrow Wilson's voice penetrated the "iron curtain" of the German Kaiser, and that was before the radio. His messages and speeches were smuggled over the border by spies and airplanes. Enemy soldiers and peoples were forbidden, under the penalty of treason, to pick them up. But they passed from hand to hand, from mouth to mouth, and sometimes were hidden under the hearthstones of the peasantry, who treasured them as a new gospel of deliverance from war. Finally, it was not to the armies but to the President of the United States that the German and Austrian emperors came with their first offers of surrender.

Where is there a Wilson today? If the West has no such spokesman, the East has in the Prime Minister of India. Pandit Nehru is qualified to become the tongue of the silent masses of a war-stricken world.

Eavesdroppers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 29 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial entitled "Eavesdroppers," which appears in the Washington Post of today.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EAVESDROPPERS

Enough has been adduced in the Senate investigation of wiretapping to show that Police Lt. Joseph Shimon was a very busy man prior to and during the Hughes-Brewster controversy in 1947. Whether or not Senator BREWSTER was formally mixed up in the attempts to eavesdrop on the telephone conversations of Howard Hughes and of Attorney Hugh Fulton—and Mr. BREWSTER'S explanations so far have not been exactly convincing—it is apparent that a great deal of promiscuous wiretapping was going on. The disclosures fully warrant the spotlight the Senate District Committee is giving them. The Police Department has taken no action against Lieutenant Shimon, and the Department of Justice report of a year or so ago apparently was flubbed by the United States attorney. Even though a Federal grand jury earlier this month declined to indict Lieutenant Shimon before the statute of limitations expired, it is imperative for Congress and the public to know just what has been going on. Incidentally, in our opinion, there also is plenty of ground for police trial board action against Lieutenant Shimon.

The fact is that there is no legal basis for wiretapping of this sort, and even the wiretapping engaged in by the FBI in espionage and kidnapping cases rests on shadowy ground. The Federal Communications Act states flatly: "No person, not being authorized by the sender, shall intercept any communication and divulge * * * the contents." A letter from President Roosevelt in 1941 commenting on another piece of proposed legislation is used by the Attorney General to authorize wiretapping in criminal cases. But the Communications Act has not been changed, and the Supreme Court has interpreted the act to mean that there shall be no tapping and divulgence even if the divulgence is only to another person in a law-enforcement agency. The water has been muddied, to be sure, by a later mischievous decision by District Judge Holtzoff. But, in any case, as a private hired agent Lieutenant Shimon could hardly have tapped wires for any purpose except to divulge the information he obtained.

What all this points to is the need for clarification of the law by Congress. It is obvious that a great deal of wiretapping is practiced, not only by law-enforcement bodies, but also by Federal agencies having little relation to law enforcement and by individuals such as Lieutenant Shimon, acting in a private capacity. The reason is that there now is no middle ground between an absolute ban on wiretapping and the flagrant evasion of the law by private busybodies. What is necessary is legal recognition that there is a need for wiretapping in extremely serious crimes but that it must be conducted within the search-and seizure provisions of the fourth amendment. In other words, wiretapping ought to be permitted only when law-enforcement agencies obtain what is tantmount to a court warrant.

Chairman NEELY of the Senate District Committee has indicated that a bill to control wiretapping will be offered this week. Reportedly, it will be modeled on the New York law, which authorizes wiretapping by law-enforcement agencies but only with the assent of a judge in each specific instance. Such a law would not, of course, sanction the kind of private snooping for hire that Lieutenant Shimon has engaged in. We hope that Congress will take up the matter and that it will make whatever clarification it decides upon applicable not only to the District but to the Nation at large. A law which limited wiretapping to certain types of cases with specific court approval would both meet a need and make it easier to crack down on illegal wiretapping. There already has been far too much of this indiscriminate invasion of telephone communication by private ears, and Congress ought to slap stiff criminal penalties on those who take the law into their own hands.

Baltimore Chapter of American Jewish Committee Condemns Tactics of Russian Representative in the United Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. FALLON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. FALLON. Mr. Speaker, the Baltimore Chapter of the American Jewish Committee, through its chapter chairman, Mr. Shakman Katz, has made public its policy of denunciation of the tactics of the Russian representative to the United Nations, Delegate Jacob A. Malik. This message was sent to committee members in 500 cities throughout the United States.

I would like to recommend that the Voice of America use it in penetrating the iron curtain.

It might be well here to call attention to the opening paragraph of the Constitution of the United States:

We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity do ordain and establish this constitution for the United States.

So begins the Constitution with a statement of purpose. A purpose which if we are to remain a democracy and the peoples of the world are to remain free, we must keep before us.

The gentile and Jewish people—all have banded together, gentiles in the various churches, Catholics, Lutherans, Presbyterians, Methodists, and Mormans have spoken. It makes no difference, the theme is unity and the purpose is to obtain peace. We are all Americans, and as Americans we support the United Nations drive to obtain for all citizens the individual dignity which liberty assures now and forever.

Only an informed public can combat the untruths and obstructionist tactics for those who work and speak for Russia. We believe in God and His omnipotent power. The Communists do not. We believe in peace. The United Nations is an instrument of all peace-loving nations.

The American Jewish Committee, through the national president, Mr. Jacob Blaustein, has enunciated the following:

[From the Baltimore Sun of August 27, 1950]

JEWISH GROUP ATTACKS REDS—SEEKS TO EXPOSE DISTORTIONS IN UN DISCUSSIONS

Exposure of Communist distortions of facts in United Nations discussions has been a major objective of the Baltimore chapter of the American Jewish Committee, Shakman Katz, chapter chairman, announced yesterday.

The declaration of policy of the local unit follows a denunciation of the tactics of Soviet Delegate Jakob A. Malik by Jacob Blaustein, national president of the committee.

In a special message to committee members in 500 cities, Mr. Blaustein warned that only an informed public opinion can prevent the obstructionist tactics of the Russian delegate from succeeding.

"There is a danger that a large segment of the world's population is being swayed by false statements issuing from Communist sources, and particularly from the rostrum of the United Nations, where Jakob Malik has abused the privileges of his office and has misused the hopes for peace of the free nations of the world," Mr. Blaustein said.

"Therefore, I ask that you at once use your own channels of communication * * * to encourage confidence in the United Nations despite the fact that it is possible for one nation to so subvert and abuse temporarily the instrumentalities of the world organizations."

It is a statement that all creeds have adhered to generally with the same devotion to enlightenment.

The Baltimore chapter of the American Jewish Committee is to be congratulated upon its courageous stand and statement, which indicates the awareness of its membership to the dangers inherent in men and philosophies representing the Communist ideology.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an article from the Scranton Times relative to the forty-fourth annual convention of the Pennsylvania State Association of Elks held at Scranton, Pa.:

FIFTEEN HUNDRED AT PROGRAM MARKING OPENING OF ELKS CONCLAVE—ADDRESSES AT TEMPLE STRESS AMERICANISM AND TENETS OF ELKDOM—SOCIAL ACTIVITIES SCHEDULED TODAY—OFFICIAL RECEPTION PLANNED TONIGHT

Social activities at the forty-fourth annual convention of the Pennsylvania State Association of Elks continued today in this city following a colorful convention-opening program last night in Masonic Temple attended by about 1,500 Elks and their guests.

The Masonic Temple program keynoted addresses that stressed Americanism and the tenets of Elkdom in the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man.

This morning was devoted to a tour of inspection by delegates and their guests of the giant Murray Corp. plant in South Scranton.

This afternoon is reserved for a theater party and shopping by the ladies and also a visit to the dental clinic for indigent children established by Scranton Lodge 123, convention host.

A ritualistic competition and golf tournament also are booked this afternoon with five lodges competing in the former event in the lodge home. Attorney William Farrel is chairman of the golf tourney at the Country Club of Scranton.

WARNS OF ALIEN FORCES

Principal address at the opening program last night in Masonic Temple was by George I. Hall, Lyndbrook, N. Y., past grand exalted ruler, who warned of alien forces undermining the American form of government.

The prelude was by the philharmonic orchestra under the baton of Madea Cetta. Postmaster Conrad introduced the members of his general convention committee, and Exalted Ruler Mastriani presided. Seated on the stage and introduced by Mr. Mastriani were lodge officers. National and Elks colors were posted by the color guard of Koch-Conley Post, American Legion, while Boy Scouts massed the flags of the United Nations. Rev. Leo F. Duerr, Sunbury, State chaplain, asked invocation and Mr. Mastriani led in the allegiance pledge.

Following the pledge, the audience sang the Star-Spangled Banner led by the Schubert Club, directed by Goumod Evans. Entertainment was by the Schubert Club and Gloria McNally Haines, soloist. Marilyn N. Bennett was accompanist.

Mayor James T. Hanlon, member of Scranton Lodge, gave the address of welcome and Rev. Martin H. King, of Georgia, chaplain of the grand lodge, offered benediction.

Mr. Hall at the outset of his address paid tribute to the State association which, he said, shows the "leadership and carries the banner of Elkdom" in the entire association.

He explained what Elkdom is and said that the members of the organization number over 1,000,000 who are concerned principally with Americanism.

"The BPOE is composed of red-blooded Americans of all walks of life who are desirous and determined to preserve American institutions," he declared.

"Nowhere else in the world can man have the freedom of action and expression that we have in America," he said.

"Never forget that this Nation was achieved in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal and created by God and not the State," he said.

AFTER THE PINKS

Charging that the United States has been plagued for years by communism, he declared that "unless we awaken to the fact that we have a fifth column in every city and hamlet in America they are going to take everything away from us that we hold dear, and they are doing it fast."

"The ones I'm after," he said, "are the pinks—they are the ones who are too yellow to admit they are Reds and they stand behind the Constitution of the United States of America.

"They are the ones who wave the flag when they are caught and stand on their constitutional rights," he declared.

Mr. Hall said this type of citizen "should be sent back to the country they claim to love and then sink the boat on the way over."

The speaker asserted that Elks always maintain that the State exists only to serve man. "Wars," he said, "are not acts of God. Wars are made by man and I believe that wars can be done away with—we can do it by sensible thinking—by remembering that man is made by God."

Mr. Hall added that "we must build in the minds of youth the highest regard for their birthright and the deepest desire to preserve the American way of life. We must strengthen the teaching of what democratic principles means and that is free enterprise."

The speaker concluded by charging that pople who don't like our way of life "should be thrown out of the country."

Judge Eagen, who holds the distinction of being the only exalted ruler of Scranton lodge to be elected to two terms, declared in his address that "there is only one 'ism' in the lives of our members and that is Americanism."

JUDGE EAGEN SPEAKS

Judge Eagen's talk on Elkdom in this community follows:

"I hope you won't mind if I delve into a bit of history. The story of Elkdom in Scranton is truly one of the highlights in the life story of this fine, progressive, and friendly city.

"The county of Lackawanna, of which Scranton is the seat, is the youngest of the entire 67 counties in this great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

"It was carved out of Luzerne County, April 17, 1878. The cornerstone of the courthouse was laid May 25, 1882.

"Scranton was incorporated as a city April 23, 1866.

"And it was in Scranton on November 1, 1886, that the first electric streetcar was operated.

"Just 3 years later, May 2, 1889, the Scranton Lodge of Elks was founded and chartered at the historic Wyoming House on Wyoming Avenue.

"The lodge had 16 charter members. The last of the group was Judge M. F. Sando, who died a few years ago. He served in the Orphans Court for nearly 50 years.

"The cornerstone of the Elks clubhouse was laid Thanksgiving Day, 1914. During its existence it has been served by 61 different exalted rulers, 30 of whom still survive. Upon these different occasions, 1908, 1922, and 1950, it has had the honor of serving as host lodge to the State convention.

"The watchwords of the great Order of Elks are charity, justice, brotherly love, and fidelity. Humanity is the key of the order.

"There are the foundations upon which the order is based. These are the magic words which, in the short period of 83 years, have made the Elks the greatest society of its kind in the world. I am proud of my Elks membership. I am proud to be a part of the Elks lodge.

"During its existence the Scranton lodge has proved itself worthy of its affiliation, worthy of its name. Its men are in the forefront of all civil and community endeavors. The names of its members are closely related with the programs and life of this locality.

"A true Elk believes in the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. Scranton Elks are living examples of what we should all be in this regard.

"This section of God's green earth is known for its friendliness and humane people. Here if one has a joy it is also his neighbor's joy. If one has a sorrow, that, too, is shared by those close by. If one needs help it need only to be known to be answered.

"In short, 'love thy neighbor,' is something more than mere words here. In this section, too, we find very little prejudice and intolerance. Race and creed are considered relevantly unimportant. Race or nationality is taken for what it is—an accident. One's creed it left to a man's discretion.

"It has well been proved that the Scranton lodge has been a potent factor in the bringing about of these happy situations. We have taught our friends and neighbors by examples that we care not whether a man is a Jew or Gentile, Catholic or Protestant.

"All we decree is that he be a human being and 100 percent American. We not only preach charity, we practice it and live it."

ONE ISM IN LIVES

"We are Americans and we love our country. We would die if necessary to protect and serve it. There is only one ism in our lives and that is Americanism. God bless America and God bless the great Order of Elks," Judge Eagen concluded.

The jurist in his address listed the following acts as examples of the part Elks take in welfare here:

Contributed $8,200 for the equipment and maintenance of the Elks nonsectarian clinic at the Catholic Youth Center.

Contributed $2,000 for the equipment and maintenance of youth playgrounds in the city.

Annually spend $3,500 at a Christmas charity party where approximately 250 boys and girls are clothed from head to foot.

Contributed $500 to the Boy Scouts of America for the purchase of movie projector, screen, and films.

Contributed $1,000 to the LIFE campaign.

Have purchased artificial legs and chairs for crippled children.

Have made substantial contributions to the annual Red Cross campaign, infantile paralysis fund, heart campaign, cancer drive, and all other charitable activities.

Make annual visits to the Jewish Home, Home of the Friendless, Friendship House, and Maloney Home on Mother's Day with flowers, and smokes for the men on Father's Day.

PARADE IN RAIN

The Scranton lodge's preconvention parade Saturday night was held as scheduled through central Scranton streets despite a heavy rain that drenched paraders and spectators alike but failed to dampen the spirits of either.

Thousands of spectators including small children held aloft in parents arms braved the rain to watch the 30-minute procession. They sought whatever protection was available, umbrellas, doorways, marquees, etc., but the paraders were less fortunate and just "had to take it."

The inclement weather made the staging of the street demonstration doubtful throughout the afternon and early night and it was not until 8.15 p. m. that the decision was made to hold the parade. This came in order not to disappoint the thousands of spectators

Max L. Silverman, past exalted ruler and officer of the day, gave the signal for the parade to start and 10 minutes later the marchers, who were marking time waiting for the order, were organized and the parade moved off from the starting point, Wyoming Avenue and Vine Street. It had no sooner started than the rains came again and continued for 15 minutes drenching the marchers and practically all others braving the elements.

Included in the procession were the Scranton lodge's marching club, decorated automobiles, musical organizations. Postmaster Conrad, chairman of convention arrangements, was marshal. John Dennebaum and Sam Druck, cochairmen, and Mr. Silverman were his aides. Among the musical organizations were Madea Cetta's band, which entertained at the Elk's clubhouse prior to the parade; Kemp Post, American Legion, Stroudsburg, drum and bugle corps, which drilled in intricate maneuvers and cadence; Electric City Post, Veterans of Foreign Wars, drum corps; Dalton high school band; Waymart drum corps; Raymond Henry Post, American Legion band Olyphant.

Guests and Elk officers, and finalists in the convention beauty show rode in decorated cars.

Earlier Saturday evening, a "scrap heap dinner" was served in the Elks home in honor of the lodge's past exalted rulers. They were presented plaques in tribute to their services to the association. Past and present State officers and grand lodge officers attended.

Immediately following the parade, Mr. Silverman officially opened the court of honor on Vine Street. He said the court was temporarily closed 28 years ago and "reopened tonight under a rather dismal setting resulting from the rain."

Judging of parade competitions was made from the court of honors, and prizes were awarded as follows: Crystal Band, East Scranton, $100; Waymart Drum and Bugle Corps, $50; and Kemp Post, American Legion, $25. Erwin Cunningham, Scranton, was awarded a $25 prize for the best decorated automobile.

Judges were Gounod Evans, Harold H. Harrison, Central High School, and Horace Gregory, West Scranton High School.

Our Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Roger W. Babson:

BABSON DISCUSSES OUR FOREIGN POLICY

(By Roger W. Babson)

GLOUCESTER, MASS.—The country is disappointed by setbacks in Korea and alarmed at the possible prospect of a third world war less than 5 years after the second. Even if we do succeed in Korea, it will not cause enthusiasm among us—only relief. For all thinking Americans know by now that the Russian objective is subjection of the whole world. So, of course, any peaceful solution of the Korean problem can only be temporary. For Russia's policy is to divert America's attention from her strategy, disperse and scatter United States troops as thinly as possible over the globe, and to attack all soft spots everywhere from without and/or within.

PAST STUPIDITY

We may be our own worst enemies. We have been blind and foolish and some among us have even committed treason. Who on behalf of the United States consented at Yalta to the cutting in half of Korea, with Russia given control of the best developed industrial part of the country? Who withdrew United States aid to Nationalist China because Chiang Kai-shek refused to take Communists into the government? China would have been a bulwark against tyranny in the Orient. Who denied the military importance of Korea and Formosa only a few months ago?

Who ordered State Department files stripped of "derogatory" information on employees as early as 4 years ago? Who put Alger Hiss in high position at the formation of the UN and at the world-dividing conference at Yalta? Who partitioned Germany so that the United States, Britain, and France had no access to its main city and capital except by grace of the Russians? Who withdrew our forces from Korea months ago? Who failed to deliver what the non-Communist government asked in military supplies? It doesn't look to me as if our Government has been operating for us. It's actions have encouraged the spread of communism, caused us anxiety of mind, and a lien on our pocketbook.

PRESENT POLITICAL TRENDS

Months ago Senators TAFT, KNOWLAND, and MCCARTHY, among others, called attention to the danger in the Orient and the need for protective action. Today the President still appears loath to reorganize the Government on a nonpartisan basis. There is still a failure to appoint the best brains and ability in the country to the most important administrative positions. Also, there is a general feeling in Congress that all of Russia's friends have not been cleaned out of Government departments.

If a real emergency develops in the near future, we have reason to believe that price, wage, and material controls will go into effect immediately. Yet, it looks as if necessary action would be delayed if possible until after the coming congressional elections. If controls come again, we should let our Congressmen know that we want good judgment and restraint on the President's appointees to control jobs. The American people know now that they were pushed around by quite a few political crackpots of questionable loyalty during World War II.

OUTLOOK FOR COMMODITIES AND HOUSES

The transportation of foodstuffs great distances and possible losses of food-carrying vessels is always to be anticipated under war conditions. Therefore, no curtailing of crop production need be expected in the next year. A sharp crackdown on civilian consumption can be expected before the summer is over. Now may be a good time to buy an automobile; but there is no reason for now hoarding foods, clothing, or shoes. There will be some inventory accumulation in business; but not on a large scale.

The Korean war will tend to make prices fairly firm for the present. This applies especially to foods and livestock. The latter may drop in late summer or early fall. Grains will tend to drop too unless weather or war developments interfere. Industrial materials will rise moderately. This applies to metals, textiles, and building materials. Real estate, especially residential, could have an earlier slump than now anticipated because of an expectation among younger men of being drafted. This could curtail home purchases. All of these are of necessity short-term price trends, subject to the risk of war. If great amounts are now thrown into defense, our Government must cut civilian spending. If not, we are in for more inflation. We all know how dangerous that is.

Hoban Urges Preparedness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY P. O'NEILL
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an article from the Scranton Tribune, dated August 24, 1950, which includes remarks by Judge T. Linus Hoban, forty-fourth annual convention of the Pennsylvania State Association of Elks:

HOBAN URGES PREPAREDNESS—CIVILIAN SACRIFICE NEEDED, JUDGE SAYS

The Communist drive for world domination is deadly serious business and a do-or-die proposition for the democracies, President Judge T. Linus Hoban, a brigadier general and deputy commander of the Twenty-eighth Infantry Division, told the Elks Club convention committee Thursday night.

The Elks, as a patriotic organization, must help to lead the civilian population in all-out mobilization of all resources for a fight—military or otherwise—for peace, he said.

The Nation now is facing its most critical period since the War of 1812, when British troops captured the city of Washington, the Judge said, although few people realize they face a greater threat now than ever before in history.

The jurist-soldier reminded the group that communism is the philosophy of a group of nations who feel they must destroy any nation whose ideas conflict with theirs—who must eliminate everything that stands in their path.

"There's no use kidding ourselves," he continued. "They're bent on destroying us. And they'll do that," he said, "unless we react will all the means at our command."

Americans, Judge Hoban said, seem to think they can have all their peacetime comforts and still avoid the impact of this terrible force. "We can't do it," the judge declared, adding "that it is imperative that the Nation immediately mobilize every bit of its resources and manpower."

As a military man, he told his listeners, he will be putting a group of young men through the strictest kind of training—for battle. It may be, he pointed out, that they will be back in 6 months without firing a shot, but we can't bank on that.

With these young men making sacrifice of their time, and preparing to sacrifice their lives if necessary, civilians must be prepared to give up things they think desirable and to support with all their hearts the sacrifices the soldiers are going to make.

"The civilian population," said Judge Hoban, "must acknowledge that we may be hit."

"We must move fast," he said "against that danger."

He reminded them that atomic attack might strike Scranton. And if it should come to other cities first, this city might be forced to care for thousands of refugees.

"All citizens," he continued, "must realize the necessity of preparation—which involves sacrifice."

"And the Elks," he concluded, "must lead in the effort to support the total mobilization of the civilian and military resources of their community."

Labor—As Seen By Victor Riesel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHESTER C. GORSKI
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. GORSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Buffalo Courier-Express of August 22, 1950:

LABOR—AS SEEN BY VICTOR RIESEL

Daily glee in the Daily Worker over the screaming death of our GI's in blood-reddened rice paddies of Korea has so aroused our Federal Security police agencies that it may be only a matter of weeks before leaders of the American Communist Party, editors of the Stalinist sheets and party purveyors of "peace" are indicted for treason.

Even as this is being written, the best legal brains in the Department of Justice are at work trying to develop an airtight treason case against the Communists in this country on charges of giving aid and comfort to the enemy.

Every edition of the Daily Worker, every peace resolution passed by pro-Communist unions, every call issued by those responsible for peace riots on our city streets, every argument used by Communist agents urging slowdowns in our key factories, are being scanned right this minute inside the Justice Department.

Our security police and the Department of Justice have before them the cases of Tokyo Rose, Axis Sally, and Traitor Robert Best, all of whom have been tried and convicted. The burden of their sirupy broadcasts was not to attack the United States but to undermine the morale of our lads and urge them to go home. These air-wave warblings thus gave aid and comfort to the enemy.

Now comes the Daily Worker with actual attacks on our commander in the Orient, on our Air Force, and on our country, in addition to urging that our troops leave the Korean front.

In the Communist press there is real satisfaction over enemy successes, even though these mean the death of our GI's. Lest we forget the stuff the Daily Worker has been printing, I put it on the record, so you can see it as the Justice Department sees it now.

On August 11, the Daily Worker reported with apparent glee that "Korean people supply their army at night." And then followed this headline which says, of course, that the Korean people and not Soviet-trained armies are fighting us, with a Communist China news agency report that the people work day and night to frustrate our B-29's.

Nearly always using Communist news reports, the Daily Worker issues headlines like these across its pages: "Korean civilians slaughtered by MacArthur's bombs * * * MacArthur's secret tactic—slaughter of Korean civilians."

Just as closely scanned by the Justice Department prosecutors are the numerous appeals to labor by such Communist coordinators as Moscow-trained Marcel Scherer, peace petition chief, who constantly showers factory workers in key electronic plants with leaflets and letters smearing our ally, the South Korean government, as being guilty of the bloodiest crimes against the Korean trade-union movement."

The Commies sure are making the most of the liberty we give them here to spread venom against our allies, hatred for our Army, and disdain for our cause.

If this isn't treason, just what is it, as Soviet-Korean shrapnel tears into our men?

Communism Denounced at Elks' Business Session

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY P. O'NEILL

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1950

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an article from the Scranton Times dated August 22, 1950, concerning an address by Joseph B. Kyle, Gary, Ind., grand exalted ruler of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, forty-fourth annual convention of the Pennsylvania State Association of Elks held at Scranton, Pa.:

COMMUNISM DENOUNCED AT ELKS BUSINESS SESSION—CALLED POISONOUS CORRUPTION IN BLOODSTREAM OF CIVILIZATION BY GRAND EXALTED RULER—KITTANNING MAN IS ELECTED TO THE PRESIDENCY

Communism is now recognized for what it is and what it always will be—a poisonous corruption in the bloodstream of civilization.

Joseph B. Kyle, Gary, Ind., grand exalted ruler of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, so stated today at the first business session of the Pennsylvania State Association of Elks in annual convention in Hotel Casey here.

Mr. Kyle charged in his address that our Nation is fighting a religious war against a godless enemy—communism.

"Elkdom always has been, and always will be, the implacable foe of communism's evil nature and evil designs upon the liberties of men and the peace of the world," he said.

Francis T. Benson, Kittanning, vice president of the State association, was elected to the presidency at today's session, succeeding John H. Bennett, Renovo, who is presiding.

Other officers elected are: H. Earl Pitzer, Biglerville, vice president; William S. Gould, this city, secretary for his thirty-sixth consecutive term, and Charles H. Brown, Allegheny, treasurer for his sixth term.

Otto Grotofend, New Kensington, was elected a trustee for a 5-year term. Marvin A. Swagert, Red Lion, was elected a trustee for 1 year to fill the unexpired term of Mr. Pitzer who was named vice president of the State association.

DELEGATES WELCOMED

The first business session of the forty-forth annual State convention opened with recognition being paid to past presidents and officers of the State association.

Some 450 delegates were welcomed officially by Postmaster Joseph F. Conrad, general chairman of convention arrangements; Mayor James T. Hanlon, Judge M. J Eagen, and Attorney Ralph G. Mastriani, exalted ruler of Scranton Lodge 123, convention host.

Grand Exalter Ruler Kyle confined his opening remarks to a discussion of Elkdom during which he stated that "fundamentally and positively we need more of the old-time religion in Elkdom."

"Old-time religion," he said, "is the basis of American democracy which is more than a mere form of government. It is a philosophy of life consonant with the natural law and illuminated by divine revelation."

The second phase of his address revolved around world conditions, in which he said:

POISONOUS CORRUPTION

"In the early years of its rise to power in Russia communism's propaganda succeeded in convincing some people, who should have known better, that it was a liberating force that was destined to bring peace and happiness to millions. Recent history has stripped this mask of communism, and today most of those wishful thinkers of a few years ago now recognize communism for what it was, what it is, and what it always will be—a poisonous corruption in the bloodstream of civilization.

"Nevertheless, there are some who are so stupid, or venal, or ambitious that they are willing to sell their country to Moscow. We are in a fight for everything that decent people value, and with the stakes so high we cannot afford to be tolerant of traitors. They must be sought relentlessly, exposed, and punished like any other enemy of society. Neither can we afford to tolerate those who are still so blind that they cannot see communism for what it has proved itself to be. Anyone who persists in collaborating with Communist organizations or in parroting Communist propaganda should not be surprised to find his fellow men united against him.

"Elkdom will continue to be a militant, dynamic force that lives, preaches, and teaches the glory of our Republic. The revolutionary spirit that proclaimed men's inalienable right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness flames today in the hearts of more than 1,000,000 Elks. It lights the star of fidelity that blazes above the altars of 1,563 Elk lodges throughout America. It is the spirit that urges us to go neither right nor left, but to go ahead."

PLEDGES COOPERATION

"I declare that so great is our devotion to country and its way of life we are all determined, as one, that while there is an Elk left on this earth our country shall never run the slightest risk of prostration beneath the trampling feet of communism or any foreign foe. To that we cooperatively pledge."

MAKES PLEA FOR SECURITY

"Certainly one of the most vital services that any Elks' lodge can render to its community is to make sure that that community is made secure against attempts by subversive groups to weaken and destroy our American way of life.

"Today our order has a greater challenge than during any period of its existence. With the powerful influence of our 1,000,000 members, we can and we must assist in keeping America strong.

"War clouds are hovering over the world again, and in all likelihood our subordinate lodges again will be called upon to assume leadership of the local and national activities wherein they performed such patriotic and unselfish service during two former great armed conflicts.

"Our Nation is fighting a religious war against a godless enemy—communism.

"Elkdom always has been, and will always be, the implacable foe of communism's evil nature and evil designs upon the liberties of men and the peace of the world."

Remarks also were made this morning by J. Edgar Masters, Chicago, past grand exalted ruler and grand secretary; Howard R. Davis, Williamsport, grand trustee; and Charles H. Grakelow, Philadelphia, past grand exalted ruler.

Grand Exalted Ruler Kyle this afternoon had luncheon in Hotel Casey with his eight Pennsylvania district deputy exalted rulers who were appointed recently. They are: Victory C. Diehm, Hazleton; C. H. Also present were Lee Donaldson, Pittsburgh, past State president, and a member of the grand lodge activities committee; Mr. Masters and F. J. Schraeder, Pittsburgh, assistant grand secretary.

Grakelow, Philadelphia, chairman; Howard R. Davis, Williamsport; F. J. Schraeder, Pittsburgh; Grover Shoemaker, Bloomsburg; and Dr. Charles V. Hogan, Pottsville.

Other district student-aid awards will be presented in the respective districts of the State association.

Recipients of student awards and their parent-escorts were guests of the student-aid committee at luncheon in Hotel Casey.

Visiting women were entertained at a luncheon and fashion show in Hotel Jermyn. Visiting Elks this afternoon competed in a golf tournament at Country Club of Scranton.

Tonight at 8:30 there will be a drill team competition at the court of honor and this will be preceded by a band concert at 8 p. m. Drill competition today will be by Jersey Shore, Pottstown, Erie, and Carlisle lodges.

The second business session of the 5-day parley will be tomorrow from 10 to noon and will be marked by a memorial program. At noon, delegates and guests will go to Rocky Glen for an outdoor picnic featured by choral competition, athletic events, band concert, circus acts, barbershop quartet singing, games, and finals of the beauty contest. A box luncheon will be served.

Tomorrow night at 8:15 a band concert will be presented at the court of honor, Vine Street, by the Elks Boys Band of Lodge 15, Washington, D. C. A chorus of 50 male voices and a dance group of 35 young men from York Lodge 213, directed by Ralph Whooley will appear. Francis G. Smallbrook is York lodge exalted ruler.

Charles Lebowitz will be officer of the day tomorrow. His aides will be John P. Dennebaum, Patrick J. Manley, Sam Druck, Aaron D. Goodman, and Leo J. Creegan.

Some 450 Elks and their guests assembled last night at a grand exalted rulers' reception in Hotel Jermyn at which grand lodge State and local officials were honored. Recognition for outstanding service was accorded in the presentation of scrolls and certificates of merit.

Anthracite souvenir clocks were given to Joseph B. Kyle, Gary, Ind., grand exalted ruler; J. Edgar Masters, Chicago, past grand secretary; Charles H. Grakelow, past grand exalted ruler, and Mr. Bennett, State president. The presentations were made by Mayor Hanlon, Judge Eagen, District Attorney Carlon M. O'Malley, and Exalted Ruler Mastriani.

PLAQUES PRESENTED

Plaques were given 66 State and national executives and 51 convention committee members. Past Exalted Ruler Dennebaum made the latter presentation.

Postmaster Joseph F. Conrad, convention committee chairman, presented awards of merit to the members of the honorary convention committee: E. J. Lynett, editor and publisher of the Times; M. L. Goodman, copublisher of the Tribune and Scrantonian; Brig. Gen. T. Linus Hoban, Mayor Hanlon, Judge Eagen, Orphans Court Judge James F. Brady, Congressman Harry P. O'Neill and District Attorney O'Malley.

The Schubert Chorus, directed by Gounod Evans, entertained. Dancing followed. James A. Veras was officer of the day, assisted by Aaron Goodman, Mr. Creegan, Mr. Dennebaum, Secretary Gould, and Exalted Ruler Mastriani.

Scranton has been listed as tops in sociability by Larry Collins, Burbank, Cal., master of ceremonies at performances presented by Scranton Lodge for the entertainment of visiting Elks each night in the Elks Club.

The convention also is serving as the seventeenth reunion of Mr. and Mrs. Orrie Kline, Bellefonte, and Mr. and Mrs. Harry Tompkins, Braddock. They first became acquainted at the State convention in 1933 in Bethlehem and have been meeting at conclaves since then.

Address of Hon. Glenn R. Davis, of Wisconsin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES E. POTTER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, last Saturday, August 26, our beloved colleague, the Honorable GLENN R. DAVIS, of Wisconsin, addressed the Northern Michigan Republican Association assembled in convention at Sault Ste. Marie, Mich. His forthright address received the great acclaim of those assembled and I am inserting it in the RECORD for the edification of the Members of Congress. The address follows:

I am glad to be here in the neighboring State of Michigan. Sometimes I have doubted Michigan's neighborly feelings or intentions on the gridiron, but I do recognize in Michigan's furnishing us with our fine football coach at Madison, Ivan Williamson, a neighborly act.

This part of Michigan I know only through the tall tales told me by JOHN BENNETT and CHARLIE POTTER. I regret that John could not join us tonight, but with Charlie here, Michigan's Republican House delegation has a capable spokesman.

In all sincerity, I recognize CHARLIE POTTER, as I know you do, as one of the finest Republicans in Congress. He thinks and talks like a Republican, and when the chips are down he has the guts to vote like a Republican—to vote for what is right for his country even when it hurts. In these days of powerfully organized pressure groups, in these days of shameless raids on the Federal Treasury, it takes more than ordinary determination to vote the way that CHARLIE POTTER has voted in the 3 years that he has been in the House of Representatives. He is my able and helpful coworker. He is your able and helpful Representative in Washington. He is our good friend.

Before going further, I certainly want to pay my respects to your great and nationally known team of Republican Senators—ARTHUR VANDENBERG and HOMER FERGUSON. Not only Michigan, but the entire Nation is fortunate that we need not risk a continuation of the services of either of them this fall. We need them in these troubled days.

These days are indeed troublesome and worrisome. Americans everywhere are bewildered over the state of affairs which finds us for the second time within a decade hovering on the brink of a world conflict. People are looking to Washington for some of the answers. In their letters they write—how did we get into this mess? Why are we so pitifully unprepared? Where did our defense money go? What are we going to have to do now?

It is foolish and dangerous to minimize the threat we face. We are in grave danger from Communist aggression. Let us face that truth, however hard it may be, and whatever sacrifices the truth may require.

It is proper, to begin with, to try to find out how and why we got into this mess—to examine the mistakes we have made which are responsible for our dilemma, so that we may avoid their repetition. The Democrats don't like to have us examine the record of the recent past—to put the finger on the mistakes that were made—because they were their mistakes, and their fair-haired fumble boys who made them. They would like to pass it off by saying "what's the use of crying over spilled milk?" But as Roosevelt the first, Theodore that is, said—we should cry over spilled milk, because only in that way will we make sure that we don't spill it again.

The 5 years of mistakes which led to Korea began at Yalta in 1945. There the ailing President Roosevelt, with Alger Hiss at his side, sold China, the traditional friend of the United States in Asia, down the river. The traditional policy of supporting a sovereign and independent China was secretly abandoned. This betrayal of our Asiatic friend, China, to appease, and, yes, even bribe, our new Euro-Asiatic ally, Communist Russia, was confirmed at Potsdam by President Truman in August of 1945. From then on, to Harry Truman at least, it was good old Joe Stalin but bad old Chiang Kai-shek. A few months later, all aid to the Chinese Government was abruptly halted—no more lend-lease, no more planes, no more ammunition. A loan that had been authorized and earmarked was side-tracked. And why? Why did we pull the rug out from under Chiang Kai-shek? President Truman announced this beautifully wrapped present to Joe Stalin just before Christmas of 1945—we did it because the Nationalist Government refused to admit the Communists, or, as the fuzzy thinkers called them, the Chinese agrarians, into the high councils of its government.

Thus was established a policy for China that in order to get our help the Government must take the Communists in. This was in direct contrast, even though the two later existed side by side, with our policy in Europe of denying Marshall plan aid to governments which let the Communists in.

The fate of China was sealed. If the Communists were admitted they eventually, by sabotage or deception, would take over a government that already had been weakened by 12 years of war. If the Communists were not admitted, then the Nationalist Government would get no more American aid, and could not possibly cope with the Russian-trained, Russian-armed Communists from the north.

With China, the Asiatic heartland, the palm of the Asiatic hand, handed to the Communists by default, it was plain that the pressure would next be directed to the thumb of Asia, the Korean peninsula. When Haberdasher Harry sold the shirt off China's back, he tossed in the necktie for Korea's throat for good measure.

Not only did Truman and his State Department thus assure the isolation and pressurizing of Korea, they cut the small nation in two arbitrarily at the thirty-eighth parallel in September of 1945 and invited the Russians to come into the northern half and take over as masters. Instead of an isolated country, the Republic of Korea became an isolated half-country. From the very first North Korea became a Soviet state, indoctrinated and militarized. With Russian pressure mounting at the thirty-eighth parallel you would have thought that we would have strengthened our position there. Quite the contrary was true. Over the protest of General MacArthur, General Hodge, and his 40,000 American troops were withdrawn, leaving only 500 American technical advisers to aid the South Koreans. The responsibility for this decision, according to the testimony of Secretary of Defense Johnson in recent weeks, rests with the White House and the State Department. The State Department was evidently acting on the advice of Owen Lattimore, who had prepared a memo on this question at the request of Philip Jessup. Lattimore's advice was this: "The thing to do was to let South Korea fall but not to let it look as though we pushed it."

Events since then have fit into that pattern. In September 1949, $10,250,000 was earmarked for military assistance to Korea. Of that, $200 worth was permitted to trickle through until the time of the invasion on June 25. As Syngman Rhee, President of the South Korean Republic said: "I asked for antitank guns. I did not get antitank guns. I asked for antiaircraft guns. I got none. I asked for ammunition for what few rifles we had. I got no ammunition."

On January 19 of this year, after a delay of 6 months in bringing it to the floor of the House, the much publicized Korean-aid bill was brought to a vote. This is the bill which the national headquarters of the CIO and the Democratic National Committee are attempting to use as a smoke screen to cover the obvious inadequacies of the Democratic administration. I suspect that you have heard some of their parroting minions pointing the finger at CHARLIE POTTER and saying "CHARLIE POTTER voted against Korean aid. CHARLIE POTTER is responsible for the Korean war."

The Democratic National Committee were not the first to use the propaganda of telling a big lie and telling it often enough in order to get some people to believe it. There was not a single antitank gun, not a single antiaircraft gun, not a single round of ammunition in that bill. Instead it provided for funds for power plants, for insecticides, for fertilizer. All the aid was purely economic. None of it was military. The Republican members of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, in the minority report, correctly and truthfully said: "Unless this Nation is prepared to meet force with comparable force, economic assistance cannot of itself insure the safety or the integrity of South Korea. To the contrary, there is every reason to believe that the lending of economic assistance at this time would only enhance the prize to be taken by force of arms and internal intrigue. Our forces, with the exception of an advisory mission, have been withdrawn from South Korea at the very instant when logic and common sense both demanded no retreat."

To cover the disorder of the retreat, the Democratic leaders chose to maintain a bold front. Representative JOHN MCCORMACK, the Democratic leader of the House, said, "We established the Korean Republic * * * it is capable of resisting any aggression from North Korea." Democratic Representative JOHN KEE, chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee said, "The testimony before our committee was that the Republic of South Korea is today in a condition where it has the power and ability to take care of that situation insofar as invasion from any country north of it is concerned."

The shame and the hypocrisy of this squirt-gun Korean aid measure was exposed by Republican Representative WALTER JUDD, of Minnesota, who spent 10 years as a medical missionary in China. In the debate on the House floor, Mr. JUDD said: "There is no question but that there are people in the State Department who think South Korea is doomed as a result in no small degree of our own Government's blunders in this whole area which they want to cover up. They ask us to put up this money now so that if and when the day comes that Korea goes, they will have their alibi already prepared. They can then issue a white paper on Korea and say, 'Well, we did everything we could, and Congress appropriated plenty of money, but the Government of Korea was just so incompetent and inefficient and undemocratic and corrupt, that it failed to hold the support of the people and so collapsed before the Communists.' "

"To those people this bill never was a bona fide effort to save Korea. It is a phony—an attempt to shift blame from themselves to the Communists for the Communist conquest of Korea which they expect. If we make the money available, they can blame the Koreans; if we were not to pass the bill they could blame the Congress. In any case the primary aim to them is to get themselves off the hook in Asia to get an excuse for their failure to save Korea all fixed up in advance."

On June 25 that expected blow fell. The North Koreans invaded all along the thirty-eight parallel. In a swift change of policy, completely reversing the Acheson-Jessup-Lattimore policy, the President ordered our Armed Forces into Korea and ordered the Seventh Fleet to defend Formosa. This at least was action and most Americans applauded it. Besides, it was to be only a police action. The Democratic leaders had convinced themselves and each other that the South Koreans wouldn't need much help. On June 13, 12 days before the invasion, William C. Foster, the Deputy Administrator for the Economic Cooperative Administration testified that, "A rigorous training program has built up a well-disciplined army of 100,000 soldiers, one that is prepared to meet any challenge of the North Korean forces."

Gen. William L. Roberts, the head of the United States Military Commission to Korea testified after the invasion that, "South Koreans were not adequately armed because our leaders feared they would attack North Koreans and thereby embarrass the United States. To prevent them from attacking we gave them no combat air force, no tanks, and no heavy artillery.

These self-satisfied administration leaders had the assurance of Louis Johnson, their colleague who was head of the Defense Department that, "Joe Stalin will know that if he starts something at 4 a. m. the fighting power of the United States will be on the job at 5 a. m."

Americans had a right to believe that we were prepared aside from Louis Johnson's blustering remarks. We had spent $50,000,000,000 from June 1946 to June 1950, the most that any nation has ever spent in times other than actual war. This was for the maintenance of our Defense Establishment. It did not include the billions for assistance to other nations.

Our demonstrated unpreparedness compels us to ask: Where did all the money go? Where are the arms we thought we were buying? The pity of it is that those to whom we have entrusted that responsibility simply do not know.

Some things we have been able to find out. For instance we know that only $1 out of every $7 that we spent for defense has gone for actual arms. That $2 out of every $3 has gone for what the armed services call housekeeping. That we have spent more for civilian employees of the armed services than we have for all our weapons, planes and equipment. That our acquisitions of combat equipment has been less than enough to replace wornout items. Not a single new tank was added to our armament.

What happened to the 25,000 tanks that we had at the end of World War II? Many of them were sold at less than 10 percent of value as surplus. Ten thousand of them simply disappeared into thin air. The Hoover Commission's national security task force uncovered that. Of the 25,000 postwar tanks, in 1948 the Army records accounted for 15,000. The task force reported that the Army was unable to state what had become of the others.

The story of the disintegration and decline of the other branches of the armed services is too familiar to require repetition. The Air Force was reduced to 38 groups in 1946. The Republican Eightieth Congress added $822,000,000 beyond the President's request in order to rebuild the Air Force to a respectable strength. Of that, President Truman impounded $753,000,000. Later Secretary Johnson withheld $243,000,000 more. Thus nearly a billion dollars of additional funds for rebuilding the Air Force were arbitrarily impounded by the President and his Secretary of Defense. Again in April of this year, the Republicans took the leadership in adding $350,000,000 for the Air Force. Until the time of the Korean invasion, none of that money had been used.

The scuttling of our Navy, the cancellation of the carrier United States, without previous notice to Admiral Denfeld, the abuse of Admiral Denfeld and his subsequent forced resignation because he dared to speak out before a congressional committee, is indeed a sordid tale. It was the same with the Marine Corps. Secretary Johnson had the Marine Corps headed for oblivion. The corps was permitted to sink to 71,000 men, all of whom, except for a few embassy guards, were kept in the continental United States. The Eightieth Congress saved the integrity of the Marine Corps, but at the time of the Korean invasion it was only at 65 percent of its authorized strength. And so while Acheson flustered and Johnson blustered, ill-equipped and badly outnumbered American men were sent into combat in Korea.

It falls to us once again as Republicans and as Americans to bail out the boat we are in. This has often been our Republican lot in recent times. It's a cinch we can't bail out with the lame excuses of the Democrats. The Truman cronies have soft-pedaled and minimized the "police action" in Korea. Surely no reasonable man can discount the possibility that the conflict in Korea may be the forerunner of world war III. Since that is true, we must prepare for any eventuality. If we prepare and war does not come, we will have been put to the inconvenience and the expense of unnecessary mobilization. If we fail to prepare and the Communists strike at other critical portions of the globe, we shall risk defeat for our country and enslavement of men everywhere. An informed American public, under the leadership of men and women who are not afraid to tell the truth, will be ready to make whatever sacrifices are necessary to assure security.

We must rebuild the military strength which the Democrat leaders have frittered away in the last 5 years. The Marine Corps' maximum effective readiness must be established and its integrity maintained. There must be a remobilized defense establishment that counts its power in fighting men and effective weapons instead of blustering sounds and sounding brass. The badly neglected and deliberately discouraged reserve components of the armed services must be expanded, trained and equipped, and then retained in that status.

Such necessary programs will cost money. American citizens will have to tighten their belts and bear a heavy load. The cost of this security program must be met currently. This action is dictated by our responsibility to future generations and by the need to combat the forces of inflation. Taxes today are already at an abnormal rate and consequently first emphasis must be placed upon the diversion of present nondefense spending to meet defense needs. Spending for activities of government that in ordinary times may be desirable must give way to the greater and immediate needs of the national security. This requires the elimination of all spending not essential for our basic and defense needs.

Thanks to Truman mismanagement and petty bickering among his cronies, the cities, towns, and villages of America today stand almost defenseless in the face of serious threat. This is a matter of urgent necessity and yet our Federal Government has lagged behind. Such progress as has been made thus far can be attributed largely to the initiative, the ingenuity and determination of our local civic leaders.

Each passing day brings us closer to a program of controlled prices, wages, profits, and credits. Disgraceful hoarding, new strikes and wage demands, unconscionable profiteering are forcing the American people closer and closer to that distasteful necessity. As Republicans, our responsibility will be to insist upon the fair administration of such a program and, most important, to see to it that such controls are revoked once the emergency period is over.

The American people cannot be expected to cooperatively bear these heavy burdens unless they have confidence in the top officials of our Government. They do not have such confidence in the two top officials of the Truman Cabinet. Whether they are self-made scapegoats or Truman-made scapegoats is immaterial. The necessity for restoring public confidence demands the resignation of Dean Acheson and Louis Johnson—now.

It is folly to mobilize Americans for combat against communism abroad, if we fail to take effective action against communism here at home. So far the Truman Democrats have used nothing stronger than pious words and a whitewash brush. The tide is now beginning to turn. No thanks to any of the administration leaders, but thanks to the dogged determination of Republican Members of the Senate and the House, a Communist control bill will probably pass before this session of Congress adjourns. The Ferguson-Mundt-Nixon bill to control subversive activities will reach the floor of the House on Monday. Favorable action not later than Tuesday is assured. Meantime, Senators FERGUSON and MUNDT have wrested a promise from the Senate majority leader that a similar measure will be brought to the floor of the Senate before adjournment.

Of course laws alone will not control communism. We need public officials who are dedicated to the enforcement of those laws—public officials who will not turn their back on Communists, not for the reason given by Dean Acheson in refusing to turn his back on Alger Hiss, but because they want to watch their every move. Too many of our public officials have turned their back on Communists only because they didn't want to see them at their nefarious work.

Fellow Republicans, there are many mistakes of the last 5 years that need to be corrected. Our responsibility now has been well set forth by Dr. Kenneth W. Colegrove of the political science department of Northwestern University. He said, "The best that we can do now is to rally under our President and fight the war to a finish." I agree with that. I also agree with the second part of his statement in which he said, "being sure, however, to replace him in the Presidential election of 1952." To that we will all add a second and more immediate objective that we must elect a Republican Congress in November of 1950. The issue this fall is the same as it has been for several years. Whether we shall continue to follow the policy of vacillation and weakness with regard to communism at home or abroad or whether we shall adhere to the Republican policy of strength and constancy in that opposition.

The world cries and aches for peace. Such a peace we thought we had won 5 years ago. Five years of Truman mistakes have frittered that peace away, spent it, wasted it, lost it. The Truman administration, waist-deep in its own failures, cannot be expected to provide the weapons, the ideas, or the men for the mobilization of American manpower, material, and morale that is our grave need. For the sake of America, for the sake of America's friends throughout the world, we Republicans must fight for and accept the responsibilities of leadership this November. A Republican victory in November will be a victory for freemen everywhere.

Addition to Pennsylvania Power & Light Co. Plant at Sunbury, Pa.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. IVOR D. FENTON
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, the Pennsylvania Power & Light Co., through its president, Charles E. Oakes, has announced another large addition to its expanding operations.

It is just another chapter in this progressive company's forward program.

The following newspaper article from the Mahanoy City Record-American gives in detail the program of this fine organization. It follows:

PENNSYLVANIA POWER & LIGHT CO. PLANS ADDITION TO BIG SUNBURY PLANT

Pennsylvania Power & Light President Charles E. Oakes today announced another large addition to the company's big Sunbury plant is in the making. As part of the company's long-range plans for meeting any future needs of this important industrial area an additional 125,000 kilowatts of generating capacity has been ordered for Sunbury plant, the added generation to be in service by 1953. The big addition was included as part of the original design of Sunbury plant; fuel, railroad, and other supplementary facilities to serve this increased capacity are already built.

In a press conference today, the utility president stated that Pennsylvania Power & Light will continue to have adequate electric power ready and waiting regardless of how heavily the Nation may call upon central eastern Pennsylvania industry for all-out production. "Powerwise, this area is far stronger today than at the outset of World War II. The present Sunbury plant, together with the additions under way will alone nearly equal the company's total generating capacity in 1941. With electric power the driving force of all industrial production, I believe it important that the public be fully aware of our preparedness for any all-out effort."

Electric power, he said, was in unusually good supply, not only in central eastern Pennsylvania, but all over America. In the Pennsylvania Power & Light service area adequate electric power is available for military as well as civilian needs. Industry, of all types, will have plenty of electricity—and no curbs whatsoever will be required on residential and farm use.

Since the close of World War II, P. P. & L. has added 150,000 kilowatts of capacity, will have 100,000 more ready for early 1951, and expects to have the additional 125,000 kilowatts announced today in service during 1953. These substantial additions will make it possible to take care of customer requirements at least one-third greater than the present record level, and still maintain adequate capacity reserves.

Over the Nation, by the year end, the electric industry will have added seventeen and one-half million kilowatts to the fifty million total capacity at the end of World War II, and by 1953 will have increased its postwar additions by 38,000,000 kilowatts, * * * a total of 88,000,000 kilowatts and an increase of 75 percent over VJ-day. America already has nearly double the electric capacity in service that it had at the outset of World War II, and is producing as much electric power as the rest of the world combined. He also said northeastern United States alone was producing nearly as much electricity as all of Russia.

BIG NEED IS MANPOWER

Asked whether America's electric power resources were adequate for an immediate all-out war effort, Mr. Oakes gave an emphatic "Yes." The limiting factor to greater industrial production, he said, was the number of American workers available, not industrial plants or the supply of electric power to move industry's production lines. "Now employed in American manufacturing, mining, and construction industries are almost seventeen and one-half million people * * * they are presently supplied by the electric industry with nearly 131,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours a year.

"Presently unemployed, but available, are about 3,100,000 people. With the total number of workers available determining how much America can produce, the practical approach to immediate higher production is for industry to employ all available workers. Then, as conditions require, work the Nation's industrial plants over longer hours by more two- and three-shift operation, and step up the present 39½-hour workweek. Maximum workweek of World War II was an average of 45½ hours a week.

TO MEET PRODUCTION NEEDS

When industry increases production by going to two- and three-shift operation, the same power plants that supplied the one shift can work on through 24 hours and supply electricity for three-shift operation. If full-scale war production becomes necessary, and the number of workers and work hours are moved up to World War II top levels, industrial electric power consumption would step up from its present 131,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours yearly to 176,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours. This increased use of 45,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours a year, is obtainable simply by operating present electric generating plants more hours.

"With all available industrial workers of the Nation thereby accounted for, any further war production potential must come, as it did in World War II, from big cut-backs in civilian production. Simultaneously, electric power, presently used for civilian production, would be transferred to war use with no new demands on existing electric generating capacity.

"Full-scale war production also will ultimately require new industrial plants for specialized manufacture of war materials for which existing plants are not adaptable. For this, too, the electric industry has ample capacity * * * better than 50,000,000,000 additional kilowatt-hours are already available for this purpose. It is quite apparent that the electric power supply of the Nation is in excellent shape. America's big problem is to develop sufficient manpower.

"This total of 95,000,000,000 additional kilowatt-hours per year means the present use of electricity by America's major industries can be nearly doubled with no increased electric capacity being required, and without cut-backs in home and farm use."

Mr. Oakes said that in his company's service area the power supply paralleled the excellent national picture.

"From the standpoint of all-out war production," Mr. Oakes said, "the big difference between today and the beginning of World War II, is that in 1940 and 1941, while there were substantial electric reserves over and above the country's requirements of that period, the Nation's total industrial plant was not then operating at full scale, nor was America's productive potential nearly as big as it is today. Now the Nation's industrial capacity is the greatest in history, and while it is already operating at near-ceiling levels on a peacetime basis there are substantial electric reserves above industry's requirements even though full-scale wartime operations be put into effect around the clock."

Central eastern Pennsylvania was pointed out by the utility president as a strategic location for new industry. At one and the same time it offers, geographically, ready access to our major eastern seaports as well as the defensive advantage of lying inland among a protective series of hills. Among the other advantages are the many means of transportation to and from the area, the wide diversity of industry in so many of the communities served, and the large numbers of skilled workers available.

"The local area," he said, "had a good supply of skilled workers available, and that central eastern Pennsylvania with its large reserves of electric power could quickly return to its wartime responsibility as one of the major arsenals of the Nation."

Scranton Tops in Sociability

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY P. O'NEILL
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following article from the Scranton Tribune, dated August 22, 1950:

ELKS ENTERTAINER WHO TRAVELED THE WORLD LISTS CITY AS ABSOLUTELY TOPS IN SOCIABILITY

Hearty plugs for Scranton's friendliness are registered by Larry Collins, Burbank, Calif., master of ceremonies at the performances presented by the Scranton Lodge of Elks for the entertainment of delegates to the 44th annual State convention, friends and visitors.

Mr. Collins runs into superlatives in praising the sociability of Scrantonians, a segment of the world population he never contacted until a few days ago.

And Mr. Collins has been places, many places. He entertained with the USO in the ETO and Pacific during World War II. He moved through Europe, Asia and Africa with name bands in peacetime. He wound his way through all the States in the United States and Canadian provinces. And he even had the honor of being expelled from Nazi Germany during Hitler's heyday.

With all this geography for contrasts he places Scranton as the No. 1 area for enjoyment and a center where "a fellow is made to feel at home in an instant."

"There's something here. I don't know whether the atmosphere has an influence or not. But there's an air of friendliness in the people. It's contagious. It permeates visitors. They are always at home. It appears as though there are no strangers. That quality of sociability premeates everybody. It was inculcated into my person within an hour after I came to Scranton," he declared.

"The Elks stress brotherhood of man. That characteristic is right here in Scranton. It's not only noticeable, it's inescapable," Mr. Collins added.

Mr. Collins said he is a native and resident of Burbank, Calif. He stated he never entertained for the Elks until the last Christmas season at Burbank and he enrolled at that time.

Mr. Collins was with Fred Waring's, Paul Whiteman's and Russ Morgan's Bands. Mr. Morgan is a native of West Scranton.

Participation in the Korean War by Members of the United Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, as one of those who believes that the best if not the only way to preserve freedom in this troubled world is through the United Nations, I am pleased that the members of this vital Organization are beginning to actively participate in the Korean war. Through the press and radio, we hear of men and material arriving daily at the battle front.

It is not surprising that many of our citizens have been inquiring as to whether or not the United Nations was a name only. This query is natural since at first we were actually furnishing practically all of the troops and fighting equipment.

I am pleased to attach hereto a letter addressed to me under date of August 26, 1950, by Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson, giving a detailed list of what the several members of the United Nations are doing toward winning the Korean War. The letter follows:

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, D. C., August 26, 1950.

Hon. JOSEPH R. BRYSON,
House of Representatives,
Congress of the United States,
Washington, D. C.

In addition, a number of other states which supported the Security Council action in Korea have informed the Secretary General of their desire to provide assistance within the limits of their resources and have consulted informally with the United States to this end.

Radio Reports From Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRIS ELLSWORTH
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter received from a radio broadcasting station:

RADIO STATION KUIN,
Grants Pass, Oreg., August 19, 1950.

Hon. HARRIS ELLSWORTH,
Congress of the United States,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN ELLSWORTH: Regarding your note to us about your just-concluded Report From Congress series, I'd just like to pass the word on to you that the program was well received in this area. I have had personal contact with many listeners in this area who voluntarily commented on the program. In their opinion, the show was a valuable insight into the goings on back in Washington. In judging the listener reaction to the show, I believe the average person felt a lot closer to the National scheme of things, and gained a little more faith in Government after hearing the show. After all, by the time a story goes through the mill of AP or UP, and gets down to the local level, much of the punch has been lost.

As for my personal comment, I think the whole country would be a lot better off if more of you guys would do the same kind of off-the-cuff broadcast and present them to the folks back home. It would go a long way toward dispelling the idea in people's minds that Government is some kind of an impersonal machine which they are helpless to control, instead of what it is—the voice and will of the people.

Sincerely,

JACK SIVERT,
Program Director.

Anybody Want To Wager Money on Louis Johnson?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES E. POTTER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, Robert C. Ruark has a faculty for putting more meat in his column, cutting through sentimentality, than any other of our present-day columnists. I wish to insert his article which appeared in the Washington News of August 28:

ANYBODY WANT TO WAGER MONEY ON LOUIS JOHNSON?

(By Robert C. Ruark)

NEW YORK.—A "no" bettor, in crap shooting, is a guy who bets against the roller.

When it comes to Mr. Louis Johnson, our Secretary of Defense, I am strictly a no-bettor. Looie Defense said the Korean war will last only 6 to 8 months. I would love to believe it, but Looie said it, and I got to bet no. Looie has an almost perfect record of being wrong.

Looie told us we were in great shape, militarily. He said also we would be in big war business an hour after somebody hit us. He was instrumental in paring the muscle off our Armed Forces. He scrapped a carrier after the keel was laid without mentioning it to the Navy.

Looie passed through Korea with a confident grin. A few days later they threw out a new war. Looie put his faith in gimmick weapons, but forgot bows and arrows for the present Injun skirmish. No, I am not overladen with faith in Uncle Lou. His record is worse than mine at the race tracks.

My faith in politicians of all sorts has shriveled in the last few months. Our Fuehrer, after a steady diet of red herring, suddenly discovers the presence of spies, and sets up a clamor for inner security. Our cloak-and-dagger department seemingly got scooped on the Korean thing, so we installed Walter Bedell Smith as boss.

Henry Wallace shattered my dreams when he offered to grow two bales of cotton to the acre, where three bales grew without his help.

Now Henry has quit his Progressive Party and has even declared war on Korea, and has even come out tacitly for the A-bomb. This is the man who babbled of brotherhood with Russia. It occurs now that even Henry realizes he was wrong. Perhaps we may almost see Paul Robeson stumping for the Republicans.

There was a time when I was absolutely convinced that anybody who could play a musical instrument was impossible to defeat at the polls. But Senator GLEN TAYLOR got licked, even though he sings and plays and uses his family as a prop. This bodes ill for the guitar and has shaken my trust in the voters.

I believed Washington implicitly when they won a paper war with long-distance airplane and a push board full of electronic wonders; now that the bayonet is back and the GI's got it I am muddled. The cootie has come into his own again.

It is just getting tougher and tougher to dump your childish faith into the lap of any one soothsayer. I don't believe Louis Johnson knows much more about when the Korean war will end than you and I—or if it will ever end. I believe everybody is just about as uncertain and as fallible as the next fellow.

I bet "no" on all predictions, and so far the percentage has been against the roller.

Colorado's Mountain Beauty

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM S. HILL
OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, the popularity of the famous Rocky Mountain National Park which lies in the Second District of Colorado is again recognized by the people of the country.

I am greatly pleased to include with these remarks which I have been granted to extend in the RECORD, a newspaper clipping from the Denver Post of August 24, showing that the one millionth visitor has enjoyed the magnificence of the park this summer and from all indications an all-time attendance record will be set.

For relaxation, for beauty unexcelled, and for the genuine pride that rises in the breasts of all Americans in their great country, it is a privilege for me to add here that Colorado and the West boast proudly of its unsurpassed majestic beauty and extend the famous western welcome to everyone to come to Colorado and see for yourself.

The newspaper clipping follows:

PARK'S VISITORS PASS MILLION

ESTES PARK, COLO., August 24.—Rocky Mountain National Park has passed the million tourist mark.

Park officials said Thursday that the one-millionth visitor of 1950 went through the park's gates Wednesday. She was Mrs. Max Euell, of Mount Morris, Ill. She and her party were given free dinners and boat rides at Grand Lake by park officials who now believe a new all-time visitor record will be rung up this season.

The MacArthur Incident

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DONALD L. O'TOOLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from today's New York Times:

THE MACARTHUR INCIDENT

Following repudiation of Navy Secretary Matthews' reckless advocacy of a "war of aggression" in the name of peace, President Truman is now compelled to deal with an even graver conflict of opinion within his chain of command involving a seemingly growing split between our military and our diplomatic authorities. This conflict, which again imperils the bipartisan character of our foreign policy and exposes it to further assaults by Communist propaganda, has long been brewing. It has, however, assumed unwarranted proportions as a result of the unnecessarily pointed statement issued by General MacArthur on Formosa and the not exactly happy attempt of Mr. Truman to suppress it by ordering the General to withdraw it. General MacArthur obeyed, of course. But the statement had already reached the public, and the Republicans made certain of the widest publicity for it by inserting it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

It is, of course, axiomatic, irrespective of the merits of the controversy over Formosa, that as the White House emphasizes, there can be only one voice in stating the position of the United States in the field of foreign relations, and that voice must be the voice of the President. To determine the foreign policy of the United States and to give expression to it is both his constitutional prerogative and his duty, subject to such congressional limitations as the Constitution may provide. In view of this he may also require that all Government officials, in their own public expressions, stay within the framework of the policy he has laid down.

This applies with special force to our military leaders, who under the Constitution are subordinated to the President as Commander in Chief and are traditionally under civilian control. Any other course could only impair the consistency and continuity of our foreign policy and create a state of confusion which would defeat its effectiveness. President Truman is therefore quite right in repudiating divergencies from his policies within his chain of command, though it may be doubted that the method he chose in the case of General MacArthur was really the best available under the circumstances.

At the same time, while the statement of Secretary Matthews may be set down as a case of bad judgment, the MacArthur incident has far deeper roots which go to the heart of both the world situation we face and Mr. Truman's own conduct of our foreign relations. There can be little quarrel with General MacArthur's view that from a purely military standpoint it would be better that Formosa should remain in friendly hands, lest it become an unsinkable aircraft carrier and a submarine base for an enemy who from it could endanger the center of our whole defense perimeter in the Pacific and pose a new threat to peace. But in that matter we do not stand alone but are rather dependent upon the suport of other free nations and the United Nations who are not of one mind regarding it.

For that reason, what is militarily expedient and desirable is not necessarily politically wise or possible. The exigencies of military expediency have sometimes ruined nations, and it is still a good rule that generals may propose but that the political authorities must dispose. In that respect Mr. Truman's letter to Ambassador Austin reiterating that the security of the United Nations forces in Korea requires the impartial neutralization of Formosa, but that we have no designs on Formosa and welcome a United Nations investigation of our actions there, goes as far as it is politically possible to go at this time. General MacArthur's tribute to Mr. Truman's action regarding Formosa demonstrates that, as far as it goes, he is in agreement with it.

But there is another factor in the situation, and that is that to a far larger extent than most Presidents in the past Mr. Truman has delegated the conduct and exposition of our foreign policies to his Secretary of State and the State Department without proper coordination of the political and military points of view. The split between them was therefore an inevitable consequence, and General MacArthur's sharp denunciation of appeasement and defeatism which he sees deluding "so many people distant from the scene" is an obvious effort to bring the military viewpoint forcefully to the attention of both the President and the public.

In that respect he may have exceeded his competence. President Truman has in general been right in his foreign policy decisions and courageous in their execution. But it is nonetheless true that he could increase his service to the Nation by taking more active charge of our foreign policy and by doing more in expounding it to both the public and his subordinates, so all would know wither we are going and by what route.

A Solemn Warning

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD H. KRUSE, JR.

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. KRUSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to place in the Appendix of the RECORD, a most illuminating article by Columnist David Lawrence, concerning the recent speech by Secretary of the Navy Matthews. I well realize that Secretary Matthews' statement has stirred up considerable controversy and has been officially disavowed, but I also personally feel that Mr. Lawrence is absolutely correct when he states:

Mr. Matthews has involuntarily given everybody, however, a solemn warning.

I feel equally certain that in some respects the real issue before the democracies today is not being met in as forthright manner as is to be desired. The real aggressor at this time must be designated to the world, and unless such is accomplished in all channels, including the United Nations, the sacrifices of those on the battle front may ultimately prove to be in vain. Our course is inescapable, and let us therefore weigh carefully those vital decisions so necessary to the preservation of civilization.

Mr. Lawrence's column reads as follows:

A SOLEMN WARNING

(By David Lawrence)

What Secretary of the Navy Matthews said in his Boston speech about anticipating aggression by counterattack cannot be poohpooed as just irrelevant or indiscreet. For even though he spoke out of turn and has been reprimanded for it in the statement of disavowal issued by the State Department the issue he raised is fundamental and inescapable.

The issue is simply this: Would the American people be willing to see New York or Detroit or any other American cities suddenly destroyed without warning by atom bombs by an aggressor state and then only begin to retaliate by dropping our own atom bombs over the aggressor country?

Must the age-old forms of waiting for a declaration of war by an enemy still be accepted and thus let the aggressor state always possess the horrifying advantage of being able to tell exactly when and where the first blow will be struck?

REALISTIC PHASE OF ISSUE

This is not a new controversy in history and the apprehension it has stirred probably has led to the outbreak of war in cases that might have yielded to peaceful negotiation but it is a realistic phase of international relations which in an atomic era at least cannot be brushed aside as inapplicable to democracies.

The principal criticism that will be made of Mr. Matthews' speech is that he gave the Soviet propaganda bureau ammunition to call us "warmongers." For he said that the time may come when the United States may have to "institute a war to compel cooperation" for peace, adding that while this might be new for a democracy we might have to play a new role—"aggressors for peace."

Although the speech was not cleared through the State Department or White House and should never have been made because it does not jibe with American foreign policy, nevertheless now that the words have been expressed it probably is a good thing to have the Russian press and the Russian people know that the American people are not sitting idly by while a group of evil men in the Kremlin are considering more aggression in different parts of the world. It may be salutary for the Russians to learn that a democracy is debating countermeasures against allowing an aggressor to take the initiative.

THE RIGHT TO INTERVENE

In principle, Mr. Matthews is really saying what the American policy proposals on the international control of atomic energy have advocted, namely that when international inspection is agreed to there should be a right to go into any country and put a stop at once to any intended use of atomic energy for purposes of making war. In the absence of such international control, what shall be the role of democracy?

This correspondent has differed in the past with Mr. Matthews' handling of the Navy Department and has said that a man of different experience should be heading that department but it could well happen that Mr. Matthews' greatest service to his country will some day be recorded as having been performed by speaking out plainly as he did in Boston last week.

The issue is too real and means too much to the lives of many Americans to be softpedaled or ignored. George Craig, national commander of the American Legion, last Saturday raised the same question.

GAZING AT CRYSTAL BALL

It all boils down to the fact that the United States while preparing to defend its cities and its allies is failing to come to grips with the basic question of a sudden attack by the Soivet. Instead all the democracies are doing is gazing into a crystal ball, trying to guess what the Communists may do.

The aggression in North Korea was the turning point in a war against the democracies which began 4 years ago. It's a war that has deprived many countries of their independence, has deprived nationals of other countries of their rights and has infiltrated by devilish means inside free nations, interfering with their governmental processes.

What Mr. Matthews might better have said is that Russia now has started a shooting war of aggression in North Korea and the question before the democracies is whether they will let the true aggressor escape or whether they will sit around the United Nations table treating him as an equal when his hands are covered with the blood of allied soldiers. Mr. Matthews might well have asked when America and her allies will begin formally to name Russia as the aggressor and take military steps if necessary, to bring about the withdrawal of her armies from Germany and other sovereign countries and from areas which Red troops are not entitled to occupy. But even so, it was and is the duty of the President and the Secretary of State to say such things—if they are to be said at all. Mr. Matthews has involuntarily given everybody, however, a solemn warning.

Tennessee Walking Horse National Celebration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOE L. EVINS

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, today, in the city of Shelbyville, in the district which I have the privilege to represent, the Fifth District of Tennessee, there begins the Twelfth Annual Tennessee Walking Horse National Celebration. This is an event of outstanding and major importance and interest not only in my own State of Tennessee, but for lovers of purebred horses in many foreign countries. The celebration at Shelbyville, which will attract around 30,000 guests and visitors—all of whom are bound together in the close fraternity of a common love of fine horses—will last for a period of 5 days, being climaxed with the crowning of the grand champion by the Honorable Gordon Browning, Governor of Tennessee.

The fine old city of Shelbyville, Tenn.—situated in the heart of the Tennessee bluegrass section—is known—and correctly so—as the walking horse capital of the world. Through the enterprise of the fine citizens of Shelbyville, this national horse show and celebration was started some 12 years ago, attracting the breeders and lovers of the superb Tennessee walking horse.

Since the first celebration 12 years ago, this annual event has grown with remarkable swiftness in scope and interest. However, I want to explain that the beginnings of the celebration were never humble. Even the initial celebration attracted some 4,000 visitors to Shelbyville—the county seat of Bedford County—and scores of fine specimens of the Tennessee walking horse. As I have said, some 30,000 visitors today are converging on Shelbyville and the show which will be held at the beautiful civic stadium will feature more than 1,000 horses from all over the United States, from Canada, Mexico, Cuba, Puerto Rico.

Mr. Speaker, the Tennessee walking horse—correctly known as the world's greatest pleasure and show horse—originated in middle Tennessee more than 100 years ago. Today its home knows no boundaries. In the past 15 years since the Tennessee Walking Horse Breeders Association of America was founded—with headquarters in Lewisburg, Marshall County, also in the Fifth District of Tennessee—more than 20,000 of the breed have been registered. The walking horse is listed by the Department of Agriculture among breeds of light horses—a distinction of high merit since only recognized breeds may be so listed.

The distinctive history of this fine horse goes back for generations when it first began to be developed among the plantation owners of middle Tennessee for several purposes—as a plantation horse—with an easy, ambling gait and straight canter—for pleasure riding—it is the most intelligent, gentlest, and most easily handled of all pleasure horses, and for light farm work. The universal popularity of the Tennessee walking horse lies in those three characteristics—characteristics which make for versatility and interest.

It has been my custom for many years to join with the fine people of Shelbyville and Bedford County, Tenn., in attending this annual celebration and horse show and I had hoped to be able to do so again this year. Since it has turned out to be impossible for me to be present this year, I nevertheless wanted to add these few remarks in the RECORD by way of bringing to the attention of the Members of the House the advent of this great celebration and extending my own greetings to the enterprising citizens of Shelbyville who have promoted this great annual and successful Tennessee walking horse national celebration.

Gen. Thomas Jonathan "Stonewall" Jackson Should Be Elected to the Hall of Fame

---

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the United Daughters of the Confederacy are seeking to have the name of Gen. Stonewall Jackson placed in the hall of fame at New York University. He has long been and will always remain in the "hall of fame" of universal public opinion, North and South, American and European. Formally listing him with the other great men of America would only be the recognition of this fact, and would add more glory to the judges than to the general.

Gen. Thomas Jonathan "Stonewall" Jackson owes his fame to his military genius; and probably no other man ever won such enduring renown in so short a time. In April 1861 he was comparatively unknown; in May 1863 he died a world figure, so that paper boys in Europe shouted "Stonewall Jackson is dead." He became famous in only 2 years by doing the things which seemed so impossible that some of his associates at first thought him insane. He was "crazy like a fox," and his men were soon proud to follow him anywhere.

Orphaned in childhood, he was early inured to hardship. He entered West Point with less than the usual education, but by characteristic perseverance worked up from near the bottom to graduate seventeenth in a class of 59—a class which included G. B. McClellan, A. P. Hill, and others who later became distinguished. In the Mexican War he accompanied General Scott to Mexico City and was repeatedly promoted for fighting with distinction.

In 1851 he accepted a teaching position at the Virginia Military Institute and soon afterward resigned from the Army. After about 10 years of mediocre teaching, Jackson entered heartily into the War Between the States, fighting for what he considered essential freedoms.

Fame first came to him at the first battle of Bull Run, where it was remarked that he and his brigade were standing like a stone wall, while others were giving ground. There and then he became Stonewall Jackson. Then came his Shenandoah Valley campaign, which has been summarized thus:

> At the beginning of 1862 McClellan planned a double invasion of Virginia. He was to lead an attack in person on the peninsula, and three armies were to concentrate in the Shenandoah Valley, sweep the region of Confederates, and approach Richmond from the west. Jackson had 17,000 men; four scattered armies opposing him had a total of 64,000. He attacked Milroy at McDowell, defeated him and pursued him northward. Next he fell upon Banks at Winchester and drove him beyond the Potomac. Fremont from the west and Shields from the east, each with more men than Jackson had, and each 20 miles from Strasburg, moved toward that place, hoping to unite and intercept Jackson on his retreat. Jackson was 65 miles from Strasburg; but with his gallant "foot cavalry" he reached Strasburg first, defeated Fremont at Cross Keys and Shields at Front Royal, spread dismay in the National Capital and caused more military damage to the Federals than a defeat before Richmond would have accomplished.

Jackson's further career is briefly related by the same biographer:

> He next moved his men by rail to join Lee at Richmond, and falling upon McClellan's left, helped to force the retreat of the Federal Army from within sight of the Confederate Capital. Then moving rapidly northward, he interposed his Army between Pope and Washington, at Manassas Junction. Second Bull Run, due mainly to Jackson's maneuver, was a greater blow to the Federals than the first battle. It was the same at Fredericksburg, Harper's Ferry, Antietam, and Chancellorsville. His genius impressed itself on every campaign, and he was recognized as the greatest commander that the war had developed. His mere presence struck terror to his foes. It has been estimated by high military authority that his being in command of an army added 50 percent to its effective strength.

Another biographer states that many critics regard the valley campaign of 1862 as the most remarkable display of strategic science, based on accurate reasoning, correct anticipation of the enemy's plans, rapid marches, and judicious disposition of an inferior force in all American military history.

The same writer continues—

> In any list of the half-dozen greatest American soldiers, Jackson is included by virtually all critics.

Dr. Hunter McGuire, Medical Director in Jackson's army, talked, in the years following the War, with some outstanding British military leaders, and he reported:

> I recently heard some of the first soldiers and military students of England declare that within the past 200 years the English-speaking race has produced but five soldiers of the first rank—Marlborough, Washington, Wellington, Robert Lee, and Stonewall Jackson. I heard them declare that Jackson's campaign in the Shenandoah Valley was the finest specimen of strategy and tactics of which the world has any record; that in this series of marches and battles there was never a blunder committed by Jackson; that this campaign in the valley was superior to either of those made by Napoleon in Italy. One British officer, who teaches strategy in a great European college, told me that he used this campaign as a model of strategy and tactics and dwelt upon it for several months in his lectures; that it was taught for months of each session in the schools of Germany; and that Von Moltke, the greatest strategist, declared it was without a rival in the world's history. This same British officer told me that he had ridden on horseback over the battlefields of the valley and carefully studied the strategy and tactics there displayed by Jackson. He has followed him to Richmond, where he joined with Lee in the campaign against McClellan in 1862; that he had followed his detour around Pope; his management of his troops at Manassas; that he had studied his environment of Harper's Ferry and its capture; his part of the fight at Sharpsburg, and his flank movement around Hooker, and that he had never blundered. "Indeed," he added, "Jackson seemed to me * * * inspired."

The English were quick to recognize General Jackson's greatness. In 1875 they sent a bronze statue of the General to the State of Virginia; and the General's leading biographer is the British Professor of Military Art and History, Lt. Col. G. F. R. Henderson. This English military authority compares Jackson with the great Duke of Wellington, and not to the disparagement of Jackson. An English Earl is quoted as saying, "Jackson was in some respects the greatest man America ever produced." Surely we Americans ought not to fall behind those of other countries in our appreciation of this great man.

It is a satisfaction to know that Stonewall Jackson's fame as a military leader is augmented by his character as a Christian gentleman. His faith in God controlled his life and made him great. Few men in active life have ever come so near to the literal fulfillment of the Apostolic injunction to pray without ceasing. He was so temperate that he generally avoided all stimulants, not only liquor and tobacco, but even tea and coffee. He paid a tithe of his income for religious and charitable purposes. He joined others in Lexington, Va., in teaching a Sunday school for Negro children, and against considerable opposition taught them to read and write. He was faithful as a deacon in the Presbyterian Church.

Yet, although he was so zealous in religion, he was not narrow or bigoted. On a rapid march in which baggage was made as light as possible, tents were to be left behind. But when a Catholic priest said he needed the privacy of a tent in order to perform the duties of his office, the General ordered that the priest should retain his tent, though no one else in the corps had one. He once described an Army service approvingly: "We had a Presbyterian sermon, introduced by Baptist services, under the direction of a Methodist chaplain, in an Episcopal Church." He did not believe that the appointment of chaplains should depend on their denomination, but on their Christianity. Of course we could not ask that the General should be elected to the hall of fame because of his moral excellence, but such nobility of soul is so often lacking in world-renowned military leaders, as for instance Napoleon Bonaparte, to whom Jackson has often been compared, that it is good to know that "Old Jack," as his men lovingly called him, was a Christian gentleman.

Stonewall Jackson's special genius has been thus described and analyzed:

These were the elements which shaped Jackson's distinctive characteristics as a soldier and commander which may be most concisely stated; a natural genius for the art of war, without which no professional training will ever develop the highest order of military talent; a power of abstraction and self-concentration which enabled him to determine every proper combination and disposition of his forces, without the slightest mental confusion—even in those supreme moments when his face and form underwent a sort of transfiguration amid the flame and thunder of battle; a conviction of the moral superiority of aggressive over defensive warfare in elevating the courage of his own men and in depressing that of the enemy; an almost intuitive insight into the plans of the enemy, and an immediate perception of the time to strike the most stunning blow, from the most unlooked-for quarter; a conviction of the necessity of following every such blow with another, and more terrible, so as to make every success a victory, and every victory so complete as to compel the speedy termination of the war.

"His schemes of war were sudden, unforeseen—
Inexplicable both to friend and foe;
It seems as if some momentary spleen
Inspired the project and compelled the blow,
And most his fortune and success were seen—
With means the most inadequate and low;
Most master of himself and least encumbered,
When overmatched, entangled and outnumbered."

Stonewall Jackson was shot by mistake by his own men at the battle of Chancellorsville, and died of pneumonia a few days later. His death may have been a decisive factor in the great struggle. Lee declared that he could have won the battle of Gettysburg if Jackson had been with him. The greatness of his genius is beautifully implied in the prayer of the veteran Father Hubert at the dedication of a Jackson monument in New Orleans:

God, when thou didst decree that the Confederacy should not succeed, Thou hadst first to take Thy servant, Stonewall Jackson.

Mrs. Ina Dillard Russell—An Outstanding American Mother

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER THORNBERRY
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. THORNBERRY. Mr. Speaker, I have recently read one of the most beautiful tributes to American motherhood that it has ever been my pleasure to read.

This article, written by James C. Derieux, entitled "Cheaper by the Baker's Dozen" appeared in a recent issue of Collier's magazine.

It tells of Mrs. Ina Dillard Russell, who last May was selected as Georgia's mother of the year. To read the story of Mrs. Russell's devotion to her family and her community, one cannot help but be filled with humility and gratitude to this great woman who has given so much to mankind. Mrs. Russell, who is now 82 years old, is the mother of 13 children, all of whom have in their own right made sizable contributions to their State and Nation.

Somehow, to read of Mrs. Russell's life is to be reminded of the great sacrifices which women have made throughout history in order that their children might live a more worth while and decent life. I highly commend this article to all of you in the knowledge that you will be inspired by it just as I have been. The article follows:

CHEAPER BY THE BAKER'S DOZEN

(By James C. Derieux)

Ina Dillard Russell, the youngest of 13 children and herself the mother of 13, is a frail little lady of 82 who must spend most of her time in bed. But her mind is merry, her heart gay, and the colors of her sunset are as bright as the flowers she loves. All her children are grown now, and doing well. There no longer is need for her to make the rounds on blustery nights to be sure they are covered; no need to sew by the light of an oil lamp until past midnight to stay abreast of their needs for rompers and blouses and shirts and skirts and underthings. The day when seven of them had whooping cough at the same time is far away and long ago, remembered only as one of the inevitable adventures and one of the victories along the road of family life.

Last May 11 the town of Winder, Ga., near which Mrs. Russell lives, declared a holiday in her honor. Twelve of her children (all but the Army officer, who was on foreign duty), most of her 33 grandchildren, several of her 7 great-grandchildren, uncensused nephews, nieces, cousins, Herman Talmadge, the Governor of her State, and thousands of others were on hand to celebrate the choice of this great woman as Georgia's mother of the year. It was a wonderful day of speeches, receptions, a parade with floats representing the careers of her sons, and handsome presents of silver. When the day was over, she still was smiling as her anxious children stood around and urged her to rest.

"I'm rested," she said. "I'm having a wonderful time. I did not know my neighbors cared for me like this. I never was able to do anything much for them, except maybe take care of them when they needed me. I had to give so much time to my own children that I never could do all I wanted to do for others. But I have loved them, and it is so good to know that they love me."

The children, to whom she gave so much of her time before her health broke, have rewarded her efforts and her faith.

Her oldest son, RICHARD BREVARD RUSSELL, named for his father, is now in the United States Senate. Before that he had been Georgia's youngest Governor. Her second son, Robert, is a justice of the United States Court of Appeals, which is next highest to the Supreme Court. Walter is a major in the United States Army. William is a farmer and manager of the old home place. Fielding is head of the English department at the Georgia Teachers College, Statesboro. (William and Fielding are twins.) Edward is pastor of the Trinity Presbyterian Church in Montgomery, Ala.; and Alex is a doctor with a general practice in and around Winder, a small county seat between Athens and Atlanta.

The six daughters all have had a turn at school-teaching. Mary is Mrs. S. Gordon Green, of Alexandria, Va., whose husband is an inventor and small-arms expert employed by the United States Department of Defense; Ina, an attorney, is Mrs. J. K. Stacy, of Washington, D. C., whose husband is an official of Colonial Airlines; Marguerite is Mrs. James H. Bowden of Atlanta, wife of an officer in the Federal Reserve Bank there; Harriett is Mrs. S. Ralph Sharpton of Falls Church, Va., whose husband is with the Maritime Administration; Patience is Mrs. Hugh Peterson of Alley, Ga., and Washington, D. C., whose husband was for 12 years a member of the Congress and is now in private practice as an attorney; and Carolyn, the youngest of the 13, is Mrs. Raymond L. Nelson, wife of the pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Stuttgart, Ark.

The Senator, his brother William and William's capable wife, live at the Russell home, a big white house amidst a grove of pecans, mimosas and numerous flowering shrubs. Robert and Alex live within a few hundred yards in handsome homes of their own. Grandson Bob and his family live in "Newlywed Cottage" on the home place, where a number of other young couples in the family have lived while getting under way. All the children wherever they may be, come home whenever they can to be with the great lady who made the family what it is. She is never lonely. Evenings, now if there is no special family gathering, she enjoys television, including wrestling matches. "I don't approve of wrestlers," she says. "They seem to be so rough. But I will look at them."

The father of this notable family, Richard Brevard Russell, was himself a distinguished man, chief justice of the Supreme Court of Georgia at the time of his death in 1938. But for many years he served on lower benches, and at much less pay than the $7,000 a year he drew in his final years. His family did most of its growing up while he was drawing $3 or $4 thousand a year. For a time, when seven of his children were in college, he left the bench, practiced law privately until he paid his debts, then went back to his robes.

The old judge took little part in the details of rearing his family. His wife was the genius in that field. Usually she had a cook to help, but not always. For a stretch of time she prepared all the meals herself in order to save money and apply it to the building of what is now the family homestead. The judge ordered groceries at wholesale in Atlanta for his own family and for other families living on his cotton farm. His wife kept the accounts, and the old day book shows some interesting notations. For example, it discloses that in the spring of 1912 she personally made 184 garments. Another spring she began to count the buttonholes, but gave up at 190 when something happened to divert her attention.

Through these busy years of sewing, cleaning, cooking, managing, she occasionally found time to hold school classes in her own home. Robert and several of the other children got their primary-school training from their mother.

On Sunday afternoons she played the piano as her family gathered around and sang hymns. Every child had to know the shorter catechism and at the Sunday gatherings each one was called on to recite verses from the Bible. Both the mother and the old judge were generous in praise, and as generous as they could be in other rewards for the children who did best.

Today Senator RUSSELL remembers that, as a child, he did not know mothers had to sleep. His own was up and busy when he went to bed and again when he awoke in the morning. If he became cold in the night, she covered him. If he was sick, she was beside him. "I was nearly 10 years old," he says, "before I saw her asleep. I still recall how shocked I was."

All through the growing-up years Mrs. Russell wrote frequently to children who were away at school, or at work; and many of these letters have been treasured and kept. They are good, long reports on events around the home, with nice touches that doubtless stirred nostalgic memories, or stimulated determination. To a child who was wavering about something she wrote: "We can stand a great deal in this world and stand it well if we have enough grit in our gizzards. You must decide for yourself."

And to one of her sons who had gone away for the first time: "How I do want to see you, but how proud I am that you are sticking it out and not coming home."

To a daughter: "As you know, in growing flowers I never have hothouse plants. I love the kind that can stand anything that comes along. And I love to think of my '13 varieties' growing and thriving and sending out fragrance, beautifying the world."

She thought of her family as a cooperating unit. Many of her letters began: "I have a plan to lay before you," or "What do you think of this?"

In her efforts to have each child develop according to his own gifts and desires, she avoided giving specific directions, but there were many broad hints and principles, such as:

"Take good care of your little sister, but don't worry her with too much watching. * * * My child, cultivate a sweet disposition and practice kindness and gentleness in all things. If you do, you will give genuine pleasure to all you are thrown with. Study and be smart, too. * * * Do your part. * * * Just make others happy and you will be happy. * * * Make people love you. * * * I must say goodby now and make the fires, for it is getting cold. * * * I am constantly thinking of my darling children. * * * You have been a fortunate girl, born with a good little body, a fair amount of good looks and a bright mind. Also you found a fond father and a loving mother awaiting you. * * * You young people can't realize how much you are loved. * * * You must have a place to fill or you would not have been sent into this world. * * * Now don't say 'poor Mama' to me. I do have such a good time."

To a daughter who had written home that she was blue: "And how much exercise on the hoof do you take per day? Walk, walk. There is nothing like it. And your complexion will stay good and you will not be so fat either, when you grow older. Drink, drink water."

And to one who had said she was so tired of being poor: "Oh, my child, that hurt me. You are not poor, unless it is in your soul and heart * * *."

As the children grew up and had children of their own, Mrs. Russell continued to write to them, her letters characterized by the same affirmative attitude toward life. Whenever word came of a new grandchild she responded with as much enthusiasm as if there had been none before. "We are overjoyed" she wrote Mrs. Bowden when a son was born. "We are thrilled. You should have seen Doscia (the cook) when I told her. She picked up a chair and went running around the dining room table, said she had to hug somebody, and as I was seated she hugged my head and I hugged her legs. Daddy was so happy, and Rob and Sybil (Rob's wife), Carolyn, and Dick. It's a great privilege we women have to bring forth human beings. I'm proud and thankful for all of mine."

Notwithstanding all the children, the innumerable visitors, the difficulties of living in a house without central heat, where many fires had to be made every winter day, and where all cooking was done on a wood-burning stove, life in the Russell home was orderly. Every older child was responsible for a younger one. The three oldest were girls, and to this day they point with pride to one brother or another, and say, "You know, he's my boy. I raised him."

IN A SPIRIT OF HELPFULNESS

As older sisters and brothers finished college and began working, they sent money home to younger members of the family to help them along with their schooling. All but one have college degrees. Household tasks were passed down the line, too; the milking from Dick to Bob to Walter and so on to Alex, who was stuck with it because there was no boy younger than he.

Mother Russell set the example for her children by her own strict attention even to the little proprieties. No sloppy—or casual—dressing was allowed at breakfast, or at any meal. Even when she did her own cooking she "fixed up" before coming to the table. The children were required to be punctual, or lose out on whatever was taking place. When, in their reading, they came to words they did not understand, she insisted they make notes of them and look them up before the day was done.

"I made them mind, too," says Mother Russell. "I had to. My goodness, how could I raise 13 if they didn't mind."

In the course of their schooling several of the children lived with relatives in the places where their schools were located, but each time Mrs. Russell sent one off to a sister or an aunt, she told her to "send him back the first time he disobeys."

Judge Russell commuted by train to Atlanta, about 50 miles away, much of the time he was on the bench, and always on the afternoons that he was coming home, whether on the vestibule to Winder or the local to his own flag stop of Russell, the children were bathed and freshly dressed to greet him. He was the honored member of the family. He sat on his wife's right at meals. He always made a nice talk at the table whenever the family was celebrating a birthday; and every year he stood before the Christmas tree and spoke of the meaning of the holiday before distributing the gifts.

Mrs. Russell did not hold back from switching her boys when she thought they needed it. William teases her now by relating that they had plenty of blackberries but no peaches when he was a child because of his mother's demand for peach twigs. But she had other disciplinary methods. A child might be required to sit utterly still and quiet in the clothes closet for half an hour or an hour, depending on the gravity of the crime. Once she taught Fielding, her teacher son, a lesson when he left his tricycle in the hall near the back door. She said nothing about it until dark, but neither did she move it. Then without making a light she told Fielding to go close that door. He started, but fell whammy over his own tricycle.

The Senator, when a small boy, was exceedingly fond of sausage, and often said he never did get enough. After a number of such comments, his mother asked him how much sausage would be enough, and he said he wanted a pound all to himself at one meal. At the next meal he was given a pound and directed to eat all of it. About halfway through he began to weaken, but his mother urged him on until he could stand no more.

Rob made a similar slip about wanting a dozen bananas at a sitting, and Mary, forgetting the experiences of her brothers, said she wanted a whole fried chicken. Mrs. Russell rocks back and forth in bed as she laughs at these disciplinary adventures of long ago. Daily around her bedside there is merry talk of the ways she managed to bring up all of her children. All the Russells are good and lively talkers.

The daughters tease her by insisting she always sides with the men against the women, regardless of the merits of a case, and they tell a story to illustrate what they mean. Once an enraged tenant on the Russell place struck his wife with a kerosene lamp, shattering the glass and spilling the oil. Mrs. Russell heard of the argument and went to the tenant's home to see what she might do. The women was not badly hurt, and after some minor attentions Mrs. Russell admonished her: "You should not have made your husband mad enough to do a thing like that."

Incidentally, the daughters say their mother invariably sides with their husbands even against them, and she cheerfully declares, "Well, the men usually are right."

The doors of the white frame house that is the Russell home have always been open to guests, strangers or not. Visiting preachers more often than not had their Sunday dinners there. Every summer there were house parties when sons or daughters had their school friends in for a week or two. The family jokes now about how their mother could always find more hominy grits for the big pot, and somehow thin the gravy so it would go around; and William, the family's chief jester, says they had signals to indicate the state of the food supply. When someone said, "F-H-B," that meant "family hold back." All of which Mrs. Russell denies, but greatly enjoys.

A HOBO AS OVERNIGHT GUEST

In the first quarter of this century, when hobos and tramps were numerous, the children were convinced that mysterious markings on local railroad water tanks guided itinerants straight to their door. Mrs. Russell gave each one food, and talked with him about his family, and whether or not he ever went to church. Once she horrified her daughters by inviting a hobo to spend the night. They protested. "Mother! You aren't going to let that bum stay here?"

"I certainly am," she said calmly.

So the hobo spent the night, went on his way refreshed and with the knowledge, if he had any moral perception left, that at least one person still had faith in him, and hoped he would do better.

She told those knights of the crosstie, as she told her own children, that every person born into this world is here for a useful purpose; and she thinks it is possible that some of them may have done better after a visit to her home. "Who knows?"

Deeply religious herself, Mrs. Russell often prayed that one of her sons would enter the ministry, but she did not urge any one of them to take that course. "I never tried to influence any of my children to do any particular kind of work," she says. "I just taught each one to find why he is here, and to do the very best he can." So, when Henry Edward Russell became a minister, the decision was his, but the deepest delight was hers. "Edward will be ordained into the ministry tonight," she wrote to an absent child. "It is as thrilling to me as Dick's inauguration as governor."

Another of her great thrills, she says, was when her twins, William and Fielding, were born. "That was the proudest moment of my life up to that time."

Mrs. Russell was born at Farm Hill, Georgia, February 18, 1868, and was teaching school at Athens when she met her husband. She will tell you now that her life from that time on has been peaceful, even calm, and "Oh, so happy!"

She recalls only a few occasions when she was terrified. Once was when Dick had pneumonia. Another was when she thought she had cancer and wondered what would happen to her little children. The time when Mary swallowed her Sunday-school penny, when the horse bit Dick, and Marguerite had to run a mile for the doctor, are but incidents. Of course, such things—like measles—happen in any large family.

Even the summer of 1911, when her husband, the old judge, ran against Hoke Smith and Joe Brown for governor, seems now to have been a peaceful season. She says she did not have time to help her husband much—except by writing several hundred letters—because so many of the children were small then; and that she was not disappointed—except for him—when he was defeated. "I didn't want to take all my little girls to the Capitol in Atlanta in gingham aprons," she explains.

The smaller children were eagerly interested in that political contest. When they heard their father was in a race with Hoke Smith, a rather rotund man, and Joe Brown, who was frail and small, they imagined it a foot race, maybe right down the big road in front of home, and they were sure their father would win because he had such long legs.

That race did not come off the way they hoped it would, but they saw the judge win many other foot races with the morning train to Atlanta. The Seaboard Railroad runs perhaps a hundred yards in front of the Russell home, and to accommodate its frequent and distinguished passenger, a flag stop was made where his lane crossed the rails. There was no agent, and the only way to know when the train was coming was to see it or hear it. So, each morning when the judge was going away a child would be posted at the track to look a mile down the line to a big curve.

When the locomotive came charging in sight the sentry would yell, "Train around the curve," and the assistant sentry would make a dash for the house to warn papa to hurry. Mrs. Russell would look him over to see that he had on all his clothes; Laura or somebody would have a cup of coffee at the front door which he would grab and drink, then light out full speed for the station where three or four or five or six excited, dancing, waving children flagged the train down.

The judge was a devoted and indulgent father, and an adoring husband with the happy habit of expressing his feelings. A letter he wrote to Mrs. Russell after they had been married 39 years begins, "My precious little sweetheart," and ends, "With a sense of love and gratitude that is overpowering, I can only say God bless you, idol of my heart."

His rare ability to express his affection in words is a characteristic of many members of the Russell family. They are a deeply and articulately devoted family.

The old judge never realized either of his great ambitions—to be Governor of Georgia, or United States Senator, but he lived to swear in 33-year-old Dick as Governor in 1931, and see him take his seat in the United States Senate in 1933. He and Mrs. Russell lived with Dick, who was and still is unmarried, in the Governor's Mansion in Atlanta. She was confident at the end of the first year there that her boy was a good governor, but she wanted to be positive beyond any possibility of doubt. So, she went to the one man whose unbiased judgment she trusted completely—her husband and Dick's father.

"I knew he would know," she says, "and I knew he could not tell anything but the truth. When I asked him about Dick he thought a while in silence, to be sure of his answer. Then he said, 'Honey, I have studied the history of Georgia, and I tell you positively that Dick is the best governor this State ever had.' I was so glad to know that. But not surprised."

On the afternoon of December 3, 1938, the old judge, then 77 years old, returned to his home, tired. He said he believed he would lie down a while, and Mrs. Russell went to get some letters just in from several of their children to read to him. But she never finished the letters, for the judge seemed to have fallen asleep. When she went to him, she saw that he had "gone away."

All the children were absent that afternoon, and when they heard the news they feared for their mother. But when they reached home they found her composed—and it was she who comforted them. Her religious faith, that had stood so many other tests, stood this one, too.

She is confident that she and the judge will be reunited, and to one of her sons she has confided that, when she gets there, she hopes to be given the task of caring for babies.

Her faith is absolute and affirmative. There is not a gloomy note in the song of her heart, and rarely if ever a gloomy thought in her mind. To be alive is to her a great privilege; to see the dawn of each day a new and nice adventure.

"Somebody gave me one of those black bands to tie over my eyes and shut out the morning light," she says, "but I never used it. Shut out the dawn. What for? It means another day to get something done."

So, this great lady looks both to the future and the past at 82, and finds both pleasing. She is watched over now by her children, even as she watched over them. The ties that bind them to her are stronger by far than apron strings. They are the ties of admiration, obligation, and love.

Her son, Judge Russell, summed up her influence over her children like this: "She never gave us a chance to fail."

Conditions in the Philippine Islands

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 29 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, Mr. Gerald Wilkinson, a businessman in the Philippines, and vice president of the Philippine association which is seeking to promote Philippine-American relations, made a speech before the Rotary Club of Honolulu, on July 18, describing current developments in the Philippines and the present status of the Philippine economy.

I ask unanimous consent that this speech be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen, before coming to the purpose of this address I would like to thank Mr. Trent for his remarks. Our organization in the Philippines has done its best to build up a pattern of industry and trade that may be of lasting value to the Philippine Republic as well as a source of fair profits to stockholders. But as far as my personal hand in this is concerned, nothing I have done would have been possible without the constant support and understanding that we have received at all times from my chief and chairman, Mr. John E. Russell, and from his associates in the leading houses of this city. A man starts with more than good fortune when he represents such a group.

Coming now to the broad purpose of this occasion I indeed appreciate an invitation to speak in Honolulu about the Philippine situation, because few territories can have demonstrated better than has Hawaii, the capacity for living in harmony with other nations and races, and it is humanity of this calibre that is required for a just appraisal of Philippine problems today.

As you no doubt know, the Philippine Islands were revealed to the west in 1521, by Magellan and were named after his master, King Philip II of Spain. For nearly 400 years thereafter, with a brief interruption by my fellow countrymen, the islands lay under Spain's proud hand. This period seems to have brought no striking material advancement to the Philippine people, but it brought one influence of profound and permeating power, Christianity and the Catholic Church. The majority of the Philippine people are Catholic today and I know of no other nation, in the great sweep of Asia and the Indies, where Christianity is the personal faith of so dominant a percentage of the people. As the shadow of an anti-Christian creed darkens the globe, let us not overlook this Christian element in Philippine life.

On the eve of this century, the Spanish-American War resulted in America replacing Spain as the governing power in the islands. Seldom, if ever, can there have been a more beneficial conqueror. The Americans brought in their train, not guns and regimentation, but teachers, the concept of man's liberty, and the encouragement of material development. In the light of present adverse publicity, it is worth remembering that even then many thousands of Filipino insurrectos vehemently resisted the new government and were not brought into the paths of peace for several years.

In 1935 the Philippines entered upon a 10-year transition period with commonwealth status as a preliminary to full independence—a program rudely shattered by Japanese attack. During the 3½ years that followed, the country, bled white by the enemy, was so devastated that when peace came great agricultural areas were found to be abandoned to jungle grass; work animals slaughtered; factories, railroads, and docks burned, bombed, and looted; and major cities unbelievably destroyed.

During the prewar American incumbency of the Philippines, the islands' export production had expanded and almost without exception the Philippine trade produced an annual balance in her favor. Under Japanese hands, all trade perished and when the infant Philippine Republic entered upon full independence on July 4, 1946, in honored fulfillment of America's pledge, she found herself decapitalized, as well as devastated, with shelves empty save for the surplus arms and military equipment left in great bulk by her liberators, a legacy which, however well-intentioned, has proved a scanty blessing to peace, order, and moral integrity in this, as in certain other countries.

What happened then to the Philippine economy? Very much what would happen to you and me if we were suddenly released from years of suffering to find ourselves on Broadway with cash in our pockets. The Filipino people bought everything in sight from lipsticks to radios, from necklaces to automobiles, from refrigerators to canned beans, and the limited capital construction goods that oversold American manufacturers could supply for distant shipping dates against rising prices.

Since the war, I have heard men, a very few men, say that absolute austerity and rigid import controls should have been immediately imposed by the Philippine Government in 1946, as was the earlier case in Britain. Gentlemen, the example is not a parallel. England, for all her gallant suffering, was not occupied and ravished by an invader. The Philippines were. And any man who, in the maturity of hindsight and a full stomach, states that restrictions should have been applied in 1946 would have been flung from office.

So a spending spree ensued, inflated by hundreds of millions of dollars of United States Army and Navy pay rolls in the Philippines, most of which went out for consumer goods to fill those empty shelves and to replace those tattered clothes. Gentlemen, can you or I presume to judge this?

And so the country's trade, annihilated by war, was resurrected with an import boom coinciding with negligible exports, since the rate of revival of exports cannot be faster than the rate of restoration of fields, the seasons of agriculture, the organization of finance, the construction of damaged factories and homes, roads and bridges, docks, and railroads. Thus the Philippine Republic has registered a gravely adverse balance of trade, reducing her previously ample reserves of dollars and gold to a point at which, at the end of 1949, exchange and import controls became necessary, as they have in many other countries. These controls have necessitated grave cuts in the imports of all goods, cuts ranging up to 90 percent of previous annual averages in certain unessential lines. From the quotas left, a 20- to 30-percent reserve is deducted from foreign importers in many lines of merchandise, under a recent and controversial law, in order that this percentage of quotas may be assigned to new Filipino importers. It is my personal belief that this form of nationalistic expropriation was unwise in timing and impracticable in execution, since while any government can legislate one group out of business with a stroke of the pen and thereby accelerate unemployment while disrupting trade connections, it cannot legislate new groups into business with equal speed and integrity.

But if such legislation is proven by experience to be mistaken, I, for one, look to the good sense of Philippine legislators to correct the position in due time. But it is obvious that this is unlikely to occur soon. For the urge to develop national ownership and to expand national participation in trade is understandable, and it is a deep-seated urge in any people whose independence is recent, and who have not yet had the time to appreciate that foreign capital and foreign management can immeasurably enrich the Filipino people and Filipino capitalists, without impairment of sovereign rights. It is up to us to demonstrate our value and our sincerity in this regard.

Meanwhile, the drastic reduction of imports has caused the unemployment of thousands of Filipinos and foreigners, and many Americans of long standing are now leaving the Philippines for good. Such men, and their families, are unquestionably rendering the gravest possible account of the Philippine situation to their friends in the United States, including reports to Washington. And visiting newsmen, ever alert for an easy-selling simile to the collapse of Nationalist China, are quick to assemble these tales of woe, to combine them with stories of political and war-surplus scandals, and to publicize a ruinous portrait of the Philippine Republic to readers overseas.

Many of these scandals and tales of corruption are true. They are a blot upon the national honor. But which among us shall cast the first stone? Have the western nations perpetrated no abuses upon their own peoples during their painful evolution? Were there no outlaws and no corruption during the early years of American independence? Were there no munitions-contracts scandals in more recent times? Shall we join the stone throwers, or shall we pause and look again at this Philippine scene?

I think that we might look again. For it is well to be fair to one's neighbor, when one's neighbor in Manila in this twentieth century lives nearer to Honolulu in terms of travel and communication than did a neighbor in Hilo when Honolulu's leading firms were founded. A fair review by a mere businessman may not rate an article in the Reader's Digest, but it will disclose some vital points:

For example, we shall find that most of the scandals printed overseas were first uncovered and published in the Philippines by Philippine-owned and edited newspapers of great vigor and independence. Would we prefer an uncritical or silenced press? There is a vigorous and vocal political opposition party in the Philippine Senate and Congress, an opposition that is no more Communist than I am. Do we not applaud such a system in our own countries?

As regards the Huks, to read the papers overseas, one would think that the Philippines was populated by outlaws and that production was at a standstill. This is a gross exaggeration. There are probably 8,000 to 9,000 fairly well-organized Huks, of which the majority are armed, and of which the majority are probably well trained in the concepts of communism. But the population of the Philippines is some 20,000,000 people, and while the problem of internal security requires the closest possible attention, it is not true to state that the government is in risk of early overthrow by force.

As regards economics, the adverse balance of visible trade, while sharply reduced by controls, is likely to continue to be adverse through 1951, although less so than in 1950.

As regards invisible payments, a decline of some 175,000,000 United States dollars in receipts from war-damage compensation and payments to veterans during 1951, by comparison with 1950, will exert grave pressure upon the Republic's dollar reserves, and upon the peso, unless further war-damage compensation or early aid results from the American Economic Mission, a group of the most able and earnest character that is now visiting the Philippines.

But is a neighbor dying because he is sick? Let us see how sick this neighbor really is.

Total Philippine agricultural production rose from slightly over 3,000,000 metric tons in 1946 to just under 6,000,000 metric tons in 1949. Total 1949 production was greater than the production in 1938. The largest single item is rice. In 1946 total Philippine rice production amounted to 1,623,330 metric tons. Last year it had increased to approximately 2,500,000 metric tons. This was also greater than in 1938 but it has not yet overtaken the rapid increase in population, which is rising at the rate of 2.2 percent per annum.

In sugar the total production of the country was less than 85,000 short tons in 1946-47. In 1948-49 it had risen to over 700,000 short tons, and we estimate that the next crop will be not less than 900,000 short tons.

Pineapple exports were at a standstill in 1946, but by 1948 production exceeded 33,000,000 pounds, rising to over 89,000,000 pounds last year, or more than double the output of 1940.

In lumber the monthly average production during 1946 was under 10,000,000 board feet. This production was more than tripled during 1949, when the annual lumber production substantially exceeded the production of 1937.

In aviation the Philippine Airlines, owned and financed within the Philippines, flew approximately 7,750,000 air-miles during 1949. And so far in 1950 this company, with all respect to Pan American's pioneering services, has been the most punctual passenger carrier between Manila and Honolulu. In the total of more than 20,000,000 air-miles of interisland and international service that the company has flown during the past 3 years, only one accident has occurred involving loss of life. There is reason to believe that this accident was caused by factors other than engine defect or incompetence of personnel.

Gentlemen, the foregoing is only a part of the progress I can quote to you. Is this the progress of a dying economy?

So much for the economic tide. There is another tide of equal moment to mankind, the tide that governs the hearts of men. How is our neighbor's heart?

On April 15, 1948, President Manuel Roxas of the Philippine Republic, a few hours before he died, made the following statement in a public speech:

"But if war should come, if God in His supreme wisdom shall will it that the scourge of war again visit the bewildered peoples of this earth, I am certain of one thing, probably the only thing about which I can be certain, and it is this, that in case of a new war waged by the aggressor against the forces of freedom and liberty, Americans and Filipinos will be found on the same side and American and Filipino soldiers will again fight side by side in the same trenches or in the air in the defense of justice, of freedom, and the other principles which we both love and cherish."

Gentlemen, how many other nations in Asia or the west Pacific have said as much to the United States?

And in the light of today's conditions there is another utterance that is remembered in the Philippines. On January 14, 1950, the American Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs stated in Washington:

"Our relations, our defensive relations with the Philippines are contained in agreements between us. Those agreements are being loyally carried out and will be loyally carried out.

"Both peoples have learned by bitter experience the vital connections between our mutual defense requirements. We are in no doubt about that, and it is hardly necessary for me to say that an attack on the Philippines could not and would not be tolerated by the United States."

The gravity of that pledge to the Philippines, and the generosity that inspired it, are of deep significance. Indeed it is difficult to think of the United States today, in relation to the world, without recalling those lines from Longfellow with which we must all be familiar:

> "Thou, too, sail on, O Ship of State!
> Sail on, O Union, strong and great!
> Humanity with all its fears,
> With all its hopes of future years,
> Is hanging breathless on thy fate!"

Can these lines ever have been more applicable to America in the eyes of the world than they are today? But you will also remember that later in the same poem there comes the following passage which I suggest might be applied to our thoughts of the Philippine Republic today:

"In spite of rock and tempest's roar,
In spite of false lights on the shore,
Sail on, nor fear to breast the sea!
Our hearts, our hopes, are all with thee,
Our hearts, our hopes, our prayers, our tears,
Our faith, triumphant o'er all with thee!"

Gentlemen, if every man who has dealings with the Philippines will be governed, not merely in his words but in his heart, by the spirit of these lines, I believe that he will find an unfailing response in the hearts of the Filipino people.

The Case of Bishop Lajos Ordass, Leader of the Lutheran Church in Hungary

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHRISTOPHER C. McGRATH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Speaker, the Lutheran Bishop of Hungary, Dr. Lajos Ordass, was arrested on September 9, 1948, by the Hungarian police. According to press reports, Bishop Ordass and the two high-ranking officials of the Lutheran Church in Hungary were imprisoned on charges of "currency abuses" involving $500,000 in United States currency, which was raised by the United States Committee of the Lutheran World Federation for church relief and rehabilitation in Hungary. It was alleged that Bishop Ordass and his associates had received funds from this country without reporting them to the Hungarian National Bank as a foreign asset, "and it was further claimed that the Lutheran Church in Hungary intended to keep $88,000 of the money in the United States." The government's disclosure of the arrest alleged finally that Bishop Ordass and his associates had "disposed of several hundred thousand dollars without the permission of the national bank and had sold foreign currency on the black market." In addition to these unproven and baseless charges, the government-controlled press also accused Bishop Ordass of having taken a decidedly "anti-democratic political stand" against the government's various democratic measures. In addition he was deemed to be "most unsympathetic toward the blessings of democracy." The Minister of Information, Ernest Mihalyfi, stated that Bishop Ordass had resisted "the humanism which liberated the oppressed and instituted Christ-like equality" in Hungary. Still another drummed-up charge against the bishop was that he "joined Roman Catholics in opposing the present regime."

Late in September Bishop Ordass and the Reverend Alexander Vargas, the general secretary of the Lutheran Church in Hungary, appeared before a Hungarian Workers' Court. At the trial both were formally accused of "foreign currency manipulation," and found guilty. Bishop Ordass was sentenced to 2 years in prison, deprived of his civil rights for a period of 5 years and fined a sum equal to about $255. The Reverend Varga was sentenced to 3 years in prison.

In April of this year the leaders of the so-called "reformed" and "reorganized" Lutheran Church removed him from office, and then asked the Government to "exercise clemency." On May 30 the Bishop was released, after an imprisonment of about 20 months. At the time it was reported that his only desire "at the moment is to retire completely and rest." It was further reported that Bishop Ordass will not be allowed to "resume any work in the Hungarian church."

PROTESTS AND APPEALS IN BEHALF OF BISHOP ORDASS

Very little is known of the circumstances which brought about the release of Bishop Ordass. No explanation is at hand except the request made by the new Lutheran leaders to the Government to "exercise clemency." The Government acceded to a request coming from Lutheran leaders in Hungary, having ignored all previous appeals emanating from official and unofficial quarters in the West. The reason for this attitude is that the new leaders of the Lutheran Church in Hungary are simply government's own creatures, and therefore the Government, in acceding to their request, was actually doing what it wished.

As soon as the arrest of Bishop Ordass was made public by the Hungarian Government, protests and appeals were made in his behalf. The first of these came from the president of the Lutheran World Federation, Prof. Anders Nygren, of Lund, Sweden. In his cabled protest Professor Nygren expressed "great concern" for the safety of Bishop Ordass and declared that "we must learn as quickly as possible what the official reasons are for the detention of this bishop, respected and loved by Christians throughout the world." The United Lutheran Church in America at its sixteenth biennial convention—held in Philadelphia in October of 1948—passed a resolution of protest. At that convention the United States Committee for the Lutheran World Federation was asked to continue its efforts to establish the true facts of the final transactions involved in the charges against Bishop Ordass. The conference expressed the hope that in the light of these facts "the Government of Hungary might be persuaded to review the case and rectify the injustice done to the leaders of the Lutheran Church in Hungary." At about the same time "a strong protest" was sent to the Government of Hungary by the Norwegian National Committee of the Lutheran World Federation. Finally in July of 1949 the executive committee of the Lutheran World Federation, meeting at Oxford, England, adopted a resolution condemning the arrest and imprisonment of Bishop Ordass.

None of these protests, appeals, and resolutions, however, elicited an encouraging response from the Government of Hungary. Even protests and appeals made by our Government and the Government of Great Britain were ineffective. On March 29, 1949, the State Department and the British Foreign Office dispatched vigorous notes to Hungary, charging that country with "repeated, continuing, and notorious violations of peace-treaty guaranties of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms." In this connection special mention was made of the imprisonment of Cardinal Mindszenty and Bishop Ordass. "By arbitrary and unjustified proceedings against religious leaders on fabricated grounds," read our note of protest, "the Hungarian Government has attempted to force the submission of independent church leaders and to bring about their replacement with collaborators subservient to the Communist Party and its program. Such measures constitute violations of the freedom of religious worship guaranteed by the treaty of peace." In this same note the United States Government called upon the Hungarian Government "to adopt prompt, remedial measures in respect to the violations referred to above." The Government of Hungary not only failed to comply with our request, but on the contrary it intensified persecution of religious leaders, and began to arrest, to keep incommunicado, and to imprison United States citizens.

In 1944 the Red army of Soviet Russia marched into this country, avowedly to liberate it. Communist apostles and reformers rose, attained power, and under the protection of Soviet soldiers, gradually ousted the rightful government of the country. Then the Communists set themselves up as the only and true representative leaders in the so-called people's democracy which they hoped to create.

In this task of establishing a people's democracy in Hungary, Communist leaders knew that they would meet strong opposition on the part of all traditionally established churches, both Protestant and Catholic. Of all the innumerable obstacles which seemed to hinder the creation of a people's democratic state, the effective spiritual influence which the church exercised over the cultural and intellectual life of Hungary appeared to be the most powerful one. But Communists, having once gained control of the Government, in May 1947, drunk with power and reforming zeal, set about their task of communizing Hungary relentlessly and systematically. Their tactics were first to divide the Catholic church and the Protestant churches, and then to set one Protestant sect against another, thereby facilitating the realization of their evil designs. They preached the separation of church and state, but actually what they were after was the subjugation of the church and the enslavement of its leaders. By means of intimidations, arrests, trials, and prison terms they hoped to discredit and to liquidate the church leadership. By installing new leaders into church offices and by expropriating church property, all the effective opposition to the new government was to be eliminated. For these reasons the arrest, conviction, and imprisonment of the Lutheran bishop, Dr. Ordass, of the Catholic primate of Hungary, Cardinal Mindszenty, and the Calvinist bishop, Dr. Laszlo Ravasz, became celebrated cases in and out of Hungary.

In this struggle between the forces of good and evil, that of freedom of conscience versus total suppression of freedom, Cardinal Mindszenty appeared to be the most formidable foe of the government. However Bishop Ordass proved to be no less an opponent.

He and his flock did not yield to the blandishments and threats of the government. As has been stated before, Lutheran leaders, knowing that the foe was bent on destroying the free church, offered splendid resistance. "They, more than the leaders of any other Protestant group behind the iron curtain, saved the honor of the Protestant church. As atheistic tempests from the Bolshevist steppes swept over eastern Europe, leaders of some Protestant groups bowed, without glory or spiritual grandeur, eliminating themselves from the roll of high honor handed down from century to century, but the foremost Lutheran leader in Hungary preferred prison and calumny to surrender." In this break with the traditional "Lutheran doctrine of submission to temporal authority, Bishop Ordass proved unexpectedly refractory." When his resignation was demanded by government emissaries, he told them that he would "rather burn in hell" than desert his flock. The Lutheran lay leaders acted in a similar manner. They explained to the government negotiators that only the Evangelical Synod was competent to pass judgment on the nationalization of the Lutheran schools and that no action could be taken prior to the convocation of this supreme governing body of the church. This stand of the Lutheran leaders—their refusal to accept the government's decision to nationalize the schools—rather than the fabricated charge of "foreign currency manipulation" was the real reason for the arrest of Bishop Ordass, Superintendent Radvanszky and Secretary General the Reverend Varga. Incidentally this is another aspect of Communist tactics, that of covering up the real charge against their adversaries and introducing instead false charges. In this connection another factual account of "foreign currency manipulation," is given by the executive director of the National Lutheran Council, Mr. Paul C. Empie, in the Christian Century for May 11, 1949. It is worth summarizing here.

In the spring of 1947 Bishop Ordass came to this country for a 7 week's visit. At that time the council was raising money for church relief and rehabilitation in Hungary. Close to $300,000 was raised, and the whole amount was cabled from New York directly to the National Bank of Hungary. Hungarian Government officials were completely informed about the entire transaction. But the money which Bishop Ordass and his associates were to have had at their disposal in Hungary has never reached them. The Lutheran church leaders in Hungary never received the benefit of this sum sent from here, because by that time the Hungarian Government had already confiscated the Hungarian church's entire financial records, and there is reason to believe that the money cabled to the National Bank of Hungary was also confiscated. Mr. Empie declares that documents in his possession prove that repeated offers were made to Bishop Ordass by the Hungarian Government to drop all charges of financial irregularity if he would endorse the Government's school policy. It was easy for the Government to make this proposal for the foreign currency manipulation story was its own creation. Why then has the Communist government of Hungary brought such a preposterous charge against these most honorable church leaders? The reason is simple. The Hungarian Communists were resolved to ruin these church leaders both physically and morally. One of the most effective methods of discrediting church dignitaries in any society is to bring charges of embezzlement and currency manipulation against them. This is the explanation for the preposterous and fortunately unproven charge against the worthy church leaders of Hungary.

No concessions and compromises are feasible in dealing with the Communists. Concessions, when made, bring forth no benefits because our adversary is out to enslave us spiritually; it is our souls that he wants and not just our physical possessions. And in these days wherever the battle for one's soul is raging the Communist enemy is giving no quarter. Those who indulge in a soft-hearted humanitarian generosity are regarded and despised by Communists as weaklings and feeble souls.

Americans of the Jewish, Catholic and Protestant faiths are united in their respect and affection for this great churchman. All join in the fervent prayer that communism will be crushed in Hungary and that the beloved bishop will soon take his rightful place among his fellow countrymen.

New York Times Correspondent Reports No Large-Scale Communism in Israel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I am sure many Members of this House will recall the dire warnings about 2 years ago when the State of Israel was established that the Jewish state would be a hot-bed of communism. Not only was this threat spread far and wide by Arab propagandists in the Middle East, but some of our own officials in the State Department were beginning to believe it.

Now, more than 2 years since the state has been created, we learn from informed correspondents that there are no indications of large-scale Communist efforts in Israel similar to those in other countries and that "Israel's bulwark against communism is simply Zionism." That last observation, incidentally, is also the best reply to those who maintain the gross falsehood that communism and zionism are interrelated or synonymous.

The New York Times of last Sunday, August 27, published an interesting article on the subject from its correspondent in Tel Aviv, Gene Currivan. Mr. Currivan's article Communist Gains Are Few in Israel, is as follows:

COMMUNIST GAINS ARE FEW IN ISRAEL—BUCHAREST-DIRECTED EFFORTS MEET STRONG OPPOSITION IN TENETS OF ZIONISM

(By Gene Currivan)

TEL AVIV, ISRAEL, August 26.—There is an incipient threat of communism in Israel, but it has not reached the stage where the state fathers are worried. One of the principal barriers against it is that communism is basically anti-Zionist.

The Communist Party itself apparently receives its orders through Bucharest, and it has been apparent that these orders are often delayed to the point of embarrassment.

CROSSED SIGNALS

For example, when Russia declared herself in favor of the partition of Palestine the Communist Party here was violently opposed to partition. On the same day when Andrei A. Gromyko espoused the cause in the United Nations the local Communist newspaper Kol Haam had a story denouncing such a step in the most emphatic terms.

Similarly, when Russia favored the internationalization of Jerusalem, no one had bothered to inform the local Communist Party, and it had demonstrators in the Jerusalem streets denouncing the "imperialistic trick."

Russia has since opposed the internationalization, throwing her local satellites farther afield. When they pull themselves together, there is little left for them to do but try to keep Israel off balance by unemployment demonstrations, insidious propaganda and preying on current discontent among newly arrived immigrants.

HELP FROM MAPAM

Communism is helped considerably by Mapam, the opposition party. To a certain extent the Communists here feel they have a friend in Mapam, but this alleged friendship appears only on the surface.

Mapam is not directed from Moscow and, while the organization has definite leftist and eastward leanings, these are based primarily on idealistic inclinations rather than on a practical Marxian view of things.

Mapam believes that the present government of Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion under Mapai leadership has forsaken its averred neutrality and is swayed completely by the Western Powers.

At the same time, Mapam does not conform to the Communist party line, although it favors an extreme socialism far beyond that admitted by the Ben-Gurion Government, which momentarily is trying to define its own line of the demarcation between primary socialism and democracy as it is known in the United States.

OPPOSING PRINCIPLES

Kipling's phrase, "Never the twain shall meet," may be applied here, as there is little likelihood that Communist Russia can ever become reconciled with the fundamental principles of Zionism as expounded and practiced by the leaders of Israel.

There have been recent instances where Mapam settlements have expelled Communists from their midst because of dissemination of Soviet propaganda considered inimical to the interests of the settlements.

A Communist delegation of three, including one Arab in the Knesset (Parliament), has been ineffectual, although it invariably votes along with Mapam on economic and budgetary problems. On foreign affairs the Communists follow the line dictated from Moscow, while Mapam hesitates but insists on abandonment of the so-called neutrality on the part of the Government and a further leaning toward the East.

NO REAL DANGER

The Communists are being closely watched, especially those among incoming immigrant groups; but so far they have not constituted a real danger. Wherever cells form they are broken up and not allowed to propagate.

There have been so-called Communist demonstrations because of unemployment and there have been agitators who wrecked movie screens because Korean fighting films were shown. But it has rarely been proved that these sporadic uprisings were anything more than the work of over-zealous youngsters who were intent on creating trouble.

There have been no indications of large-scale, organized efforts similar to those that have been made in other countries.

Israel's bulwark against communism is simply Zionism.

The Stake of the Philippines in the Battle for Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 29 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a very fine statement made on August 3 by Gen. Carlos P. Romulo, Philippine Secretary of Foreign Affairs, before a committee of the Philippine Congress.

This article sets forth the policy of the Philippine Government with regard to Korea and with regard to the decision by the Philippine Government to send troops to Korea as part of the United Nations forces there.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On the question of the sending of troops to Korea, His Excellency, the President, has stated the administration's stand in his message to Congress which he read before you yesterday. I, therefore, will not comment on that question. I wish, however, to take advantage of this opportunity to answer what I believe is the query in the minds of our people today: What is the stake of the Philippines in the battle for Korea?

A good approach to an answer would be to consider the larger question: What is at stake in the battle for Korea? The question may be answered on two levels. On the level of international morality, mankind has been called upon to decide whether it is to permit any nation to challenge willfully and by force of arms the measures which the appropriate organs of the United Nations have taken in order to maintain international peace and security. On the level of ideological interest, we of the free world have been called upon to decide whether we are willing to allow any further encroachment by aggressive totalitarian forces upon the free areas of the world. The answer to both questions is "No," and it has been decided to back up that answer, welling out of the aroused conscience of mankind with more than words. The free world has decided to meet force with force.

Our constitution affirms that the Philippines renounces war as an instrument of national policy and adopts the generally accepted principles of international law as part of the law of the nation. As I have stated on more than one occasion, this provision of our fundamental law is a significant milestone in the annals of constitution making. It was the first full and candid statement of a principle that has since become the cornerstone of the modern law of nations.

But the renunciation of war as an instrument of national policy meant only that resort to aggressive war would be abandoned in favor of the peaceful alternatives to war. It did not rule out necessary measures of self-defense nor did it prescribe such measures, including the use of armed force, which the international community may take in the common interest to preserve the peace.

The incorporation "of the generally accepted principles of international law as part of the law of the Nation" was an enlightened act. It is, nevertheless, somewhat vitiated by the prevailing vagueness of international law and the long-standing debate as to what are the principles thereof that are generally accepted. For our present purpose, it is only necessary to state that the principle of traditional international law which once sanctioned the resort to force as a necessary concomitant of the concept of absolute sovereignty has yielded, in modern times, to the principle which enjoins the pacific settlement of disputes and the legal regulation of war by international action as a consequence of the newer doctrine of limited national sovereignty. The acceptance of our people of this newer and more enlightened principle of international law is thus implicit in the provision of the Philippine Constitution just cited.

By the terms, therefore, of our own fundamental law, we have a vital stake in the battle for Korea. It is a decisive struggle against the vicious concept of aggressive war as a prerogative of the sovereign state and in favor of the humane principle of the avoidance of war through peaceful conciliation as a primary obligation of the state in the developing system of international organization.

The Republic of Korea is one of the three states (Israel and Indonesia being the two others) in whose birth the United Nations played an active part. The United Nations, therefore, is involved in the fate of Korea by this act of participation. As a faithful member of the United Nations the Philippines shares in the common responsibility which flows from that act. But the Philippines, as a neighbor of Korea, has a special reason to feel concerned. Our country has been represented on the United Nations Commission on Korea from the beginning and it was among the first to extend full recognition to Korea as an independent state. Our support of the United Nations effort to preserve the integrity and independence of the Republic of Korea thus springs indirectly from our membership in the United Nations as well as directly from the intimate relations of sympathy and assistance which our Government has maintained with the government of that unhappy country.

An examination of the relevant provisions of the United Nations Charter resolves all doubt as to the reason and nature of our country's involvement. Article 2 of the Charter sets forth in the plainest possible terms the basic principles of what has been called the modern law of nations, the seminal doctrines underlying the new system of international organization. It enjoins all member states to fulfill in good faith the obligations assumed by them in accordance with the present Charter and imposes upon them the primary obligation to settle their international disputes by peaceful means in such manner that international peace and security, and justice, are not endangered. It requires member states to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state. It obliges them to give the United Nations every assistance in any action it takes in accordance with the present Charter, and conversely, to refrain from giving any assistance to any state against which the United Nations is taking preventive or enforcement action. Further, the entire United Nations organization has the obligation, under this article, to ensure that states which are not members of the United Nations act in accordance with these principles so far as may be necessary for the maintenance of international peace and security. Finally, paragraph 7 of article 2, while expressly prohibiting any intervention by the United Nations in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state, nevertheless exempts from such prohibition any action which may be required to prevent or to cope with actual threats to the peace, breaches of the peace, and acts of aggression.

Nonintervention in Korea may not, therefore, be defended on the ground that Korea is not a member of the United Nations nor on the allegation that the fighting there is a civil war. It falls squarely under, and it is the first such case to require the application of the military enforcement provisions of chapter 7 of the Charter.

In further implementation of the obligations which members of the United Nations have assumed under the Charter, the General Assembly unanimously approved on December 13, a resolution affirming the principles defined as crimes against peace the planning, preparation, initiation or waging of a war of aggression, or a war in violation of international law, treaties, agreements or assurances, or participation in a common plan or conspiracy for the accomplishment of the foregoing.

These are binding principles of international law which our country has accepted by virtue of an express provision of our Constitution and by virtue of our signature on the Charter of the United Nations. They form part of the overriding rules of law to which we are irrevocably committed and to which we owe unswerving obedience.

The final act of the Baguio Conference of 1950 reaffirms the belief of the participating states "in the purposes and principles of the United Nations" and, in particular, in "the need for closer cooperation in an atmosphere of freedom" and "for people to live together in peace and friendship." The Philippine Government at whose instance the Baguio Conference was convened, has a special responsibility in helping to assure the fulfillment in good faith of the principles that were reaffirmed by that conference.

I have so far discussed the battle for Korea as a logical and necessary consequence of our self-imposed obligations under our own Constitution and of our acquired obligations under the Charter of the United Nations. I have dealt with it from a national, international, and regional point of view. We have a stake in that struggle by virtue of our membership in the international community.

But our stake rests upon a more intimate and, in a sense, a more compelling consideration. It was inevitable that the United States of America, in its role as leader of the free world, would assume the major responsibility in the field for any enforcement measures that may be taken in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations. Our country is similarly bound as a member of the United Nations to offer such assistance to these measures as lies in our power to give. But, our special relations with the United States, which have sprung from a common law of liberty, a shared allegiance to democracy, and a battle-tested comradeship, contribute an element of urgency to our obligation. Pervasive and powerful in peace, these relations exert an even more potent influence in time of war. And while the spirit animating them need not have required express statement in a diplomatic instrument, it has nevertheless been embodied in at least two formal treaties entered into between the United States and the Philippines: The agreement concerning military bases and the agreement concerning military assistance to the Philippines.

Under the terms of the first-mentioned treaty, the two countries recognized that mutuality of interest in matters relating to the defense of their respective territories "demands that the governments of the two countries take the necessary measures to promote their mutual security and to defend their territories and areas," and accordingly affirmed their desire to cooperate" in the common defense of their two countries through arrangements consonant with the procedures and objectives of the United Nations." In the second agreement, it is stated that "in view of the mutual interest of the two governments in matters of common defense, the President of the United States of America has authorized the rendering of military assistance to the Republic of the Philippines toward establishing and maintaining national security and toward forming a basis for participation by that government in such defensive military preparations as the future may require."

Nobody will deny that the Korean crisis directly impinges upon the security of the Philippines either through the possibility, however remote it may seem at this time, of a physical extension of the area of the struggle or through the other possibility which seems more likely, of a chain reaction of subversive activities in the other countries of the region which might result from the failure of the United Nations effort in Korea. To the extent, therefore, that the security of the Philippines would be threatened by such a failure in Korea, the obligations that are implied in these two agreements would come into force and they would define in stark and naked fashion the nature of our stake in the battle for Korea.

In the meantime, it is well for our people to recognize that our stake in Korea is clearly defined by the basic instruments by which we have established ourselves as an independent nation, as a loyal member of the United Nations, and as a faithful ally of the United States. No compulsion, legal or moral, can be greater than that which flows from these.

Yet, in a larger sense, our obligations spring from a much deeper source. It has become a truism in the modern world that no nation can live by and for itself alone. No event of any importance that happens anywhere leaves the rest of mankind untouched. To paraphrase the seventeenth century English poet, John Donne: "No country is an island by itself but a part of the main; all the nations are involved in one another, and the fate of one influences the fortunes of all the rest. Under the canopy of heaven all nations are kin."

This would be true if what has happened in Korea had happened 10,000 miles away in a remote corner of the globe. But Korea is next door to us and the outcome of the struggle there will have an immediate and unavoidable influence, for good or evil, upon our country. What has happened in Korea can happen here. What we do to help the United Nations effort in Korea is the first premium we pay on the insurance we now must take against the risk of aggression and the threat of force by an implacable enemy.

Gentlemen, these are my views which I have given to you at your request as the policy-formulating body of our Republic, in the hope that they will help guide you in making the decision that you deem best for our people.

The Political Parade

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 15, 1950

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by George Rothwell Brown:

CHICAGO, August 29, 1950.

Secretary of State Dean Acheson has become a millstone around the neck of every Democratic candidate for Senate and House in this year's elections.

He is the No. 1 political liability of the Truman administration as it faces defeat in so many pivotal States in November as to endanger its control of Congress and perhaps the renomination of the President for a third term in 1952.

As Acheson's reputation as a statesman has dropped below the vanishing point, that of Gen. Douglas MacArthur has risen both as a statesman and a soldier in every State whose political situation has recently been studied by this correspondent.

An inevitable comparison is being made between the man whose policies are held responsible for our bloody misadventure in Korea, with that of the only man able to cope with the sudden war precipitated by blundering in the State Department.

If drafted for the Presidency, this writer believes that General MacArthur could carry every one of these States without making a campaign save the campaign he is now conducting against our enemy in Asia.

Judging by the strong anti-Acheson sentiment encountered in every State surveyed since the middle of July, not only among Republicans, but among Democrats as well, the President must be under heavy pressure from his own party leaders to get another Secretary of State before the November elections.

Republican candidates everywhere are hammering away at him and they are finding the public responsive to their attacks.

Alger Hiss has become almost a political slogan, and the Secretary's unfortunate remark that he would not turn his back upon him is being coupled with the corollary that the President will not turn his back upon Dean Acheson.

The President appears to be in this dilemma: either he must retract his recent news conference statement, to the effect that Acheson would remain Secretary of State as long as he remained in the White House, and accept his resignation, or he must take to the stump in the closing month of the congressional campaign, and defend Acheson and his policies.

Most Democratic politicians would prefer the President to follow the first course, and quietly ease Mr. Acheson out of office.

If Acheson remains, then State Department policy in Korea, China, and Formosa must be defended by the President to give much needed support and encouragement to hard-pressed Democratic candidates who are in the same boat with the Washington administration and can find no way to get out.

In Idaho Herman Welker is making slashing attacks on Acheson, and in large part owes the fact that he won the Republican senatorial nomination in the August 8 primary to this line of criticism.

In Washington State Al Canwell, one of the five candidates there for the Republican senatorial nomination, is demanding Acheson's removal.

In California the State American Legion, 170,000 strong, at its recent reunion at Sacramento, demanded Acheson's impeachment.

The Arizona Legion at its recent convention at Kingman demanded that the State's delegation in Congress work for the immediate dismissal of Secretary of State Acheson, or if necessary, his impeachment.

This action was in sharp rebuff to Senator ERNEST W. MCFARLAND, who had pleaded in person with the Legionaires to forget our past mistakes.

This is the Fair Deal's last line of defense. The Arizona Legion ignored it.

These are only a few straws showing the direction of the political wind.

Meanwhile the Pacific Coast and Mountain States, closest to the war, look to MacArthur as their only hope, finding none in Washington.

The Shortage of Doctors

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I commend to the attention of my colleagues the following article entitled "The Shortage of Doctors," by Jean Begeman, which appeared in the New Republic of August 28, 1950:

THE SHORTAGE OF DOCTORS

(By Jean Begeman)

The obduracy of the American Medical Association, which for 4 years has deprived the Nation of Federal health insurance, will jeopardize the care of our Armed Forces and the health of all civilians if the present war emergency grows.

President Truman has repeatedly pointed out that the United States needs about 20 percent more doctors and vastly more health technicians, even in peacetime. In spite of numerous requests from the President for Federal aid for medical education and hospital construction, Congress has chosen to listen to organized medicine and its allied lobbies against these measures. A bill sponsored by Representative ANDREW BIEMILLER, Democrat, of Wisconsin, to provide a 5-year program of Federal grants to medical schools to meet the cost of instruction and equipment has been blocked for 2 years by what BIEMILLER has termed "the stalling, twisting, turning, conniving tactics of the American Medical Association." As a result, even the crisis in Korea is straining our supply of trained doctors and nurses.

The Surgeon General of the Army reports that it has been impossible to obtain the 354 doctors for the Army or the 400 doctors for the Navy that were needed immediately following the Korean outbreak. The Army sent 3,000 letters to medical reservists urging them to volunteer for active duty. Twenty-eight hundred ignored the appeal entirely. Out of the 200 who replied, a mere 15 volunteered.

The drain on our medical resources which will take place if the Korean war continues will be staggering. In World War II, many areas already suffering from a shortage of doctors were completely deprived of regular medical service. The Army alone took from civilian practice 46,362 doctors, 14,620 dentists, 57,446 nurses, and 26,305 medical technicians. Our need for medical care in the event of another general war would, of course, make even these numbers insignificant.

Dr. P. J. Carroll, dean of the school of medicine of Creighton University, at Omaha, Nebr., in urging passage of BIEMILLER's bill has pointed out that—

"In the event of another world war, we shall not be able to leave the civilian population without adequate medical services as was done during the last war. There was no conflict or even a threat of conflict within our borders. The next war will be different. Our large cities will be enemy targets and a large part of the population will be evacuated. It will be necessary to disperse our civilian population in small concentrations away from military installations. * * * The greater the dispersion of our people the greater will be the need for more physicians."

Certainly military and civilian needs cannot both be met if some of the privately owned schools, which comprise 42 of the 78 medical schools in the whole country, are allowed to close their doors for lack of funds.

The minimum program which this Congress has before it would provide about $5,000,000 annually for construction of medical-school buildings and equipment, and a sliding scale of grants to schools, for student training, from $39,000,000 the first year to $54,000,000 the fifth. It would make a Federal contribution of up to $500 for each medical student already enrolled and up to $1,000 for each new student. Today a student's tuition pays for just one-fourth of the cost.

Until now, the AMA has been able to block this program without stirring up any vast amount of public indignation. The general public and the average doctor-member of the AMA both accept the fact that the country needs more doctors, more nurses, and more hospitals. But the manipulators of organized medicine have shaped their propaganda without heeding that attitude. On specific legislation, according to insiders in Congress, the AMA has a notorious record of "compromise and then oppose the compromise."

Almost the only organized support for medical preparedness has come from the Committee for the Nation's Health, a small group of independent doctors and citizens who have stood behind all phases of the administration's health program. But the committee is a puny David beside the AMA Goliath—it is able to raise and spend less than a penny for each AMA dollar used to lobby against the health program. "Organized medicine," the committee reports, "last year budgeted over $2,000,000 against the President's program and distributed 55,000,000 pieces of propaganda during those 12 months."

The Association of American Medical Colleges found, on polling its membership, that most of them not only do not agree with the AMA's position but feel a great urgency for Federal aid to the medical schools. Returns from 63 schools showed 47 favorable to such legislation and only 16 opposed. Of 26 State-owned schools covered, 14 favored and 12 opposed. Of the 35 private institutions whose plight is the most critical, 31 were favorable, only 4 opposed.

In its agitation against Federal health protection, the AMA has had the help of the formidable insurance and housing lobbies and the United States Chamber of Commerce, all three of which have spent heavily and distributed in large amounts anti-health-insurance and anti-medical-aid literature.

Crack Down

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from today's Washington Post:

CRACK DOWN

Just as the purpose of government is to govern, so the business of a President is to lead and to brook no trespass upon his prerogative. Under our system he is the only representative of all the people. Mr. Truman has reaffirmed his role in his crackdown, first on Secretary Matthews and now on General MacArthur, and in so doing has cleared the air both at home and abroad. General MacArthur was creating bewilderment at home and a growing dismay in the United Nations. He was giving the impression that he was a law unto himself. He got away with it in the Roosevelt Administration, but Mr. Truman has shown that he is made of sterner stuff that Mr. Roosevelt, and the people, whose institutions rest upon the principle of civilian supremacy, have reason to be grateful that he is.

Voices have been raised on Capitol Hill that the President has imposed a gag. The publication of the MacArthur speech alongside the news of the Truman action disposes of the charge in this particular matter. This was a Presidential gesture, and a gesture which had to be made before and not after the event, for any ex post facto statement from the White House would have served no purpose except to emphasize that General MacArthur was on his own. This would have been an intolerable situation. What the President has done is to reestablish discipline. Without a doubt the views of General MacArthur are worthy of consideration, but he is out of order in interpreting the policy which he is administering in a way that does violence, whether wittingly or not, to the Presidential intent. He has mistaken his proconsular role as that of first consul, and we have confidence that the American people will see it that way.

Wherein lay the error of General MacArthur? On June 27 the President ordered the Seventh Fleet to neutralize Formosa—by preventing a Communist attack on Formosa and, as a corollary, by preventing a Nationalist attack on the Chinese mainland. He said nothing about defending Formosa. Yet the emphasis in Tokyo has been on defense, and, that being so, a near-alliance has been rapidly growing up with Chiang Kai-shek. It was celebrated by the highly publicized MacArthur visit to Chiang Kai-shek. The mission, and the theatrics attendant upon it, made the policy makers in Washington swallow hard, though, for the sake of appearances, they tried to make out that everything was hunky-dory. Then General MacArthur went too far in a flamboyant speech for delivery to the Veterans of Foreign Wars which he never bothered to clear with the Defense Department and which went out a week ahead of the event. Having already forced the pace on the President, General MacArthur spoke about the defense of Formosa at greater length, warmed up the close relations he had established with Chiang Kai-shek by his hostile reference to the Chinese Communist (though without mentioning either) and told the veterans how the Orientals loved an aggressive policy. There was not a word in the speech about the United Nations, though the policy had been reported to the United Nations and its investigation and consideration invited in furthering the policy.

The difference between the President and General MacArthur is the whole width of the Formosa Straits. Yet there is bland wonderment in Tokyo about the President's attitude. All he has done is to remind General MacArthur who's the boss, get the Truman policy back on the beam so as to remove all the misunderstanding, and stop MacArthur from boxing him in. That is all, and it is about time. What the United States is trying to do in Formosa is to keep the island out of war, not to push it in. It is a most delicate operation, but it was not being helped by the slant that General MacArthur was spectacularly giving to it. The incident is again a reminder of a tendency familiar in our history of forgetting policy when policy has entered a military area.

Let the GOP Show a Positive Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE N. ASPINALL
OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as a great deal of time on the floor of the House is given over to the voicing of political recriminations by members of each party against the other and it appears to many Members of the House and to a great segment of the population of our country that this is not only a waste of valuable time but also a possible advantage to our opposition throughout the world, I believe that an editorial which recently appeared in the Denver Post, a newspaper of national and international influence, is not only interesting but timely. I am pleased to place such editorial in the RECORD in order that each Member of Congress may have the opportunity to read and study this meaningful statement.

LET THE GOP SHOW A POSITIVE POLICY

Washington has the jitters these days. The most casual visitor cannot help but notice it, and shudder at the stupendous confusion that seems to surround our Nation's Capital like a shroud.

The great decision of our time has not been made—the decision of total mobilization or policy of business as usual but with higher taxes and more defense, or partial mobilization.

That decision is most difficult. Unless events force it, the decision will certainly be stalled until after November, for the Truman administration has a great desire not to take strong action unless absolutely necessary until after the ticklish elections.

In the midst of such confusion the Republicans are doing their country small service in the peculiar kind of attacks they are waging on the Democratic administration.

Bitter attack on the Government's foreign policy does not make a great deal of sense when it is remembered that some of the most vital acts in the foreign policy drama were played under the Republican dominated Eightieth Congress in 1947 and 1948.

Republican attacks on foreign policy and our lack of preparedness are made without mention of the loud Republican yapping about continued expenditure for defense after VJ-day. The Republicans now posing as the potential saviors of our Nation, forget that their platform of 1948 contained no criticism of our defense policy, that the most recent Republican statement of policy, made shortly before the Korean affair said absolutely nothing about defense.

The Republicans, we know, were just like the rest of us. They did not know how badly prepared we were, and they did not think to investigate and cry out.

This is no defense of Secretary Johnson's loud-mouthed blundering. It lends no semblance of excuse for our naiveté in believing that we could hope for peace without backing our hopes with force of arms. We must remember though, that this was national naiveté, encompassing the Republicans as well as the Democrats.

When the Republicans scream about inflation, we must remember who killed OPA—the Republican Eigtheth Congress. We must always remember who has shouted for more and more normalcy and less and less foreign spending. We must remember the isolationism, past and present, of Senator TAFT.

The Republicans, as a group, seem little better or worse than the Democrats. The GOP has most certainly failed to fulfill its duties as a loyal opposition, if it could have shown that our defense preparations were inadequate and did no more than it has done about them.

Even Harold Stassen has risen from his political grave to denounce Democratic policies and to try to come alive again as a Republican leader. But Stassen must always be remembered as the man who equated socialism and communism, and in debate with Governor Dewey in Oregon said we should withhold aid from countries that went socialist. Had his policies been followed we would be much nearer war today, at least.

In the specific question of Korea, Americans cannot ever forget that on January 19, 1950, the House of Representatives rejected a bill authorizing $60,000,000 for Korea. On that issue, the Republicans voted overwhelmingly to prevent Korea aid, 130 to 21, while the Democrats voted overwhelmingly for Korean aid, 170 to 61. How does the GOP explain that?

On sober reflection it becomes obvious that this is no time for the kind of recrimination the Republicans are hurling with shotgun and shovel. It is a time for the most extensive effort to aid our Nation and resolve the many problems facing us.

Certainly the administration has been wrong on many issues. So have the Republicans. We suggest that instead of charging the Democrats with all the wrongs, the Republicans discuss a few specific constructive actions they would take if they are returned in force next fall.

Aren't You Grown-Ups Ashamed for What You Are Doing to Me?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD H. JENISON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. JENISON. Mr. Speaker, Earl Browder, former head of the Communist Party in America, recently stated that state capitalism in the United States leaped forward to a new high in the decade of 1939–49 and that state capitalism in substance if not in formal aspects has progressed further in America than in Great Britain under the Labor government. The Communist leaders also have predicted that the United States will eventually spend itself into collapse.

Communists are aware of the dangers faced by America due to deficit financing, overspending, and excessive taxation. But what of the American people? Do they realize it? And, if so, what's to be done?

The average American seems oblivious of the fact that a dirty trick is being played on the children of the United States—every one of them—because it is the young people who must assume eventually the obligation of unpaid debt now accumulating because of the policies of the tax-and-spend boys who constantly have their hands out for more and more public funds for various pet projects and schemes at home and abroad.

The tremendous burdens being heaped on the shoulders of the children of America is being dramatized in a campaign inaugurated by the Taxpayers' Federation of Illinois in June. The campaign, which has received Nationwide attention from the press and the pulpit, as well as business and industry, is worthy of the attention of every Member of Congress, for we, too, must recognize our share of the responsibility for placing a mortgage on the future of every American child.

The federation's program has been built around an average American child called Susie, who poses a number of questions to her parents—and indirectly to all of us here in Congress—stressing this point:

"Aren't you grown-ups ashamed for what you are doing to me?"

How many parents, editors, educators, ministers, lawmakers, and other public officials realize exactly what is being done to our children?

The Taxpayers' Federation points out that the approximate 3,600,000 births in America in 1949, including 135,593 in my own State of Illinois, constitutes a vast army of future taxpayers who will have to pay for our fiscal follies. Each of these babies owes $2,670.68 right now as his share of the national debt. With at least 25 cents out of every dollar going for taxes, and the purchasing power of the future dollar uncertain, just realize how much more difficult it is for the parents of the State and Nation to put something aside for education of their children, to say nothing of their own future security and pensions.

Our Federal Government spent, during the past prosperous fiscal year ending June 30, billions of dollars more than its income. Our babies are going to have to pay for that. Now, war spending means billions piled on billions of increased debt. The total debt of our Federal Government is now in excess of a quarter of a trillion dollars and still growing. Our babies are going to have to pay that debt.

If our Federal Government cannot balance its budget and live within its income today, when we are already paying exorbitant taxes, what does the future hold for our babies?

Still higher taxes?

Still higher prices?

Still more controls and less opportunity?

There is some moral justification in asking our babies to help pay the debt created by the cost of the wars to preserve our country and theirs. But there is no moral justification for us to saddle on our babies the total cost of those wars. We too should pay off part of that debt instead of adding to it year after year.

It is completely immoral and unjustifiable to allow our Government to continue to pile debt on the backs of our babies by pouring billions of their dollars down the multitudinous ratholes uncovered by the Hoover Commission report.

The federation explains that a married man with one child earning $60 weekly gets only $55.70 because of Federal taxes, amounting to $223.60 annually, but in addition to that he must also pay State and local taxes and must absorb various hidden taxes on all merchandise.

Hidden taxes account for 5 cents of the price of a loaf of bread, which includes 151 different taxes; they account for 11 cents of a 20 cent package of cigarettes and for at least $355 of the price of a new car. The price of every single thing we buy includes taxes to pay the high cost of government.

The federation argues that we teach our children in our homes and in our schools and in our churches that it is neither good business nor good morals to spend more than we earn. No mother ever teaches her child to be a spendthrift, or idler, or agitator.

Is it not equally immoral for the Nation to do so?

The Taxpayers' Federation of Illinois is a citizen-supported, State-wide organization working to get our money's worth from Government. The executive secretary, George E. Mahin, of Springfield, who directed the recent campaign in behalf of "Susie" and all other American children, has raised arguments that should alert thousands of Americans to the seriousness of the situation confronting all of us.

Unless we achieve economy in our private lives, and particularly in government, the future of our Nation and its citizens is at stake.

The Mundt-Nixon-Wood Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BEN F. JENSEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay a well-earned and high tribute to the members of the Un-American Activities Committee of the House for the great, good, and patriotic service they have rendered America after long hearings and deliberations, in bringing many subversive persons and Communists in our midst to the bar of justice, and for bringing this Mundt-Nixon-Wood bill to the floor of the House.

I am sorry, indeed, that the original Mundt-Nixon bill, which was adopted by this body during the Eightieth Congress, was pigeonholed by the other body at the request of President Truman. Had the bill become law at that time, many more of these Red rascals still running at large would have been silenced long ago, and above all, fine American boys would not be shedding their blood on foreign soil today.

The gentleman from California [Mr. NIXON] has proven himself to be one of the greatest patriots in all American history, along with other members of this great committee.

Mr. Speaker, again I say we had best stop these Communists and fellow travelers within our own shores, with legislation, before we find it absolutely necessary to stop the Red rascal with bullets and bayonets, and that time is fast approaching. Under present conditions that is a certainty for the American people are fast loosing their tolerance and patience with this un-American, ungodly outfit.

I hope the bill will pass the House by a unanimous vote.

Expression of a Disturbed American

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. KRUSE, JR.
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. KRUSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to place in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter written by a patriotic and disturbed American, and published by the Fort Wayne News Sentinel. In taking this action, I am glad to comply with the request of several of my constituents.

Some of the statements in this letter are a matter of considerable discussion and controversy today, but I feel that such expressions symbolize some of the existing feeling at this time. Surely it is for those of us in positions of leadership to weigh carefully those vital decisions which we are called upon to make at this time. The letter reads as follows:

What I am about to write probably will bring me criticism and unfavorable publicity because, once the Armed Forces of the Nation are committed, the patriot is supposed to forget personal views and principles and get behind the administration at whatever cost.

In defense of my patriotism, my husband and my father fought in World War I. Even now, at 80, my father is Arizona Director of Selective Service and Adjutant General of the National Guard--also, incidentally, a lifelong Democrat. My son was a fighter pilot and my son-in-law an ensign in World War II. We all stand ready to serve again to the best of our abilities.

My son and son-in-law are just 25, so theirs will again be active service—which brings me to the reason for this letter.

If my boys have to give up promising careers and again go to war, I want them to have the benefit of support from leadership of unquestioned loyalty and outstanding ability.

To that end and as a beginning, I want to see a general overhauling of the State Department.

There is no need to cite examples of the present Department's mistakes. The results of these men's judgment—whether deliberately traitorous, or just plain stupid—are clear for all to see. We came out of the last war the strongest nation on earth. Today our boys are dying in a situation strikingly like Bataan. We have little more than a toehold in Asia. Russia is calling the plays.

If the views of MacArthur and General Wedemeyer had prevailed, Manchuria would have been placed under a UN trusteeship, China would not have been lost, and Korea would not now be under attack. Washington was warned more than 3 years ago that the Reds were organizing an army to invade South Korea. But the native troops we trained there were not, according to Gen. William L. Roberts, head of our military mission in Korea, allowed any offensive weapons such as tanks—this on order of our State Department.

MacArthur has had nothing to do with Korea or its defense program for 2 years. But when Truman suddenly reversed the Acheson policy, MacArthur was given only a few hours to meet an attack the Reds had been preparing for 3 years.

Now MacArthur and boys like my sons are heroically trying to salvage a situation for which our diplomats and politicians are wholly to blame.

There is no less pain for a mother who loses her son, or a wife her husband, whether she be Republican or Democrat. Should not Republicans and Democrats all insist that the Achesons, Lattimores, Jessups, Services, et al., be routed from their positions of influence? To replace them there are Democrats and Republicans of unimpeachable honor and ability to choose from.

When our President asks us for the sacrifices necessary to carry this conflict to a successful conclusion, he should show his own sincerity of purpose by acknowledging and correcting the tragic mistakes of his administration. Immediate action on his part is vital.

There are others in high places who share the blame for the agony of our outnumbered and poorly equipped men in Korea, but let's take first things first and start with the State Department. While our boys are winning battles on far-flung battlefields, the American way of life may be lost in Washington.

Mrs. A. D. LANGE,
New Augusta, Ind.

Release on Bail of Harry Bridges

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, the actions of a majority—two out of three—of the justices of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in overruling the trial judge and releasing Harry B. Bridges, convicted of perjury, to bail is most unusual, and difficult to understand.

In view of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure (rule 46 (a) (2)), as well as decided cases, as set forth in the memorandum included herein, it would appear that not only the Federal Rules of Procedure were given scant attention—"The court or the judge or justice allowing bail may at any time revoke the order admitting the defendant to bail," but the public welfare element stressed in the case of United States v. St. John ((C. C. A. 7) 254 Fed. 794), seems to have been ignored or given scant consideration.

The Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure were adopted pursuant to the act of February 24, 1933 (47 Stat. 904) as amended by the act of March 8, 1934 (48 Stat. 399), and were formally promulgated on March 21, 1946.

Rule 46 (A) (2) provides as follows:

Bail may be allowed pending appeal or certiorari only if it appears that the case involves a substantial question which should be determined by the appellate court. Bail may be allowed by the trial judge or by the appellate court or by any judge thereof or by the circuit justice. The court or the judge or justice allowing bail may at any time revoke the order admitting the defendant to bail. [Italics added.]

In the case of the United States v. St. John (C. C. A. 7, 254 Fed. 794) the defendant with other members of the IWW was convicted of conspiracy to violate the Espionage Act of June 15, 1917 (40 Stat. 231). He applied for bail pending his appeal and was refused by the trial judge and the Circuit Court of Appeals sustained the trial judge's refusal on the ground that the "public welfare" among other elements should be considered. The circuit court in its opinion of the above case said in part:

The statement [of the trial judge] shows that acts were committed and a policy pursued by many members of an organization known and referred to as the IWW that were wholly at variance with the policy of this Government during the war and equally hostile to the welfare of the people and industries * * *. Certainly members of the organization known as the IWW are not in an enviable position to urge the impairment of their property rights now in view of their attitude towards property during the past year. I conclude the request for bail should be and is hereby denied.

United States v. Schuermann (79 Fed. Supp. 250) in denying bail pending appeal held that the "defendant's attitude appeared to be one of defiance of the law with which he apparently was not in agreement since the defendant was continuing and intended to continue, perpetrating acts in conflict with the law of the State."

In denying bail pending appeal in the case of United States v. Delaney ((D. C. N. J.) Fed. Supp. 224), Judge Clark said:

A sound balance between speed of punishment and certainty of guilt, between accusing society and the individual accused depends, we think, first upon the probabilities of reversal of his conviction, second, upon his personal circumstances and third, upon his personal attitude toward society as organized in Government. [Italics added.]

Mr. Justice Cardozo, in the case of Snyder v. The Commonwealth of Massachusetts (291 U. S. 97, at 122), said:

Consideration should be given, after conviction, and in the exercise of the authority vested in the Court, Judge or Justice allowing bail to revoke the same at any time, to the likelihood that the defendant would, if enlarged on bail, continue the course of unlawful conduct which had brought about his conviction.

See also United States ex rel. Estabrook v. Otis ((C. C. A. 8) 18 Fed. (2) 689) and Parmagini v. United States (42 Fed. (2) 721).

In the case of Harry Benton Bridges et al. v. United States of America (No. 12597 C. C. A. 9, filed August 10, 1950), the record of proceedings in the district court was such that the court might reasonably conclude and did in effect conclude that—

(A) Appellant Bridges as the jury found, was a member of the Communist Party of the United States and had falsely denied such membership under oath in his naturalization proceedings in the Superior Court of California.

(B) That appellant Bridges is probably one of the most potent figures in the Communist Party of America today.

(C) That appellant Bridges is now president whether honorary or otherwise, of the Maritime Federation of Trade-Unions, which is international and is controlled and dominated by Communists.

(D) That this international Communist-controlled organization has called on all its affiliates to take all immediate and indispensable action to defeat the diabolical plans of the American war mongers with regard to the present armed conflict in Koren.

(E) That appellant Bridges is in a position on the water front of San Francisco to exert substantial influence and serious detriment to the Armed Forces of the United States of America now engaged in hostilities in Korea.

(F) That since the outbreak of hostilities in Korea appellant Bridges has appeared and obstructed measures to promote national security and aid the Armed Forces of the United States in the Korean struggle by endeavoring to sidetrack a resolution by which longshoremen would have agreed to load any and all cargoes destined for the war areas.

(G) That appellant Bridges is an agent dedicated to execute the Communist program both national and international.

(H) That in the activities of the appellant Bridges heretofore mentioned he was acting in the interest and at the behest of the Communist Party of the United States, etc.

(I) That appellant Bridges is in a position to work detriment to the interests of the United States by studied, subtle means and adroit Communist tactics and practices.

(J) That the conduct of appellant Bridges since his release on bail is opposed to the welfare of the United States in this period of crisis and emergency.

The foregoing from A to J is contained in the Government's brief field in this case.

Mr. Justice Healy, writing the majority opinion for the circuit court in the case (Bridges against United States) which was rendered on August 24, 1950, quotes the case of D'Aquino v. United States (180 Fed. 2d 271), in which Mr. Justice Douglas observed, "The test of the right to bail is as set out in rule 46 (A) (2) of the Criminal Procedure Rules, namely, whether the case involves a substantial question which should be determined by the appellate court."

Mr. Justice Mathews, who wrote the dissenting opinion in this case, very wisely calls attention to the following fact. He states on page 15 of the decision:

> The power conferred by the first two provisions of rule 46 (A) (2), the power to allow bail pending appeal, is limited to cases which appear to involve a substantial question which should be determined by the appellate court The power conferred by the final provision of rule 46 (A) (2)—the power to revoke an order admitting a defendant to bail pending appeal—is not so limited. That power may be exercised at any time, regardless of whether the case involves or does not involve a substantial question which should be determined by the appellate court. I, therefore, deem it unnecessary to express and do not express any opinion as to whether this case does or does not involve such a question. I have found no case nor have my associates cited any case holding that an order admitting a defendant to bail pending appeal may not be revoked if the case involves a substantial question which should be determined by the appellate court.

Commenting further on the judge's right to revoke bail pending appeal, Mr. Justice Mathews says:

> The power to revoke an order admitting the defendant to bail pending an appeal is a discretionary power. Hence the Government's motion to revoke the order admitting Harry Renton Bridges to bail pending appeal was addressed to Judge Harris' discretion. Unless in revoking that order Judge Harris abused his discretion, the order of revocation should not be vacated. I cannot say that Judge Harris abused his discretion. Instead, I believe that he exercised it wisely and properly.

Why Not Use Farm Surpluses in War?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. CALEB BOGGS

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. BOGGS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, on numerous occasions Senator JOHN J. WILLIAMS, the distinguished senior Senator from Delaware, has demonstrated by his public statements that he has a very great interest in and an extremely sound conception of agricultural problems in general, and especially those relating to food surpluses.

In various parts of the country Senator WILLIAMS is continuing to gain added recognition because of his keen analysis of the problems faced by farmers and of the sensible constructive solutions which he has offered.

I have now had brought to my attention, Mr. Speaker, an editorial from a recent issue of the Evening Tribune of San Diego, Calif. This editorial not only commends Senator WILLIAMS on the position he has taken with respect to farm surpluses, but serves to direct further attention to the urgent need for a remedial course of action with respect to this problem.

Therefore, I include as a part of my remarks the editorial which appeared in the San Diego Evening Tribune:

[Editorial appearing in the Evening Tribune of San Diego, Calif.]

WHY NOT USE FARM SURPLUSES IN WAR?

This is the time when farm surpluses should be an asset to the Nation, but are they? Senator WILLIAMS, Republican of Delaware, says they are not, and he demands to know why.

The Government has in storage 300,000,000 dozen eggs which cost 32 cents a dozen, the Senator reported to his colleagues. Yet the Armed Forces are buying 4,910,050 dozen at 40 cents. Butter amounting to 165,000,000 pounds, costing 60 cents a pound, is in storage, but the military has gone into the open market to buy 4,131,022 pounds at a total cost of $2,508,267. Our stored cheese surplus, amounting to 63,000,000 pounds, cost 31 cents a pound and we are buying 15,000,000 pounds more a month for storage. Yet the Government is buying 954,664 pounds at a total cost of $331,727 for the men in uniform.

Government buying of these commodities has forced prices up and Senator WILLIAMS believes that this is unnecessary and unwise. He advocates the release of these surpluses into the civilian market as a check against inflation, and there doubtless are many who will agree with his position.

Public Law 434 specifically authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to release surplus foods and commodities, which are in good condition, to the armed services. The provision was incorporated into the law in the belief that it would save the taxpayer money, and yet it isn't working out that way.

"The Government, instead of continuously condemning the American people as hoarders, should put an immediate stop to its own policy of hoarding huge quantities of food products," Senator WILLIAMS said, making a point which seems unassailable.

Harnessing the Missouri

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 29 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Harnessing the Missouri," published in the August 29 issue of The Reporter.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HARNESSING THE MISSOURI

For 20 years, the Missouri Basin has been a national problem. In the 1930's, drought, dust storms, and crop failures depleted the valley's resources. Some 300,000 people moved away to greener fields. To support those who remained, the Federal Government spent $1,200,000,000 in relief and emergency aid.

In the 1940's there was plenty of rain—so much, in fact, that destructive floods repeatedly swept down the valley. In one year alone, the value of the topsoil scoured off three States was estimated at $491,000,000. After a hundred years of exploitation, the region's resources need replenishment and conservation. That is the goal of an engineering enterprise that is now building more dams, levees, revetments, irrigation ditches, and power plants than have ever before been used in a single project. Congress has appropriated more than a billion dollars to date, and the final tab will undoubtedly run above ten billion. If this seems costly, it should be remembered what the social subsidies which opened the territory did to create wealth, employment, and private investment. If the subsidized exploitation of resources paid dividends, then possibly the subsidized conservation of them may do likewise.

That such development can provide the seedbed for private capital and generate wider economic opportunity has been demonstrated in the Tennessee Valley. Since the establishment of the Tennessee Valley Authority, per capita income in that watershed rose from 40 percent of the national average in 1933 to 60 percent in 1947. More than 2,100 new factories began operation during this period. Employment increased 123 percent while it was increasing 73 percent in the Nation as a whole. Possibly some of these gains would have taken place without TVA, but it is hard to imagine that TVA had nothing to do with them.

The Missouri Valley counts on a comparable improvement. Already there has been substantial new private investment in recreation facilities—a byproduct of the new lakes being formed behind the dams. Food processors expect to move in as irrigation in the upper basin shifts crop emphasis from grain and pasture to vegetables and dairying. Cheap power should stimulate the food-freezing industry, as it did in the Tennessee Valley. In the Dakotas it is hoped that cheap power and navigation, coupled with private investment, may unlock deposits of lignite and other marginal minerals. Judging by TVA experience, the basin may also prove attractive to small manufacturing enterprises related to local resources. Nobody expects new Pittsburghs to rise in the basin, but a basic improvement of the region's farm economy will spread throughout its area, from the marketing towns back to the wholesaling cities and the distribution centers.

Within the Missouri watershed lies one-sixth of the Nation's area and one-fourth of its cropland. Congress has undertaken to irrigate 5,000,000 acres of land, to build 2,000,000 kilowatts of electric-generating capacity, to hold down the soil against wind and rain, to render a restless, dangerous river system navigable and manageable.

But Congress has yet to face the question of whether these things are being done in the most efficient way. By launching a vast expenditure with only a makeshift plan and no clear lines of responsibility, Congress runs the risk of a gigantic boondoggle.

Some people regard as a boondoggle much of the engineering work so far done along the river. The Army Engineers have been trying, by fits and starts, since 1912, to establish a stable channel for the use of barge shipping. There is a romantic plausibility about river navigation, perhaps because it evokes memories of the days when the river was the valley's only highway. But the brutal truth is that after the dikes and revetments have all been built the volume of barge traffic will probably remain absurdly small.

Nevertheless the Army engineers have seldom met serious difficulty in obtaining appropriations. They have the backing of Congressmen, Senators, and the most important business interests of the valley cities. A Missouri Valley businessman can breathe fire about "creeping socialism" one day and ask Congress for a subsidized ship channel the next. He dreams of busy barge lines opening up new markets, providing cheap haulage for raw materials, and, above all, compelling the railroads to reduce their rates.

Drought in the 1930's and floods in the 1940's convinced both the natives and Congress that the valley, in any case, needed more than a navigable channel. A downstream clamor for flood control and an upstream clamor for irrigation set two Government agencies to work—as usual, somewhat at cross purposes.

The Army engineers prepared a blueprint primarily for navigation and flood control. This was the Pick plan, named for Maj. Gen. Lewis A. Pick, now chief of Army engineers, the colorful and persuasive technician who built the Ledo Road across Burma.

The Bureau of Reclamation, in the Department of the Interior, drew up its own plan, primarily for power and irrigation. This was the Sloan plan, named for W. G. Sloan, the Bureau's field chief in Montana. The Bureau had long been projecting an eastward push from arid into semiarid territory. For those who worried about the stepping up of farm production by one agency, at a time when other agencies were saddled with crop surpluses, the Bureau had several answers. It argued that in spite of present distribution problems an expanding economy would soon need more food production. It pointed out that irrigation would stabilize farm production in the valley, channel it into more useful forms, and make the best use of resources now partly wasted. It said its program would provide a living for 53,000 new farm families, while the accompanying power development would attract new industries, open untapped mineral resources, and help diversify the regional economy.

That the two plans would conflict was inevitable from the outset. Irrigation demands full reservoirs during the hot, dry months; flood control demands empty reservoirs whenever possible. Irrigation demands many tributary reservoirs for the thirsty land of the upper valley; navigation demands big dams on the main stream. These facts, plus the bureaucratic rivalry of two powerful agencies, the competition of the irrigation lobby with the navigation lobby, and the entrenched power of Congressmen devoted to one side or the other, all seemed to make for a classic struggle in American group pressures. The sounds of battle grew louder until the sudden emergence of a third disputant enforced a hasty truce.

The third force was an idea—the idea of a Missouri Valley Authority. Politically weak but logically and emotionally potent, the idea of a regional agency, organized as a public corporation on the model of TVA, offered a ready answer to the feud between the Bureau of Reclamation and the Army engineers. If the river had to be parceled out, unitary management of multipurpose reservoirs seemed indispensable. If Pick and Sloan could not agree, why not turn over the show to some Great Plains Lilienthal? The public-corporation form of management would remove control from bickering bureaucrats in Washington and lodge it in a directorate located in the valley itself. TVA's successful struggle to stay out of the toils of Senator McKellar had shown that a regional authority could achieve greater independence from predatory political forces than the established agencies in Washington and still work directly with the people of the region. So Senator Murray of Montana introduced an MVA bill, and such New Dealers as were left in the age of Truman rallied round.

Enthusiasm was less marked in the region itself. Usually most of the valley votes Republican. The CIO was strong for MVA, but weak in the valley. National newspapers like the New York Times and the Washington Post came out for MVA, but in the valley only the St. Louis Post-Dispatch and Star-Times took up the cause. Jim Patton's small Farmers' Union enlisted for MVA, but the massive Farm Bureau Federation and the powerful irrigators' junta either stood mute or took the other side.

The agitation for MVA had one result. It forced a shotgun marriage between the Pick and Sloan factions. The Army engineers and the Reclamation Bureau set up an advisory committee representing all the Federal agencies concerned and 10 State governments. Dams which had been furiously denounced as engineering monstrosities were now quietly approved. Where one water use conflicted with another, the new Pick-Sloan coalition proposed to build enough facilities for all of them, and decided to trust in God to provide sufficient water.

This may not have been the best engineering, but it was good politics. Congress came through with enough appropriations for work to begin on about 40 percent of the projected installations. In the Dakotas three of the five dams which will convert the Missouri into a series of lakes are under construction, with a hundred others, large and small, to come. The Army engineers are building flood levees and navigation works on the lower river, and are already talking of extending the head of navigation almost to the mouth of the Yellowstone. The Reclamation Bureau is building tributary dams and irrigation ditches in the upper valley, with a view to doubling the basin's irrigated acreage. In the two fiscal years 1949 and 1950 Congress appropriated $519,000,000 for the basin. Pick and Sloan want appropriations of $2,958,000,000 during the 5 years 1951 to 1956. Estimated needs after fiscal 1955 are placed at $5,000,000,000.

To date most of the emphasis has been on big physical structures, but these alone cannot solve all the valley's problems. Floods begin where heavy rains wash topsoil into the upland creeks. Conservationists point out that if this priceless asset is to be saved it must be saved on the uplands. This is where the Department of Agriculture and its Soil Conservation Service come in. Their job is to teach the art of saving soil—a field in which TVA has done some of its most effective work. Yet it appears to be easier to get an appropriation for a dam to hold water than for an antierosion project to prevent the reservoir from silting up. So far, the Army engineers have come away with the biggest share of the congressional appropriations.

As construction proceeds, the valley is uneasily aware that a better way of managing the project must be found. The Bureau of Reclamation and the Army engineers say they have agreed on over-all policies for operation of the dams and reservoirs, but it is clear that there will be trouble when the two agencies actually come to the point of deciding whether to release water for irrigation or hold it for navigation. The Hoover Commission bitterly condemned the Pick-Sloan team for having caused "needless delay, confusion, and gross waste of the taxpayers' money." Even the interagency committee shows signs of realizing that some form of unified management will eventually have to be devised. The MVA bill remains locked up in an unfriendly Senate committee, but it casts a long shadow up the valley.

The Price of Coffee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GUY M. GILLETTE

OF IOWA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 29 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an extract from Hanson's Latin-American Letter for August 25, 1950, relating to the subject of coffee.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE SLAPS DOWN STATE DEPARTMENT

As we forecast last week, the full Senate Agriculture Committee this week gave Senator GILLETTE and his subcommittee what amounted to a vote of confidence and shattered the State Department's hope of discrediting the subcommittee. The plan of the State Department was to discredit the subcommittee by causing withdrawal of the Gillette report and then to draft a new version which would bring coffee up to at least $1 per pound. The Senate Agriculture Committee, in an unusually well-attended meeting, rejected the State Department's plea that the subject be dropped without a report if the committee were unwilling to use a State Department version. Even Senator LUCAS did not dare bring out a report that would assure $1 a pound coffee for his Illinois constituents who are already reconciling themselves to his retirement from the Senate after election day. Nor did he dare to bury the Gillette report which alone held out any promise of relief for the American consumer.

THE NEW VERSION OF THE GILLETTE REPORT

The language of the Gillette report has been polished, but practically all the substantive recommendations remain. (a) with respect to the New York Coffee and Sugar Exchange, the recommendations for definition of a contract that will not lend itself to manipulation of the market, for institution of adequate margins for trading, and for placing trading in coffee under the Commodity Exchange Act, have been retained. (b) The recommendation to subject foreign speculators' gains to United States taxation has been retained. (c) The recommendation that foreign interests, including the Colombian Coffee Federation, be compelled to cease undesirable sales and storage practices, has been reworded so that it is even more promising of good results. Justice Department is instructed to investigate specifically the practices of the Federation and other entities, and if current legislation does not provide suitable protection against them, members of the Agriculture Committee will be able to introduce suitable legislation. (d) The recommendation that United States representation at the Inter-American Economic and Social Council Coffee Commission be strengthened has been reworded, but the substance of the recommendation is not altered. (e) The recommendation for adequate crop reporting remains. (f) Where previously the report had recommended that our lending agencies take proper cognizance of the precarious basis of coffee under its artificial price level, the new version provides that all United States agencies concerned with economic matters shall take cognizance of what is taking place in the coffee market. This means that the United States director at the World Bank which is not theoretically a United States lending agency must also take cognizance of the situation. (f) The recommendation for giving technical assistance to all nations willing to expand production now specifically spells out Latin America as well as nonhemisphere countries, but essentially this does not alter the original recommendation. (g) The recommendation that consumers follow the lower-consumption suggestions of the Department of Agriculture is retained. This means that those coffee associations which have been trying to get Agriculture Department to abstain from any consumer activity that would discourage wasteful consumption have been defeated. Their position will be on the record for the next investigation, however, and individual members of the association will be asked for their particular views on that position.

(h) There was no change in the recommendation concerning George Robbins of the General Foods Corp.

(i) You will notice that the recommendation that ECA abstain from allocating dollars for coffee has been deleted. Do not misinterpret this deletion The committee found that under the legislative directives that bind ECA, it is obligated to take due cognizance of commodity supply situations in this country and of any special demand and supply factors relating to consumption in this country before it proceeds with allocation of dollars for competitive purchases by European countries. Accordingly, the Gillette recommendation had merely reiterated what is already a basic policy. The committee thus deleted the recommendation and decided that when ECA appropriations are discussed in the Senate, this basic directive relating to supply-demand market positions could be hammered home again.

(j) The recommendation that roasters and retailers return to the same per pound profit basis as they had in early 1949 was deleted. This throws the onus completely on the foreign interests and is thus a further slap at the State Department.

AFTER THE NEW GILLETTE REPORT

The State Department still has hopes of being able to bull coffee by issuing a report of its own. It stands discredited, however, and in no position to wield the influence when war-control measures develop that it might otherwise have enjoyed. One thing that apparently startled both the Senate Agriculture Committee and some State Department officials was the enormous volume of mail to the committee and the enormous demand for copies of the Gillette report which reflected genuine consumer interest. The Senate committee had immense support from radio commentators like the ace A. F. of L. commentator and Earl Godwin, a Washington commentator with a wide audience.

Even the influential Washington Post, which has supported the State Department in the attempts to bull coffee consistently, noted this week that "something very strange has gone on in coffee prices * * * something more than a subnormal crop may be responsible for keeping prices up."

POLITICAL FEASIBILITY OF NEW HEARINGS ON COFFEE

From the viewpoint of the consumer, the best thing that can happen now is for the Latin American speculators to continue to bull coffee. This will bring a hurried call for a new investigation based on the Justice Department findings, on certain new evidence regarding market manipulation that has developed since the previous hearings closed, on new evidence regarding consumption, and on a detailed analysis of press and trade association releases. Nothing could be more desirable, politically, than hearings on coffee before the election. It is a foreign commodity with little domestic support except from a handful of manipulative interests in New York. And public resentment at the rise in the cost of living could easily be channeled into such a focal point as the price of coffee. A 100-percent rise in coffee prices is extremely conspicuous, perhaps more so than anything else that has occurred this past year in the cost of living.

COFFEE INDUSTRY LIAISON IN WASHINGTON

Finally, a suggestion to our friends in the coffee trade. Most industries are organizing for the task of Washington liaison in the war-control activity which is slowly getting under way. The Senate Agriculture Committee has now spoken out in unmistakable tones. The trade should get itself some representation that will include members of the industry who do not already stand condemned as a result of their testimony before the committee, and as much as possible use a liaison organization that is not associated with either the 1946 OPA-death fight or the 1949-50 fight to protect speculators. Don't send into Washington any man or group that tried to blacken the name of Senator GILLETTE or other members of the Gillette committee. The friends of coffee speculators in the State Department are now themselves seriously exposed and of little use to the industry.

Electric Energy Adequate in Detroit, Mich., Area

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to insert the statement of the president of the Detroit Edison Co., with headquarters at Detroit, Mich., showing its ability to provide as much power as will be needed in this highly industrial area during the war period and at the same time to care for civilian needs.

"There is plenty of electric power available here in Michigan's industrial heart to carry out the area's full share of the Nation's new defense production program," Detroit Edison president, James W. Parker, said today.

There is available as much power as can be used when industrial plants take up their allotted share of the defense production loads, he said. In most instances, manpower will be the limiting factor. With every employable person in the area on the job, there will be enough electric horsepower to go around.

Parker declared there would be—just as during the last war—enough power to take care of the defense program without curbing either residential or farm use of electricity. He said the electric industry as a whole will have power to meet the country's needs provided no governmental restrictions are imposed which would retard the contruction program now under way.

"Even though new peaks of demand have been reached during 1950," the Edison president said, "our capacity is advancing well ahead of use."

Present capacity of the Edison Co. is about 1,500,000 kilowatts—roughly 2,000,000 horsepower. This includes the 200,000 kilowatts added recently at Trenton Channel. Two new turbo-generators which will go into service at Conners Creek within a year will bring capacity to 1,750,000 kilowatts.

Also important are the interconnections with others. Between Consumers Power and the Edison Co. the interconnections have been tripled to strengthen Michigan's overall electric supply system.

Parker also announced that construction will soon start on a project to add another 250,000 kilowatts. Originally scheduled in part at an existing plant, this addition may, in view of recent events, require the building of a new plant.

The company's revised expansion plan will enable it to keep longer in service three older generators which were slated for retirement before the outbreak of trouble in Korea, Parker explained.

"I hope present stepped-up expansion of the Nation's electric power will not be interrupted," Parker said. "It is vital that the Government should cooperate in private power company expansion plans."

The present Edison expansion target is 1,850,000 kilowatts by 1953 or before. This represents an increase of more than 750,000 kilowatts since 1945.

Parker said this goal has been set with an eye to maintaining year-round, around-the-clock industrial production—either for armament or for whatever the Nation calls upon the Detroit area to build.

Commenting on Nation-wide power adequacy, Parker said reports of the entire electric industry show that power supply in most parts of the country is geared to keep well ahead of both industrial and civilian needs. This takes the defense production program, as now known to the industry, fully into account.

Electric generating capability today is nearly double that of 1941, totaling 66,000,000 kilowatts. Since World War II 16,500,000 kilowatts have been added. Another 18,000,000 kilowatts at least will be available by the end of 1953, according to present estimates.

At present, 80 percent of the Nation's electric power is being generated by investor-owned companies, whose systems have been built entirely with private capital.

Parker reiterated his hope that Government limitations would not halt scheduled expansions. Most electric companies' expansion programs have been speeded up since the United Nations undertook the task of driving the Communists out of South Korea.

Confidence was again expressed by Parker that the interconnected power systems of the United States are well prepared to cope with added defense loads. "The light and power industry has made tremendous strides since the end of World War II," he said. "The national power situation is good—and don't let anyone tell you otherwise."

"We in the Security of Our Homeland Should Never Lose Sight of the Reason This War Is Being Fought—Those Heroic Men in Korea Tonight Are Fighting for the Same Principles as Our Forefathers Did at the Birth of the Republic; To Free Men From Tyranny"—John Steelman

---

OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, 2 weeks ago in addressing this House I told of a telecast program which I regarded as one of the most progressive and important news events that had taken place in years. That program which now bids fair to become one of the most interesting of all NBC telecasts is entitled, "Battle Reports From Washington," was projected by the Honorable John Steelman, assistant to President Truman.

Mr. Steelman's purpose in conducting this series of Sunday evening talks was to give millions of Americans an opportunity both to see and to hear top-flight Federal officials here in Washington addressing themselves to subjects on which they could talk with authority that were of vital and current interest.

As I stated 2 weeks ago the program is planned to follow somewhat after the type of White House meetings conducted for some time past and which were attended exclusively by leaders of labor and industry. Battle Reports From Washington will on the other hand comprehend all subjects of general current and domestic interest to the American people.

Last week we heard heads of the Government intimately and factually discuss the problems of the conflict in Korea—and this week we hear from members of the State Department talking on the same subject. The speakers are Warren G. Austin, American representative to the United Nations Assembly, and others best able to factually discuss the diplomatic aspects of the Asiatic problem in general and the Korean situation in particular.

My colleagues on both sides of the aisle in both Houses of Congress know John Steelman as a wise, sagacious, prudent, hard-headed realist * * * a man whose feet are planted firmly on the ground.

With the multitude of assignments given him by President Truman it is commendable that he has undertaken this difficult task of officially reporting news of vital import virtually from the White House to the peoples themselves.

The entire program is being telecasted through the voice of Robert J. McCormick, a news commentator and reporter well and favorably known to all in this Chamber under the direction of Mr. Ted Ayers, ace production manager of the National Broadcasting Co.

American citizens everywhere have reason to be grateful to Dr. Steelman and to the National Broadcasting Co. for this program. The information that it conveys—emanating from such an important source commends its close perusal and study by all Members of both Houses of the Nation's Congress.

Mr. Speaker, for those reasons I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include therein Sunday night's production of Battle Reports From Washington.

Mr. McCORMICK. On this, the ninth Sunday of the war, the bombs that burst in Korea are being echoed by mounting action in Washington. That you may be informed of what our leaders are doing to meet the threat to world peace, NBC presents its second weekly teledocumentary report from the Nation's Capital.

Washington is the executive end of a battlefront a continent and an ocean away where perhaps a boy from your block is staking his life.

Contributing their own specialized kind of action to back up the battle of men and guns, that of "waging the peace", is our State Department, some of whose top officials are here to report to you today. But first let me present to this great American audience the Assistant to the President of the United States, Dr. John Steelman.

Dr. STEELMAN. Good evening, ladies and gentlemen. This is the second telecast in a series which we hope will make you feel closer to your Government in Washington. Tonight, like every other night since June 25, 1950, all eyes are on the military struggle in Korea. Brave men, our own sons and brothers, are fighting and dying in the heat and dust of a foreign land, thousands of miles from their homes. We are with them in spirit, rejoicing with them in victory, and always praying for their safety.

And we, in the security of our homeland, should never lose sight of the reason this war is being fought. Those heroic men in Korea tonight are fighting our battles—they are fighting for the same principles as our forefathers did at the birth of the Republic, to free men from tyranny.

These men are not alone in the battle to keep men free. Tonight I want to present another department in Government which is waging eternal war against the forces of tyranny—that is the Department of State. The role they play, and the importance of it, is not generally recognized.

In order that you may better understand how the battle of diplomacy is being waged, tonight I want you to visit with me the Under Secretary of State, two Assistant Secretaries of State, and Ambassador Warren Austin, United States Representative on the Security Council of the United Nations. These men are in the front lines of the diplomatic battle which is being waged all over the world.

Their role is not always a dramatic one, but it goes on 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, every week in the year. The lives of the men you will see tonight, and the staff of our great Department of State, in Washington and wherever they serve throughout the world, are dedicated to peace. They are working to prevent death and destruction from armed conflict. They are working to build a world at peace, a world without fear, in which all men everywhere can find happiness.

Mr. McCORMICK. Here are some of the latest scenes from the past week on the war front, America, taken for you by NBC's own cameraman in Korea, the Jones brothers. This was the Communist beachhead on the Naktong, where 60,000 Reds were gathered for an all-out strike. American superfortresses hurled against them the greatest blow upon ground troops since the Normandy invasion, turning a 26-quare-mile rectangle of Korea, as one GI put it, "Into a cemetery." All this happened in the recently acquired domain of Dean Rusk, Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs. While we may watch Korea, he must keep a weather eye on the entire Far East; alerted to Korea's impact on its neighboring countries, where who knows what new danger may arise.

For a report on this critical area, already ablaze, we turn to Dean Rusk.

Mr. DEAN RUSK. The American people have been following the superb performance of American and allied troops in Korea with great pride and are determined to back them in every possible way. I know, however, that questions arise in many of our minds which deserve an answer.

Why are we using force to meet the aggression in Korea? Not because of any narrow strategic interest of the United States nor because the diplomats got tired of talking about Korea at the conference table.

The issue in Korea is cold, cynical, flagrant aggression. No amount of propaganda, no repetition of the big lie, can change the facts. The jury of the world has brought in a verdict of guilty and the organized world is acting against the aggressor. To leave this attack unopposed would mean acts of aggression in other places and would almost certainly mean general war. To prevent a general war it was essential that those who are flirting with the idea of aggression be told immediately that they would encounter the organized resistance of the entire world. The issue in Korea is world peace. The sacrifices being made in Korea by United Nations forces are to prevent much greater sacrifices which will have to be made if an aggressor is left with the idea that he can get away with his criminal act.

I know you are asking why the ground forces of other UN members are not already fighting in Korea. There are several reasons. The attack had to be met quickly or it could not be met at all. South Korean and American forces were the only ones immediately available. A number of our friends have their slender military forces heavily committed in the struggle against communism in such places as Indochina and Malaya. Time and space factors mean that some delay is inevitable in bringing forces from great distances. We are encouraged by action now being taken by a number of other governments to send troops quickly. These will be welcomed and will contribute greatly to victory. We should recall that allied air and naval forces joined us immediately in Korea and are giving an excellent account of themselves.

Perhaps you want to know what our peace plan is. Actually, it is very simple. We want a man named Joseph Stalin to pick up a telephone and tell the North Koreans to stop this aggression. Maybe it won't happen that way. Beyond that, our peace plan is the plan of the United Nations. The UN has demanded that the North Koreans cease hostilities; that they withdraw behind the thirty-eighth parallel, that UN members assist the Republic of Korea to repel the invasion and to restore peace and security in that area. The Security Council must decide upon the measures which must be taken to restore peace in the area—and I know that its members are working on this problem. We are in Korea to stop an aggression. We shall not leave Korea until the aggression is stopped and the peace is secured.

I know the American people are deeply distressed by the damage which is being done to Korea in the course of the fighting. When the fighting is over, the United Nations will face a heavy job of reconstruction. The Korean people will need the sympathetic interert and assistance of the rest of the world. Considerable work is now going on so that we can be ready for that part of the job We know that the aggression must be repulsed not only on the battlefield but in the minds and lives of the men and women of Korea who have aspired for so long to a free and unified nation.

Mr. McCORMICK. At the front in Korea, still the prime hot spot of the Far East, Dean Rusk reports on, outnumbered American soldiers continue to fall back before the enemy in a delaying action awaiting the help they know must soon come. This film, showing some of the general retreat movement, men being transported to the rear, others evading enemy snipers, was taken just within the past week by NBC's own cameramen, and rushed here for Battle Report, Washington. But while we may be forced to retreat in Korea, on another war front, the war of truth against dishonesty, fact against falsehood, we are on the attack throughout the whole world.

To tell you about it, here is Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs, Edward W. Barrett, the voice behind the Voice of America.

(At this point a Soviet film was telecasted to the audience, after which Mr. Barrett spoke as follows:)

Mr. BARRETT. The Kremlin is today spending hundreds of millions to tell the world that America is imperialistic, untrustworthy, and filled with slavery and misery. That was part of a film which the Soviet has been showing to iron-curtain audiences. The words you heard were an exact translation superimposed on the Soviet sound track. The Kremlin says "This is the United States."

Well, that film hasn't worked exactly as intended. The slums looked pretty good to iron-curtain audiences. And now even Henry Wallace has turned against them.

But it is a quick picture of what we are up against. Russia has a great program of lies, distortions, half-truths, myths, labels, and exaggerations. To combat these, the United States Government has a campaign of truth. To illustrate this, we'll show you later excerpts of a United States Government film completed in record time and now being shown around the world in 26 languages.

America's campaign of truth utilizes radio, the Voice of America, press and publications material, films like the one we'll show you, exchange of persons, the enormously effective system for letting key foreigners see this Nation for themselves, and overseas libraries, which have become the arsenals of ideas for those fighting for freedom.

It's a campaign that is paying off. We have stacks of evidence like this to prove it. But it's not big enough. We are spending less than one-tenth what the international Communists are spending.

Take the Voice of America. We use transmitters in this country—and at key points in Europe—and in the far Pacific. They are good transmitters but they aren't enough.

We plan, with Congress' consent, to build a network of vast new supertransmitters that will blast through anywhere. Meanwhile, we are stepping up the campaign of truth. I can announce that even tonight we are starting a new program to Korea and one more to China.

Whatever you hear, we haven't lost the propaganda war. We now have 53 nations on our side. The Soviet has nine. With added funds and added skilled manpower, we can and will win through with America's campaign of truth.

Mr. McCORMICK. As the Voice of America continues to broadcast the truth as to who is the aggressor in Korea, the see-saw battle for the port of Pohang, above Pusan, continued throughout the past week. Pohang's vital airstrip, 8 miles to the southeast, was threatened when South Korean troops suddenly came down from the mountains, entered the city, and sent a spearhead against the field. American troops were left behind to defend it, for its loss would help deprive United Nations' forces of a necessary supply port and our most valuable Korean airbase. But the struggle for freedom is not in Korea alone. Throughout the world, behind the iron curtain and before it, other Americans are working in other ways to secure world peace and order. That you may know something of who these men are, and what are their tasks, we now point our cameras at Under Secretary of State Jim Webb.

Mr. WEBB. Ladies and gentlemen, you have heard Dean Rusk and Ed Barrett talk about some particular problems we are facing in these dangerous times. I'd like to be more general and tell you briefly something about the work of the Department of State.

Just as the Defense Department provides the military counsel needed for the development of foreign policy, so the State Department provides the political counsel needed for the development of military strategy. While our brave fighting men are engaging the enemy at this moment in Korea, in other parts of the world we are using economic, political, and diplomatic means in a less dramatic but equally vital struggle to save the free world from total war.

The beachheads of our diplomacy are the 285 posts we maintain throughout the world. Each post is the United States of America, speaking for you and me and all of us, in the country in which it is located. Each post, working closely with headquarters here in Washington, toils round the clock to make sure the aims and desires of the American people are faithfully represented in these grave days.

Let me introduce you to the sort of men we have in our key posts overseas.

In Indochina, under heavy Communist pressure, our Minister is Donald Heath, from Topeka, Kans. He learned the hard way how to deal with Communist aggression, when he represented us in Bulgaria.

In India we have one of our most distinguished officers, Ambassador Loy Henderson, who comes from the little town of Rogers, Ark.

In Iran we have Henry Grady, a brilliant California businessman who did an outstanding job for his country in putting the Greek aid program over the top.

No better example of the kind of men who serve you abroad could be found than in John J. Muccio, our Ambassador to Korea. He was born in Italy, grew up in Providence, R. I., and has served the United States in the Foreign Service for nearly 30 years. The President has just commended him for his magnificent work in evacuating Americans under Communist fire.

These are the sort of trained men you find on hand in places like Korea when trouble breaks. But that is only part of their work.

You see, there are literally hundreds of subjects on which agreements with other nations have to be maintained, public health, aviation, agriculture, atomic energy, and trade of all sorts. Even though other agencies of the Government are vitally concerned in these matters, by law, the State Department must coordinate all negotiation with other governments. So, in order to do a first-class job for you and the country, the State Department is manned by specialists in matters which must be threshed out with other nations.

As an example, 10 days from today foreign relations experts from Great Britain and France will convene here in Washington with our experts to lay the groundwork for another meeting of the Foreign Ministers of those three countries. When Mr. Bevin, Mr. Schuman, and Mr. Acheson meet in New York on September 12, the major international problems facing us will have to be thoroughly canvassed. They can be acted on without delay. The decisions of these three men will have great significance because they represent the combined power of nearly 250,000,000 people. Immediately following, on September 15, the Foreign Ministers of all 12 North Atlantic Treaty nations, representing nearly 350,000,000 people, will meet to make important decisions. And 4 days later will come the meeting of the General Assembly of the United Nations.

Cooperation between peoples and nations is the way to a better world and a peaceful world. Your State Department is this country's instrument for spearheading that cooperation.

Mr. McCORMICK. Concrete cooperation between nations is today in evidence in Korea, and reinforcements are arriving or destined to arrive from the four corners of the world. Forces of Great Britain and Australia are now fighting side by side with American troops. These pictures were made of American reinforcements arriving last week to join the Second Infantry and First Marines, of our strategic reserve, already in Korea. Representing the United States at the fountain head of this aid is Warren Austin, chief of the United States delegation to the United Nations. For the past few weeks, Ambassador Austin, along with his fellow delegates, has been subjected by the Soviet representative to a certain type of behavior that an old Russian proverb describes as "the devil shelling peas in your face."

To tell us what goes on here, to answer some of the mail that has come to him as a result, and perhaps to shell a few peas of his own, here is Ambassador Warren Austin. * * *

Mr. AUSTIN. For the past 3 weeks, the American people have had an unprecedented opportunity, thanks to television and radio, to see and hear the way that spokesmen of governments conduct themselves at an international council table. The people's reaction exceeds anything that I have experienced in 25 years of public life. Telegrams and even long-distance telephone calls reach us at Lake Success. Thousands of letters are coming into the United States Mission every day. They come from those ruling circles of the United States of America about which you hear in the discussion by the present President of the Security Council. There are 151,000,000 of these ruling circles in the United States of America; quite a contrast to one ruling circle. I want to thank all of you for these messages, including the critical ones, and I want to thank particularly those who say they are remembering us in their prayers. You give us strength. All of your letters will be answered as rapidly as we can do so.

Tonight I would like to take this opportunity to answer questions which your letters indicate and most often are being asked. Here's a letter from Gertrude Taylor of Washington, D. C. She says: "DEAR SIR: Won't you with other countries expell Jacob Malik from the United Nations? Russia has violated everything the United Nations stands for with its prolonged argument." But let me answer you this way, Gertrude, and so answer many thousands of others who have written to me. Our objective is peace. We do not find peace by throwing out the person with whom we must make the peace. We must be firm in our principles, we must be strong in our statement of them, but also, we must be patient. In the United Nations, we must keep trying to convince Mr. Malik and his government of the error of their way and of our peaceful intentions. Through the United Nations we can reach the peoples of the Soviet Union and of other countries. It is not the people, it is the ruling circle that we must convince. That creates a force of public opinion backed by moral authority that opposes aggression and even the Soviet dictator then cannot ignore such force. It is a strain, of course, for us to listen to the deceit that the Russian spokesman holds out, but truth will prevail ultimately. Meanwhile, it is better for diplomats to get nervous indigestion than for young men to get shot.

Mr. McCORMICK. Well, now we will see condensed excerpts from the film Mr. Barrett promised to show us. Within only 11 days after the war, the full version of this film was put into 26 languages by the State Department and speedily distributed throughout the world. Purpose: To counterattack with truth the persistent Soviet propaganda unfortunately making headway in some poorly informed countries, that South Korea had started the war on American orders. For our official answer to that—look and listen.

Thus the Nation, America, as top State Department officials have come before you to report, moves to meet the threat to our security. And the headlines, still warm, that tonight reflect the eighth week of action.

Until we turn our cameras upon the Nation again next week for another teledocumentary this, then, against the background of battle front Korea, is Robert McCormick putting a period on your second Battle Report, Washington.

Our Foreign Policy Consistently Inconsistent

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, we have been told almost every day that Russia is our real enemy. If that is the fact it is difficult to understand why our allies in western Europe and the Truman administration continue to do business with Stalin's gang.

Recently I presented tables, Mr. Speaker, to show that American dollars furnished to the ECA countries are being used to furnish war potentials to the Soviet and its satellites. The amount of such business last year was in excess of $1,000,000,000. And our own country is guilty of the same charge for we did more than $200,000,000 of business with our enemies. What kind of inconsistency is this? The people of this country want to know. They have not forgotten how Mr. Roosevelt refused to embargo shipments of oil and scrap iron to Japan and how this war potential was used to kill our boys in the South Pacific. This appeasement of Russia must stop. If it does not those who are responsible should be impeached.

Under leave to extend my remarks I am including three news items:

BRITAIN AIDING RUSS—CHURCHILL

LONDON, August 26.—Winston Churchill charged tonight that the Labor government for the past 2 years has permitted British factories to make tools for the Soviet Union's war machine.

The wartime Prime Minister declared that Russian inspectors were allowed inside workshops where secret production is under way for the British Army. He also said machine tools have been sent to Communist Poland as well as Russia. The tools, Churchill said, were used in the manufacture and repair of tanks.

Churchill put forth those allegations, plus a charge of tardiness in getting British troops to Korea, in a 20-minute national radio broadcast in which he called on the people to kick out the "feeble" Socialist government as inept in time of crisis.

The Conservative Party leader reiterated his belief that only American predominance in atomic weapons is holding back "an aggressive Communist invasion" of Europe and that an attempt still should be made to "have a personal talk on a high level with the leaders of the Soviet Government."

Speaking from his country home in Kent, Churchill opened up with an attack on Prime Minister Clement Attlee for refusing to call Parliament into session at once, but he developed the speech into an over-all assault on the Government's defense policy. He gave the matter of the machine tools as an example.

BRITISH COMPANY TO SHIP MACHINE TOOLS TO RUSSIA

LONDON, August 28.—A British engineering firm, preparing to begin shipping £1,000,000 ($2,800,000) worth of machine tools to Russia Saturday, said today the British Labor government should withdraw the firm's export license for the materials.

The firm will go ahead with the shipment unless Prime Minister Attlee acts, its chairman, Joseph Greenwood, told reporters. He is the head of Craven Bros., a large toolmaking concern.

Winston Churchill, wartime Prime Minister and now leader of the Conservative opposition, charged last Saturday in a radio address that British firms were filling Russian orders, some of which were for tools "of a class required for the manufacture and repair of tanks."

ORDERS ADMITTED

The Ministry of Supply conceded that several British machine-tool makers were filling such contracts for Russia and that Russian inspectors are permitted in the factories.

Arthur Bottomley, the Labor government's Secretary for Overseas Trade, said, however, that "in supplying goods to Russia, Britain has been careful to withhold any commodities which come into the category of strategic priority." He added that Britain has obtained essential supplies from Russia, including grain and timber, "and in return we have had to make payment."

Greenwood announced that his firm was ready to make a shipment and then added: "In view of international conditions I think the export license for these tools should be temporarily withdrawn by the Government. It is up to Mr. Attlee."

NOW IN SCOTLAND

Attlee is now on a vacation tour of Scotland.

Greenwood said the first installment of the tool order for Russia, £20,000 ($56,000) worth, is packed and ready to go.

"We should complete £1,000,000 order by the end of 1951," he said. "But we could sell these tools quite easily to British buyers. We are quoting them a 3-year delivery date for tools of the type we are sending to Russia next Saturday."

OFFICIALS HERE BLAME BRITAIN IN MOLYBDENUM LEAK TO REDS—LONDON EFFORT TO CREDIT ERROR TO UNITED STATES PROTESTED BY COMMERCE SPOKESMAN

(By Philip Warden)

The Commerce Department yesterday took sharp issue with British Board of Trade officials who implied that the United States was responsible for an American shipment of molybdenum to Britain being transshipped from Britain to Russia.

A Department spokesman said the Department would have no official comment to make on the case until an investigation can be completed. He made it clear, however, that all the facts uncovered so far show that the United States was not at fault. Press statements from Britain Friday quoted British officials in such a way as to imply America alone was responsible.

CONCEDE NO LAW BROKEN

The spokesman agreed with the British officials that the indications are that "no law was broken" in the deal that gave a big shipment of this scarce and vital war material, intended for British steel mills, to the Reds. Molybdenum is a steel-hardening agent essential to the production of virtually all munitions.

"These facts are known," the Commerce official said. "An American firm was issued a license to ship a cargo of molybdenum to a firm in England. Naturally we would not license a shipment of this material to Russia. But Britain is a friendly power, and this shipment was approved.

"Our license applications require the exporter to state who will be the recipient of the shipment, and its final destination. In this case, it was a British firm and the final destination was listed as England.

FIFTY TONS SLIP TO RUSSIA

"The molybdenum was shipped from here in May. It was transshipped from Britain in June or July. Investigation shows that approximately 50 tons of molybdenum, having a total value of approximately $45,000, went to Russia."

The Commerce official said that "once the shipment of a war material gets to Britain, it is Britain's responsibility and subject to their export controls, if any." The molybdenum was stored in British warehouses before being loaded on a Russian freighter.

Trade sources reported that Britain did not have any export controls on molybdenum at the time the shipment was made, although she does now. The Commerce Department officials observed that if this were true, then British Board of Trade officials are correct in their contention that no laws were broken. He refused comment on whether Britain lacked such export controls over molybdenum.

Matthews' Speech

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. STERLING COLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting an article by

David Lawrence which appeared in the Washington Evening Star on August 28, 1950, entitled "Matthews' Speech Is Realistic if Not in Line With Policy," as follows:

MATTHEWS' SPEECH IS REALISTIC IF NOT IN LINE WITH POLICY—ISSUE IS TOO REAL TO BE SOFT-PEDALED OR IGNORED LONGER

(By David Lawrence)

What Secretary of the Navy Matthews said in his Boston speech about anticipating aggression by counterattack cannot be poohpoohed as just irrelevant or indiscreet. For even though he spoke out of turn and has been reprimanded for it in the statement of disavowal issued by the State Department the issue he raised is fundamental and inescapable.

The issue is simply this: Would the American people be willing to see New York or Detroit or any other American cities suddenly destroyed without warning by atom bombs by an aggressor state and then only begin to retaliate by dropping our own atom bombs over the aggressor country?

Must the age-old forms of waiting for a declaration of war by an enemy still be accepted and thus let the aggressor state always possess the horrifying advantage of being able to tell exactly when and where the first blow will be struck?

REALISTIC PHASE OF ISSUE

This is not a new controversy in history and the apprehension of it has stirred probably has led to the outbreak of war in cases that might have yielded to peaceful negotiation, but it is a realistic phase of international relations which in an atomic era at least cannot be brushed aside as inapplicable to democracies.

The principal criticism that will be made of Mr. Matthews' speech is that he gave the Soviet propaganda bureau ammunition to call us warmongers. For he said that the time may come when the United States may have to "institute a war to compel cooperation" for peace, adding that while this might be new for a democracy, we might have to play a new role—"aggressors for peace."

Although the speech was not cleared through the State Department or White House and should never have been made because it does not jibe with American foreign policy, nevertheless now that the words have been expressed it probably is a good thing to have the Russian press and the Russian people know that the American people are not sitting idly by while a group of evil men in the Kremlin are considering more aggression in different parts of the world. It may be salutary for the Russians to learn that a democracy is debating counter measures against allowing an aggressor to take the initiative.

THE RIGHT TO INTERVENE

In principle, Mr. Matthews is really saying what the American policy proposals on the international control of atomic energy have advocated, namely, that when international inspection is agreed to there should be a right to go into any country and put a stop at once to any intended use of atomic energy for purposes of making war. In the absence of such international control, what shall be the role of a democracy?

This correspondent has differed in the past with Mr. Matthews' handling of the Navy Department and has said that a man of different experience should be heading that Department but it could well happen that Mr. Matthews' greatest service to his country will some day be recorded as having been performed by speaking out plainly as he did in Boston last week.

The issue is too real and means too much to the lives of many Americans to be soft-pedaled or ignored. George Craig, national Commander of the American Legion, last Saturday raised the same question.

GAZING AT CRYSTAL BALL

It all boils down to the fact that the United States while preparing to defend its cities and its allies is failing to come to grips with the basic question of a sudden attack by the Soviet. Instead all the democracies are doing is gazing into a crystal ball, trying to guess what the Communists may do.

The aggression in North Korea was the turning point in a war against the democracies which began 4 years ago. It's a war that has deprived many countries of their independence, has deprived nationals of other countries of their rights and has infiltrated by devilish means inside free nations, interfering with their governmental processes.

What Mr. Matthews might better have said is that Russia now has started a shooting war of aggression in North Korea and the question before the democracies is whether they will let the true aggressor escape or whether they will sit around the United Nations' table treating him as an equal when his hands are covered with the blood of Allied soldiers. Mr. Matthews might well have asked when America and her allies will begin formally to name Russia as the aggressor and take military steps if necessary, to bring about the withdrawal of her armies from Germany and other sovereign countries and from areas which Red troops are not entitled to occupy. But even so, it was and is the duty of the President and the Secretary of State to say such things—if they are to be said at all. Mr. Matthews has involuntarily given everybody, however, a solemn warning.

Universal Military Training Now Too Little and Too Late

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, August 26, 1950

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, it would seem almost unnecessary for me to again talk in favor of universal military training, which is a subject I have discussed favorably and at great length for 16 years. I have tried to emphasize the fact that it should not be either necessary or desirable for us to maintain an enormous permanent standing army, for I believe that our real defense will always be the citizen soldier. This involves the fact that training is more essential than ever before. Over and over again I have heard military experts say that a year is required for full training.

Those who opposed universal military training forget that human lives are at stake as well as military efficiency. They have not learned that our experience proves that untrained troops suffer enormously greater proportions of casualties than those trained. General Eisenhower said:

In terms of the larger issue of victory or defeat, comparison is not possible, because in modern war it is not possible to win without training. But in the more personal matter of the individual's chances for survival, I should say that the trained combat soldier has at least three times the chances of the untrained to live to become a veteran.

Heretofore we have had some borrowed time in which to train soldiers—time borrowed of our Allies. There will be no such borrowed time next time. No one can exactly foresee the precise form of any attack which may be made upon us in the future, near or far, but we may be assured it will not be ill-planned, will be effective, and will be awful. While some citizens will be undertaking to laugh off the possibility of an attack by Russia, the atomic bombs they have in large numbers and the guided missiles they are manufacturing more rapidly than we, will be let loose upon us some night and without warning and without a declaration of war. New York, Washington, Pittsburgh, St. Louis, Chicago, and San Francisco will be destroyed. Hampton Roads will be nothing but a memory. Transportation will be paralyzed and even while the continental United States will still be in existence and probably a great many millions will be left alive, the price we will pay for our unpreparedness will cost us our place in the sun.

When Mr. X lands to reap the advantage of his atomic coup we will need organized ground forces on the beaches to confine his parachutists when they descend from the air. We will require very wide dispersal of troops and material. We will need trained men in large numbers.

It was not so long ago that Bernard Baruch, testifying before the Senate Military Affairs Committee in favor of scientific research, said:

However, scientific research by itself is only a piece of what is needed. I stress that because the atomic bomb, radar, and other war inventions have been so spectacular the public seems to have gotten the idea that nothing but scientific advance is needed for national safety. If the American people fall victim to any such notion, they will be inviting a terrible calamity.

Vital as it is, scientific research is not a substitute for universal training for war. It is not a substitute for a modernized industrial mobilization which will convert our Nation in quickest order to the conditions of any possible future war.

When Germany and Japan plunged the world into war, they gambled on American unpreparedness. They thought they could defeat our brave allies before American might could be mobilized.

Preparedness does not mean an armed camp nor a defense program that would beggar us and be dropped after a few years. Ours must be a permanent preparedness. It must be set at a level that will be continued year after year. At no future time must political aggressors be tempted to gamble on a blitzkrieg that would seek to overwhelm us with new or old weapons before the mobilization of our manpower, industry, agriculture, and science could be made complete and effective.

Quite probably, I shall not have occasion again to say to the Congress and to the people with respect to universal military training that we may wake up one morning as Belgium and Holland and Denmark and Norway did to find the enemy at our gates, to find atomic bombs have destroyed American cities. The war will be on with no declaration of war and we will have no such period of grace as we have had heretofore. There will be no time then to set up a Selective Service System, build camps, find officers, induct trainees, and get them ready for whatever operations may be necessary, and there will be no other nations to bear the brunt of the attack or to shield us while we are getting ready. We will be the first target, but not the last.

Let me quote General Eisenhower again who said to my committee:

We must have a trained force large enough to make our resources and weapons instantly available for our needs.

Such training must be given in time of peace.

Small Business Defense Plants Act of 1950—Radio Commentator for Cooperative League of the United States Urges Immediate Action on Sparkman-Patman Bill—States Small Business Usually Bypassed in Defense Plans—Small Business Legislation Needed To Protect Freedom and Competition and To Step Up Production

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 28, 1950

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Wallace J. Campbell, director of the Washington office of the Cooperative League of the United States of America, in a Nation-wide broadcast on Monday, August 7, 1950, devoted a great deal of his comment to the companion bills S. 3978 and H. R. 9243 to create a Small Defense Plants Corporation. As you know, the Senate bill was introduced on July 26 by the distinguished chairman of the Senate Small Business Committee, Senator JOHN J. SPARKMAN, of Alabama, while I introduced an identical bill in the House.

Mr. Campbell spoke of the national organizations representing 16,000,000 Americans who, together with their families, account for 60,000,000 of our 150,000,000 population, which are backing the Sparkman-Patman bill. Surely, this support would be impressive in any cause. In support of small business, it is doubly impressive, not only because of the numerical support represented by these fine organizations but because the group is a complete cross section of America representing, as it does, small business, labor, farmers, and consumers. The organizations referred to by Mr. Campbell are a part of the small business antimonopoly conference which has made many splendid contributions to the cause of small business during the past year. Mr. Campbell's remarks follow:

Good evening. It is getting harder and harder to follow the congressional merry-go-round as defense and mobilization measures are debated in the Congress. Unfortunately it is almost impossible to separate the political motives which affect the Congress in this election year and the sincere differences of opinion which grow out of any normal legislative battle.

A distinguished Congressman told us this noon that a great deal of the scrapping in the Congress has been very insincere. I am afraid that's a true appraisal.

As of the present moment it would be extremely difficult to predict what forms the legislation on allocations, priorities, price and wage controls, taxation, and other matters will take. It is possible, however, to give you an illustration or two of what is involved in these decisions on Capitol Hill.

Last week we warned that monopoly was rearing its ugly head in a provision in the Defense Production Act which would have wiped out the antitrust laws. This week, it is fairly safe to predict that this provision, section 508, will be amended to provide fairly adequate safeguards against the roughshod destruction of the antitrust laws. Senator SPARKMAN and Congressman CELLER have introduced amendments which should clarify that section.

SMALL-BUSINESS DEFENSE PLANTS ACT OF 1950

In World War II the concentration of economic controls in the hands of a few corporations was speeded by the failure of the Congress to provide protection early enough for small, competitive industries. Already a group of congressional leaders is moving toward the creation of a Small Defense Plants Corporation which could facilitate the use of smaller business organizations, firms, partnerships, and cooperatives which could increase national production and decentralize industry.

Representatives of 15 national organizations in the field of small business, farm, labor, and cooperative enterprise met with Senator SPARKMAN and Congressman PATMAN this week to map strategy for the creation of such a corporation.

Represented in the coalition are about 16,000,000 Americans. These people, together with their families, make up more than 60,000,000 of America's 150,000,000 people.

The purpose of this small-business legislation is twofold: First, to protect freedom and competition within industry, and second, to step up national production by making use of the manpower, initiative, and facilities of the majority of American businesses which are usually bypassed in defense production when speed seems to call for the use of only the biggest of big business.

Within the next few weeks contracts will be placed for nearly $15,000,000,000 worth of goods and services. This is nearly half as much money as the American economy handled in the depression year of 1932.

Seventy-five percent of these war contracts, if they follow the pattern of the last war, will be let by negotiation, and only 25 percent by competitive bid.

If there is no adequate machinery for directing this tremendous flow of business into the smaller enterprises we will wind up with 75 or 100 businesses doing 90 percent of all war and defense production.

It is easy to understand why small business as such is interested in a proposed small-business defense corporation. The interest of labor, agriculture, and cooperatives is less obvious.

REASONS WHY LABOR, FARMERS, AND CONSUMERS SUPPORT H. R. 9243

The representative of the International Association of Machinists, America's largest independent trade union, put a finger on part of the answer when he said the lion's share of his union's contracts are with small businesses. They are so small that they cannot afford to send a man to Washington to look for Government contracts. They are likely to be "gobbled up" if the process of merger is intensified. The long-run life of his union is, therefore, identified with the continuation of small and competitive business.

There are bigger issues at stake, however. Doctor Adams of Michigan State University put it to the group this way. "The values we are fighting for are democratic values. Unless the battle is joined and the battle is won now, you may not have an opportunity to fight again." Doctor Adams pointed out that the giants in the steel industry are buying up the small fabricating plants, creating a greater monopoly situation in steel. He then quoted Judge Learned Hand as saying, "The Sherman Act was not passed to condone good trusts or to condemn bad trusts, but to outlaw all trusts."

A representative of the Independent Tire Dealers told the congressional leaders a story which illustrates the situation that faces us. During the last war when the need for rubber became critical, a group of tire dealers went to the Army's procurement division and offered their facilities in recapping and retreading tires. The Army official said that while he was interested in small business, it would be impossible for the Army to deal with a large number of independent enterprises, and that they would automatically have to ask the major tire companies to handle retreading and recapping.

The small tire dealer representative then pointed out that 85 percent of the facilities for recapping and retreading were in the hands of small dealers, that the tire industry had discouraged retreading tires because that cut into their market, and that the big rubber companies would find it impossible to do the job.

The Army, faced with these facts, changed its mind and more than 95 percent of the retreading and recapping was done by small, independent businessmen.

Our cooperatives had a similar situation during the last war. The big oil companies frowned on reprocessing lubricating oil. They apparently were afraid that American consumers would find out that reprocessed oil is almost as good, and in some cases better than, the original lubricating oil. The co-op refinery at Coffeyville, Kans., offered to undertake the job, and before the war was over, reprocessed millions of gallons of lube oil for training planes.

If the present crisis turns into a full-blown war, and the enemy resorts to the use of atom bombs, it might be possible to wipe out a large section of concentrated industry. If that happened, our defense production would have to be handled by decentralized plants. It might be wise national policy to build up those enterprises now.

Doctor Mund of the University of Wisconsin, analyzing the Small Defense Plants Corporation bill for the group, pointed to the great need for channeling a substantial part of defense business through small business enterprises so that there will be small business left when the war is over. If this is not done, we may wind up the present international crisis with nothing but monopolistic big business on our hands.

If I may quote Dr. Mund again, he cited the Romans as saying, "In time of war the laws are silent. Monopoly trends grow with impunity."

THE ISSUES CONFRONTING THE CONGRESS

On Capitol Hill there seems to be terrific demand for both wage and price controls. These, if they are to be enacted, ought to be tied in with an excess-profits tax which would wipe out entirely any profits made out of the war above the prewar profit level. That is the only kind of an excess-profits tax which will be equal to a freeze of either prices or wages. There seems to be no sentiment, however, to go quite that far. In fact, there has been a great deal of coolness in responsible circles to the excess-profits tax proposal.

If profits were cut off at their present level there would be no reason for complaint on the part of business and industry. The Associated Press reported last week that 450 corporations in virtually every field of business showed profits averaging 43 percent higher in the second quarter of 1950 than in the same period of last year.

Measured in dollars, the profit of these corporations for the first 6 months of 1950 was $2,860,000,000. All this money was earned before the Korean war started.

Senator O'MAHONEY has been pushing hard for an excess-profits tax. He told the committee last week that corporations' profits are running at an all-time high and are rapidly increasing.

"Passage of the military spending bills will open the floodgates of inflation unless we take immediate steps to control the deluge of dollars by new taxes which will prevent private purchasing power from competing with newly created Government purchasing power."

Concluding his testimony, the Wyoming Senator said, "Obviously, corporate profits throughout World War II could have made a much larger contribution to the current cost of the war than they were called upon to do."

As you can see, the issues which are being settled on Capitol Hill this week involve more than whether or not there shall be adequate controls and adequate taxation. The decisions as to how the job of defense is carried forward may well determine what sort of an economy we have when this period of crisis is over.

Subversive Control Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. BLATNIK

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak against this so-called subversive control bill (H. R. 9490) now under consideration. I will not attempt to discuss each and every unsound provision in this measure, because the bill itself is unsound starting with its enacting clause and ending with the last period.

H. R. 9490, like its predecessor, the Mundt-Nixon bill, is a vicious and repressive measure. Under the pretext of fighting communism, this bill would give to a Government bureau the power of life and death over all organizations. It provides that any organization shall be judged, not on the basis of the acts of its membership, but on their alleged beliefs in accordance with the whims of a Government board.

This bill suffers from every constitutional defect in the book. It is vague and indefinite. It would violate the principles of free speech, free press, free thought, and free association. It undermines the legal doctrine of due process, and it substitutes guilt by association for the historic American doctrine of personal guilt. Offered in an atmosphere of hysteria, this gruesome and un-American measure is an effort to destroy democracy in the name of anticommunism.

The purpose of the authors of this bill is clearly to close all legal avenues of expression by which the American people can effect political and social reform in this country. For it can be used, and if passed it will in due time be used, to harass and destroy labor unions and all types of liberal and progressive organizations. Hitler engineered his Reichstag fire and then used it to destroy the remaining vestiges of democracy in Germany. This bill is a legislative version of the Reichstag fire.

I am going to vote against this dangerous piece of legislation, and I am able to say here that every liberal organization in the country is hoping that a majority of the House will do likewise. The Congress of Industrial Organizations and the American Federation of Labor are against this bill. The AVC, the ADA, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the National Farmers Union, and many other great national organizations are opposed to its passage. The United States Department of Justice has voiced its opposition.

Here I will quote from statements made by a few of the many prominent Americans who have testified against this bill or similar legislation:

Mr. Clarence Mitchell, of the NAACP, had this to say:

This bill purports to protect the United States against certain un-American and subversive activities. It is impossible to see how proposals of this kind can do anything other than undermine the basic freedoms of our country.

The powers vested in the three-man loyalty board, which this bill would establish, are so sweeping that almost any organization might be affected, ranging from a college fraternity which holds secret meetings to a labor union which refuses to divulge a list of its members.

The net effect of such a law would be to replace the supposed menace of communism with a concentration camp atmosphere in which all persons who seek to promote social progress would be suspected of activities against the best interests of the United States. Many of them would be unjustly harassed under this law.

This bill would be likened to an effort to jail persons who are the victims of cancer instead of seeking the cause and cure of cancer.

Mrs. Alexander Stewart, of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, stated in part:

We oppose this bill because it is an attempt at direct thought control. It has the effect of undermining the right of free speech, free thought, and peaceful action and assembly of people who have committed no crime against the Government but who, as members of a proscribed organization, are subject to intimidation, persecution, and loss of livelihood.

Mr. James Patton, President of the National Farmers Union, stated:

The National Farmers Union always has regarded this legislation as unconstitutional and that it authorizes invasions of individual liberties which are repugnant to the basic character of our national existence. Denial of the fundamental guaranties of individual liberties contained in the Bill of Rights and elsewhere in the Constitution cannot but weaken that magnificent document as a whole.

William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, came out against all legislation of this type when he wrote the Committee on Un-American Activities:

After giving careful consideration to the bill and to the analysis made by our legal department, I concluded that there did not seem to be any good reason why such a bill as H. R. 7595 should be passed by the Congress of the United States. We can deal with the Communist question which H. R. 7595 seeks to deal with in a satisfactory way without resorting to the enactment of legislation such as is included in H. R. 7595.

Bishop John Wesley Lord of the Methodist Church, Boston Area, stated:

I am opposed to the Nixon bill because it * * * if passed, would abrogate America's long-cherished freedom. I sincerely believe, as a churchman seeking to perpetuate the spiritual principles upon which this Nation is founded, that legislation of this pattern is more in accord with police-state governments than it is with democratic governments, and ultimately will destroy the rights of a free people.

Here I wish to insert a large section of the statement of Mr. Thomas E. Harris, Assistant General Counsel of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, before the Un-American Activities Committee, in opposition to the Mundt-Nixon and Wood bills, because it sets forth my own views and because it represents the views of a large and important segment of the American labor movement. Mr. Harris stated:

THE NIXON AND WOOD BILLS INFRINGE CIVIL RIGHTS

We would like to call the attention of this committee to the specific provisions of the Nixon and Wood bills which, in our judgment, violate constitutional rights of due process, freedom of speech, press and assembly.

1. THE BILLS REGULATE OPINION, NOT CONDUCT

A very basic objection to both of these bills is that their purpose is to police and regulate not action or conduct, but thought and expression. Under these bills, organizations and individuals are punished, restrained, and regimented solely on the basis of political opinions, rather than on the basis of overt acts of disloyalty.

It has been traditional in this country, and in other democratic countries, to allow the widest possible freedom of thought and expression. Belief and speech hostile to the existing system of government is not only tolerated, but is protected by our Constitution, unless it takes the form of advocating some course of conduct in circumstances such as to make it probable that unlawful action will in fact ensue. In the language used by Mr. Justice Holmes in first enunciating what has since been known as the clear and present danger test, freedom of speech can be restricted only if "the words used are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils the Congress has a right to prevent." Schenck v. United States (249 U. S. 47, 52). More recently, in Bridges v. California (314 U. S. 252), the Supreme Court said (p. 263):

"What finally emerges from the 'clear and present danger' cases is a working principle that the substantive evil must be extremely serious and the degree of imminence extremely high before utterances can be punished."

And still more recently, in Thomas v. Collins (323 U. S. 516, 530):

"Only the gravest abuses, endangering paramount interests, give occasion for permissible limitation."

In the Eightieth Congress, the sponsors of the Mundt-Nixon bill sought to justify its restriction of freedom of thought, speech, and assembly on the ground, among others, that the bill proceeded only against organizations, and did not prevent individuals from maintaining or advocating abstract views concerning the subjects dealt with in the bill. But if freedom of thought and freedom of speech has any meaning, particularly in the political field, it must necessarily include the right to create and work through organizations. For, under the political systems which have developed in the democratic countries, effective political action means group action—action through political parties, labor unions, and other associations.

The right to create, to solicit others to join, and to act through such organizations is, therefore, protected by the Bill of Rights. It is the form which the freedom of assembly of earlier times takes in a more populous country and a more complicated society. Such groups often afford the only effective vehicle for the exercise of free speech. The Supreme Court has specifically held that the right to solicit others to join organizations is protected by the first amendment. It said:

"It was not by accident or coincidence that the rights to freedom in speech and press were coupled in a single guaranty with the rights of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition for redress of grievances. All these, though not identical, are inseparable. They are cognate rights * * * and therefore are united in the first article's assurance." (Thomas v. Collins (323 U. S. 516, 530).)

If, therefore, the restrictions which this bill places upon freedom of thought, speech and assembly can be justified under our Constitution, or reconciled with democratic principles, it cannot be on the basis that organizations rather than individuals are regulated. The only justification would be some overwhelming necessity for the legislation. We submit that no such necessity exists.

2. THE BILLS THREATEN THE EXISTENCE OF ALL PROGRESSIVE ORGANIZATIONS

The Nixon bill deals with two types of organizations: "Communist political organizations" and "Communist-front organizations."

A "Communist political organization" is defined in section 3 (3) as having "some, but not necessarily all, of the ordinary and usual characteristics of a political party," and which (a) is controlled by the foreign government or organization controlling the world Communist movement, and (b) operates primarily to advance the objectives of that movement. However, we are at a loss as to why this definition is included in the bill, since it does not seem to be controlling for any purpose.

For section 13 (a) of the bill creates a Subversive Activities Control Board, which is to determine whether an organization is a "Communist political organization." In making this determination, the Board is not referred to the definition in section 3 (3), but is to take into consideration a long list of factors enumerated in section 14 (c). These include the extent to which the organization's policies are formulated to effectuate the policies of the foreign government or organization controlling the world Communist movement; the extent to which its views and policies do not deviate from those of such foreign movement or organization; the extent to which it sends members to any foreign country for instruction in the principles of the world Communist movement; the extent to which it fails to disclose or resists efforts to obtain lists of its members; and so on and so on. There are eight numbered paragraphs enumerating considerations of this type. One of the paragraphs has numerous subdivisions. The Board is directed to take all of these factors into consideration, but is not told what weight it shall give to any particular factor, or even that it must find the existence of a certain number of these factors before concluding that an organization is a Communist political organization. It is, therefore, apparent that an organization may be labeled as a "Communist political organization" solely on the basis of ideas and opinions, rather than on the basis of illegal acts.

The provision in the bill that resistance to efforts to obtain membership lists is a hallmark of a Communist political organization is particularly objectionable to labor organizations, which have learned through long experience that the submission of such lists is the first step to a blacklist through which an organization may be completely destroyed.

A "Communist-front organization" is defined in section 3 (4) as any organization which is either under the control of a "Communist political organization," or is primarily operated for the purpose of giving support to a "Communist political organization," a Communist foreign government, or the world Communist movement. This definition also seems to be meaningless, since the Subversive Activities Control Board is again, in section 14 (f), furnished with a list of entirely different criteria which it is "to take into consideration" in determining whether any organization is a "Communist-front organization."

These criteria are the identity of the persons active in the management of the organization "whether or not holding office therein"; the sources of its support, financial and otherwise; the uses made by it of its resources and personnel; and the extent to which the position taken by the organization from time to time on matters of policy does not deviate from the position taken by any Communist political organization. Here again, the Commission does not have to find that all or any stated number of these factors exist.

Thus, under this bill, if a few Communists are active in connection with a labor organization, even though they do not hold office, that fact alone could furnish the basis for a finding of the Subversive Activities Commission that the organization is a "Communist-front organization."

The proposed bill could very easily condemn an organization as illegal solely because its policies happen to coincide with those of the Communist Party. Thus, support by a labor organization of objectives also supported by Communists, such as the abolition of the poll tax, enactment of an adequate housing program, and the protection of civil rights, could, under the standards proposed by the bill, furnish the basis for the conclusion that the organization is a "Communist-front."

Under these provisions, not only labor organizations but other progressive organizations could be branded as subversive and destroyed. The CIO is familiar with the indiscriminate use of such terminology by the House Committee on Un-American Activities. Both CIO and CIO-PAC have been repeatedly and wrongfully denounced as "Communist," "Communist-front," and "totalitarian" organizations. In its 1944 report, the House Un-American Activities Committee denounced CIO-PAC as representing "a subversive Communist campaign to subvert the Congress of the United States by its totalitarian program." There is no particular reason to suppose that the Subversive Activities Control Board set up in this bill would be any more responsible or any less reactionary than this congressional committee has been.

The Nixon bill is not just another routine measure. This bill is in fundamental conflict with our constitutional form of government and with the premises of a democratic society.

If the Nixon bill shows an indifference to civil rights, the Wood bill flaunts them even more callously. It would give the Attorney General the power, by fiat, without a hearing, and subject to no review whatever, to destroy any organization. For the Wood bill would make it a crime for any Federal employee, or any individual in private industry employed in connection with the performance of any national defense contract, to be a member of or to support any organization designated as subversive by the Attorney General. That an organization so designated by the Attorney General could not survive under the bill is a point which scarcely needs to be labored.

The Wood bill thus gives the Attorney General absolute power to determine what organizations may exist. We have no hesitation in stating that that proposal is nakedly totalitarian.

We think it is bad enough that the Attorney General now lists organizations as subversive without any sort of hearing or any opportunity to the organization to disprove the charge. We hope that the Supreme Court will supply this deficiency by holding that an organization listed as subversive is entitled to judicial review.

But what the Wood bill would do would be much worse. At the present time, membership in organizations on the Attorney General's list is treated as evidence pointing to possible disloyalty, but as evidence which may be rebutted. As the Department of Justice has correctly pointed out, there is a vast difference between that and making mere membership a crime.

There is, we think, no question whatever but that the Wood bill would be held unconstitutional. The Supreme Court has squarely held that mere membership in the Communist Party may not be punished. DeJonge v. Oregon (299 U. S. 353).

3. THE PENALTY PROVISIONS OF THE NIXON BILL ARE VAGUE, OPPRESSIVE, AND UNCONSTITUTIONAL

The Nixon bill requires "Communist political organizations" and "Communist-front organizations" to register as such, and to file certain information with the Attorney General. The bill requires both types of organizations to file a list of all officers and full financial statements of receipts and expenditures. In addition, "Communist political organizations" are required to submit a full list of members, and any member whose name is not submitted is required to register himself. All of this data is to be available for public inspection.

Both "Communist political organizations" and "Communist-front organizations" are required by the bill to label all mail intended for more than one person as: "Disseminated by ----------, a Communist organization." They are also required to initiate all radio broadcasts which they sponsor with this announcement: "The following program is sponsored by ----------, a Communist organization."

An additional disability which is imposed upon "Communist political organizations" and "Communist-front organizations" is the loss of tax exemptions which they would otherwise enjoy.

Where an organization is ordered to file and register, and fails to do so, a fine from $2,000 to $5,000 may be imposed. Where the failure is due to the decision of a particular executive officer, the prescribed punishment for such an officer is a fine of from $2,000 to $5,000 or imprisonment from 2 to 5 years, or both. Each day of failure to register constitutes a separate offense.

In the Eightieth Congress the sponsors of the Mundt-Nixon bill, which was the predecessor of this bill, argued that it was a mild measure because it did not outlaw organizations labeled as "Communist political organizations" or "Communist-front organizations." Such a claim is completely misleading. There can be no question that the registration requirements amount to destruction. This is so for the obvious reason that organizations which are made to register are subject by legislative flat to the stigma of disloyalty. Any claim that this bill does not destroy or outlaw these organizations reduces itself to the assertion that the bill compels them to commit suicide, rather than destroys them outright.

Of course it is obvious that if these organizations enjoy a right under the Constitution to exist and to carry on their activities through the exercise of civil rights, then that right may not be impaired even by a registration requirement, not to speak of the mail and tax disabilities which are likewise written into the bill. In Thomas v. Collins (323 U. S. 516, 539), the Supreme Court said: "As a matter of principle a requirement of registration in order to make a public speech would seem generally incompatible with the exercise of free speech and free assembly."

The blacklist which would result from registration would in itself be sufficient to destroy an organization. For there can be no question but that persons listed as members of Communist political organizations would thereafter be unable to secure jobs. Indeed, the labeling last year of certain Hollywood writers as Communists led their employers to breach written employment contracts. Such a blacklist would likewise be possible in the case of a Communist-front organization, even though such organizations are not required to submit membership lists, since they are required to disclose the sources of their funds, and that information would serve to identify contributors to the organization.

The bill carries certain additional penalties specifically directed against members of the condemned organizations. Thus, under the bill, it is unlawful for any member of a Communist political organization to hold any nonelective office or employment with the Federal Government or apply for a passport. Any Government official who appoints or employs any such individual, or who issues a passport to such an individual, is likewise guilty of a violation of the law. Penalties for violation of these provisions are a fine of not less than $2,000 or more than $5,000, or imprisonment for not less than 2 or more than 5 years, or both.

Section 4 of the bill appears to apply both to organizations and individuals. This section of the bill makes it illegal for any person, defined elsewhere as either an individual or organization, knowingly to conspire with any other person to perform any act which would substantially facilitate the establishment in this country of a totalitarian dictatorship under foreign domination. A violation of this section is punishable by fines up to $10,000, imprisonment up to 10 years, or both.

One objection to this provision of the bill is that it does not require that the action which would aid the Communist movement be undertaken for that purpose or with that intention, but only that it be done knowingly. "Knowingly" in criminal statutes has sometimes been interpreted as requiring only a conscious act, and under the strictest construction means only that the defendant contemplated, or should have contemplated, the consequences of his acts.

Suppose, for example, that the United Steelworkers of America, in bargaining collectively with the United States Steel Corp., requests a reasonable wage increase, one needed by the workers to maintain a decent standard of living, and the directors of the corporation reject the request. Certainly it could be said that the rejection of such a request would substantially facilitate the establishment of a Communist regime in this country by depriving the workers of a decent standard of living, and creating hostility between labor and capital. The directors of the United States Steel Corp. could thus be indicted and sent to jail under this provision for rejecting the union's demand. On the other hand, the union could just as well be convicted under the bill for putting forward a demand which might tend to create industrial strife and thus aid the Communist Party.

Section 4 of the Nixon bill is not aimed at acts or conduct, which are capable of precise definition. Rather it is the intention of this section to punish as a crime mere advocacy, argument, or persuasion, whether or not calculated in the circumstances to lead to the immediate commission of overt illegal acts. As we have already stressed, the Supreme Court has consistently ruled that mere advocacy of ideas, however odious, cannot, under our Constitution, be restrained or punished.

4. THE NIXON BILL'S PROCEDURES IGNORE COMMON LAW SAFEGUARDS

One would expect that a bill which imposes such drastic penalties upon organizations and individuals would scrupulously adhere to the time-honored procedural protections which are the boasts of the Anglo-American legal and constitutional systems. This would include provision for fair trial on the issues before a judge and jury and the application of the usual rule that a defendant in a criminal case is presumed innocent until proven guilty and must be convicted upon evidence establishing guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. If an organization refuses to accept the brand or stigma which the bill would stamp upon it, certain procedural requirements are laid down to permit the Attorney General, not through a criminal proceeding, but through an administrative proceeding, to impose the bill's brand on them. Under these administrative procedures the Subversive Activities Control Board is authorized to make an administrative finding, after a hearing, that the organization involved is a Communist political organization or a Communist-front organization.

The Commission's hearing, like all administrative hearings, is without jury and wholly lacking in those protections to the defendant which would obtain in a criminal trial. The hearing itself is not before a judge but before a Federal board.

It should also be borne in mind that the Attorney General does not merely prosecute the accused organization, he likewise is charged with the task of investigating the organization. In so doing, he is authorized by the law to subpena the books and records of the organization and to compel testimony. Such a provision would, of course, permit the Attorney General a virtually unlimited power of search over the internal affairs and membership lists of such organizations as labor unions.

The bill provides that the findings of the Subversive Activities Commission that an organization is illegal, within the meaning of the bill, may be appealed to the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia within 60 days. Such a review, of course, would consider only questions of law.

The legislative findings upon which the statutes rests, the trial procedure and the review procedure make mockery of our constitutional guaranties which have been developed for the protection of defendants in criminal cases.

5. SUMMARY

The Nixon bill is a serious threat to our most cherished constitutional safeguards.

It imposes penalties upon association and opinion rather than upon overt actions.

The bill is so loosely drawn that it could impose a black-out upon the civil rights of thousands of individuals who would be driven from progressive organizations out of fear that that the vague provisions might be made applicable to them.

Penalties and disabilities are imposed upon individuals, not as a result of unlawful activities but merely upon the basis of affiliation or association. Moreover, the operation of various provisions would permit the creation of a blacklist, so obnoxious to our traditions.

The bill wipes out the fundamental protections for defendants in criminal cases. It substitutes administrative procedure for due process of law.

The definitions of the bill would make it possible for the Attorney General to proceed against labor organizations, and the vague character of the bill's standards would make possible a tremendous expansion of its scope.

At best, the vagueness of the bill affords no security to the fair use of the opportunity for free political discussion. The bill is strewn with terms which have no precise legal meaning and which will force reasonable men to act at their peril. In Stromberg v. California (283 U. S. 359, 369) the Supreme Court stated:

"The maintenance of the opportunity for free political discussion to the end that government may be responsive to the will of the people and that changes may be obtained by lawful means, an opportunity essential to the security of the Republic is a fundamental principle of our constitutional system. A statute which upon its face, and as authoritatively construed, is so vague and indefinite as to permit the punishment of the fair use of this opportunity is repugnant to the guaranty of liberty contained in the fourteenth amendment."

More recently, in Winters v. New York (333 U. S. 507), the Supreme Court held:

"A failure of a statute limiting freedom of expression to give fair notice of what acts will be punished and such statute's inclusion of prohibitions against expressions, protected by the principles of the first amendment, violates an accused's rights under procedural due process and freedom of speech or press."

There can be no question that the Nixon Bill is so pervasively vague as to impose broad pressures and restraints upon the exercise of rights of political expression. Moreover, as the Supreme Court has repeatedly pointed out, vagueness in a statute involving civil rights lays the basis for discriminatory and unfair application. Such discrimination is easily directed against minority groups, who, more than other groups, need the shield of constitutional protection.

CONCLUSION

That this country should be considering legislation so repressive of political and civil rights at a time when it is in no real danger from the Communist movement in America, is surely little to our credit. Our fears, and the lengths to which it is suggested we should go to soothe them, present an unflattering contrast to the recent conduct of France and Italy. In those nations, which have no such tradition of continuous democratic government as we have, the local Communist Parties possess real strength, or did a short time ago. The Russian armies were and are close indeed to the borders of those nations. Yet neither France nor Italy resorted to any such extreme measure as outlawing the Communist Party or passing repressive legislation. Today the democratic forces in those countries, with the aid of ECA, have gained greatly in strength, while the local Communist movements have lost adherents. If those countries, gravely threatened, could show such devotion to democracy, surely it is not necessary for this nation, of all countries the most secure from any internal threat, to turn away from its democratic tradition.

Face

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I am including a broadcast by Mr. George Sokolsky on August 20 over radio station WJZ, New York. His comments on the China situation are most pertinent and I commend them to all members of the House.

FACE

The Chinese have a word for it—"mien tze." Translated, that means "face." If a man has lost face, he has lost what we call character, position, dignity. He is just nothing and nobody.

This concept of personal dignity, of pride, of "face" is so fundamental in the oriental nature that it can never be ignored. Those who have lived in far eastern countries understand this and are very careful about it. No one can make a Chinese or Japanese lose "face" who does not expect repercussions.

Now, I am not devoting this evening to a discussion of oriental psychology, although that would, I am sure, be interesting. Instead, I want to apply this characteristic of "face" to the effort, including war, that Soviet Russia is making to force the United Nations to accept Soviet China as a member.

Mao Tse-tung, the head of Soviet China, has "lost face" with the Chinese people. Assisted by Soviet Russia, he has been able to conquer China, but he has not been able to get a seat in the United Nations. Without that seat, he and his government have no position in international relations. Mao sits in Peiping, but it is Chiang Kai-shek's representative who speaks in the United Nations.

Soviet Russia must have lots of trouble with Mao Tse-tung over this question. Naturally, I know nothing about that and can only surmise what goes on from my general understanding of the Chinese concept of "face."

Mao undoubtedly put it up to Stalin to get him that seat in the United Nations. Maybe that is why Molotov has been spending so much time in China. Mao Tse-tung has also been egging on the British and the Indians to get him that seat.

The principal British firm in China is Jardine Matheson which has enormous holdings there. Its manager for China is John Keswick whom I know well. He is situated in Shanghai. From information that I receive from old friends in China, the Communists there refuse to permit him to leave the country. Other British and American businessmen are unable to leave. The British are trying to salvage Mao's "face" in the hope that Mao Tse-tung will not confiscate their properties.

Of course, this is nonsense, because it is inherent in the Marxist ideology that all means of production, distribution, and exchange shall be government-owned. Once Mao Tse-tung has been given his seat in the United Nations, he will be so much stronger in China, that he will follow the entire Communist line uncompromisingly.

The Russians understand this situation much more clearly than the British do. They understand Mao Tse-tung's problem more clearly than Dean Acheson does. The Russians are by race and training not Europeans but Orientals. Stalin is even a Georgian, an Asiatic.

Therefore, they must realize that if they cannot get that coveted seat in the United Nations for Mao Tse-tung, he will, sooner or later, feel that they have let him down. He might even go the way of Tito and set up a schismatic Marxist power. The Russians would then either have to get rid of him or lose the value of the Soviet victory in China.

Therefore, they started the Korean war. Therefore, Jacob Malik acts as he does in the United Nations. Therefore, they are sending Vishinsky and Gromyko to Lake Success.

They must save Tao Tse-tung's face and, for that matter, their own.

If that is what they must do, is it to the interest of the United States to help them?

What do we want?

We want peace. But we also want that no one nation should master the human race. We desire that each people, great or small, former friend or former foe, shall be independent with the right to govern itself according to its own traditions and choice.

In fact, that is why we entered World War II. In the Atlantic Charter, Franklin D. Roosevelt and Winston Churchill said that "* * * they respect the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live and they wish to see sovereign rights and self-government restored to those who have been forcibly deprived of them. * * *"

But we see that some 15 countries have been conquered by Soviet Russia in whole or in part. In Asia, Mongolia, China, and most of Korea have been conquered. Pressure is being put on French Indochina, Afghanistan, Kashmir, and Pakistan. Any one of these countries could be conquered out of China, Mongolia, and Siberia whenever Russia chooses. They cannot defend themselves. French Indochina can be defended by France and the United States. The other countries are defenseless.

India realizes the plight of these countries and is frightened. That is why Pandit Nehru, the head of the Indian Government, is trying to act as a middleman between the United States and Soviet Russia, between the United Nations and Mao Tse-tung. Maybe if Mao Tse-tung's face can be saved, he will not invade India. There might even be a bargain about it.

But if this kind of scheming can succeed, then Soviet Russia can win an enormous victory. For it can be established by this one fact that Stalin is the master of the world, that the United Nations must obey him, that the United States amounts to nothing. Stalin will have proved to every Asiatic nation and to many European nations that their soundest course whether they like it or not, will be to obey him.

Such an enhancement of his power will destroy the United Nations and will isolate the United States. Even Great Britain will have to reconsider its position because of its commercial interests in China and India, which, under such circumstances, they could salvage only with Stalin's consent.

It is clearly logical that if Mao Tse-tung's representatives are seated in the United Nations, Stalin has won his biggest victory and the United States has suffered a supreme defeat.

What should we do?

The course seems pretty clear. The entire question of who represents China in the United Nations should be postponed until after the Korean war is over. If the Russians insist upon bringing this question before the United Nations now, then the United States should employ the veto.

If Soviet Russia proposes that Soviet China be seated in the United Nations, the United States should vote, veto.

If Soviet Russia proposes that Soviet Korea be seated in the United Nations, the United States should vote, veto.

If Soviet Russia boycotts the United Nations, let her stay away. She boycotted that body from January 13 until a couple of weeks ago and then had to come back to try to save Mao Tse-tung's face. Stalin cannot save Mao's face by boycotting the United Nations again.

Let Soviet Russia try what she will, if we keep Mao out of the United Nations, we weaken Stalin's position in Asia, strengthen respect for the United States and give hope to those countries that want to be independent.

There is one further point I wish to make.

This is not propaganda for my good friend, Chiang Kai-shek. We have known each other for more than 30 years and his wife is one of my closest friends.

Such matters are personal and can never be considered when the welfare of the United States is at stake. We Americans must learn not to be pro-British or pro-French or pro-Chinese or pro-Russian. Nor should we be anti- any of these or other countries.

We should be pro-American.

What is good for the United States of America should be our only thought. Nothing else matters. No other yardstick can be truly of value to us.

It is to America's interest that Mao Tse-tung should continue to lose face. That is our strongest weapon against Stalin's imperialism.

Therefore, America should veto Soviet China. We should use the veto. Our people should demand of its Government that the veto be used against Soviet China.

The United Nations Charter gives to five nations, the United States, Great Britain, Soviet Russia, France, and China, the right to use the veto in the Security Council.

This was written into the Charter of the United Nations to prevent a majority of the small nations from ganging up on the large ones. It was an American proposal and one upon which we insisted.

Thus far, only Soviet Russia has used the veto and very freely. It is now time for the United States to use the veto to save itself and the free world. This is the only course that is to our advantage.

Thank you. This is George Sokolsky. Good night.

MacArthur Statement on Formosa Completely in Accord With President Truman's Own Statement of June 27, 1950

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 11, 1950

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington News of August 29, 1950:

AN ARTIFICIAL ISSUE

(By Ludwell Denny)

The President's suppression of General MacArthur's Formosan statement is a case of politics and personalities creating an artificial issue where none exists in fact.

In his statement prepared for the Veterans of Foreign Wars the general merely explained the military reasons behind the President's pronouncement of June 27 that "the occupation of Formosa by Communist forces would be a direct threat to the security of the Pacific area and to United States forces performing their lawful and necessary functions in that area."

That is not only the truth, it is also the official policy of the United States. As such, it presumably cannot be repeated too often, as a warning to aggressors and as an assurance to free nations that the United States recognizes the threat.

Why then did the President see fit to ban a MacArthur statement which not only supported, but extravagantly praised, his own decision of June 27?

No specific answer is forthcoming from the White House. But the aides there say it should be clear from a comparison of the MacArthur statement and the President's letter to Warren Austin, United States delegate to the United Nations. That letter—which requotes approvingly Austin's explanation of the American position to the UN—concerns the future status of Formosa.

General MacArthur's statement did not touch directly on that subject. Therefore it could not conflict with the excellent Truman doctrine that the island's future must be determined internationally by the Japanese treaty or by the UN.

By inference, however, General MacArthur's statement supports this policy because it praises the Truman decision of June 27 and reaffirms our nonaggressive purpose.

MacArthur condemns the threadbare argument by those who advocate appeasement and defeatism in the Pacific that if we defend Formosa we alienate continental Asia. But the earlier Truman-Acheson policy of not defending Formosa was reversed by the President himself on June 27—not by General MacArthur.

The general as an an American and United Nations commander would exceed his authority, and be subject to reprimand, if he tried to make political policy. His suppressed statement does not do so.

He does not feed the fears of some of our allies, as alleged, that the United States intends to help Chiang Kai-shek recapture the China mainland. The general says: "It envisions no attack against anyone nor does it provide the bastions essential for offensive operations, but properly maintained would be an invincible defense against aggression."

MacArthur's misfortune is to be treated by the Democratic administration and its Republican critics in a campaign year as a political figure, and to have meanings read into his statements which he has not put there. This democratic political feud in turn influences Allied governments and the UN to look for partisan implications when he speaks.

In the past the general occasionally has shown political inclinations and thus invited criticism. But in this case he has been functioning as a great commander and patriot.

Drive on Religion in Communist China

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, if further evidence is required of the well-known fact that wherever Communists gain control religion and religious institutions are among its first victims, the report on the relentless campaign against Christian missions in China by the Communists is another verification of this fact. In its issue of August 27, 1950, the New York Herald Tribune published a brief article on the matter which is as follows:

REDS STRANGLE MISSIONS—CATHOLICS' INSTITUTIONS IN CHINA FEEL SLOW BUT RELENTLESS DRIVE

(By Barrett McGurn)

ROME.—Slow but relentless progress which Communists have been making in eliminating Catholic missioners in China, Manchuria, and Mongolia is indicated by reports reaching the Vatican's Sacred Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. The congregation's news agency, a group staffed largely by priests, sums up the reports as follows:

1. Fourteen thousand native and foreign priests, sisters, and brothers are still inside China as missionaries, but in many cases have had to take jobs as manual laborers, farmers, shepherds, clerks, merchants, or traveling medical aid personnel.

2. Treatment of missionaries has varied widely from the northern Manchurian open countryside, where missionary work is possible only on a clandestine basis, to southeast China, where activities continue without much difficulty except for limitations on the movement of missionaries and except for "adaptions," which have been necessary in missionary schools because of the changed circumstances."

3. Catholic universities, high schools, and elementary schools still are operating in various parts of China, but it is not far from accurate to say that many are no longer Catholic except in name; school programs now include obligatory instruction in atheism, Marxism, and materialism given by specially appointed teachers, and school administration is entirely in the hands of committees of professors, students, and employees who serve as government instruments, almost always obeying directives from above.

4. Many churches, especially in north and central China, were destroyed on one pretext or another before 1948. Since then various surviving structures have been turned into meeting halls, theaters, offices, or granaries or have been closed.

5. Despite the requisitioning of some church property, religious ceremonies in general still are permitted, especially in the large cities. In some cases the faithful are intimidated, however, by police taking names at ceremonies and in other cases names, ages, and professions of persons planning to attend services are demanded in advance.

6. Industrial schools under missionary auspices such as those in Peking, Wuhu, and Anking are generally functioning well, although those in Shanghai and Suchow for some time have encountered obstacles. Missionary pharmaceutical dispensaries have increased their work a hundredfold, but hospitals, orphanages, and institutions for the care of children are facing steadily mounting difficulties because of high prices and taxes.

"The general tendency is ever more toward a total strangulation of religious life," the congregation's news agency concluded.

Congressman Rodino Praised by Zionist Council

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 14, 1950

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to draw attention to kind words about a deserving colleague; and it gives me double pleasure to be able to place before the House the words of praise for the gentleman from New Jersey, the Honorable PETER W. RODINO, Jr., of the Tenth District, written by my friend, Elihu D. Stone of the American Zionist Council, because of my deep personal interest in Zionism and the Republic of Israel.

That Mr. RODINO is a warm personal friend as well as a colleague adds further to my pleasure. We all know, Mr. Speaker, that in the gentleman's relatively brief service in the House of Representatives he has shown himself worthy of the honor bestowed by his constituents. He has proved himself alert, well-informed, devoted to humanitarian legislation of merit, and dedicated to the noblest aims of representative government, while never stultifying his record or his personality by pedantry—in other words, he is able, energetic, decisive, but never a "stuffed shirt."

I am very happy to include in the RECORD, under leave, as part of my remarks, the letter addressed to the gentleman by Mr. Stone on June 20, to which I have already referred.

AMERICAN ZIONIST COUNCIL,
WASHINGTON BUREAU,
June 20, 1950.

Hon. PETER W. RODINO, Jr.,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN RODINO: The joint declaration by the Governments of the United States, the United Kingdom, and France, relative to the Near East, which was made public by the President on May 25, is a significant document which may lead to the establishment of peaceful relationship between Israel and its Arab neighbors if honestly carried out.

Your kind and effective cooperation in urging our State Department to take action for the purpose of promoting peace and tranquillity in the Near East is deeply appreciated.

The said declaration as I analyze it contains the following points:

1. For the first time in modern history the Big Three—the United States, England, and France—agreed on concerted and coordinated action in that sensitive region of the world—the Near East. It is a wholesome substitute for the pursuit of the hitherto policy of unilateral action resulting very often in conflicting action. It imposes collective responsibility.

2. The calling for a pledge on the Arab countries and Israel to refrain from any and every aggressive or warlike action against one another as a condition precedent to the future delivery of arms should serve to discourage the Arab warmongers.

3. The pledge by the Big Three to place Israel in a condition of equality and parity with the Arab states with reference to delivery of arms, and the establishment of a balance of arms between them, if honestly carried out, should serve as an encouragement toward establishment of permanent peace between the Arab states and Israel.

4. The unequivocal declaration by the Big Three of their "opposition to the development of an arms race between the Arab States and Israel" implies a policy of vigilant watchfulness obligating the big three to stop the shipment of arms whenever the threat of such an arms race manifests itself.

5. The Big Three pledged themselves to take immediate and joint action whenever and wherever a threat to peace in that section of the world may appear. They agreed to take such joint action "within and outside the United Nations." The term "outside" is most decisive. It implies speedy and prompt action by the Big Three to prevent a threat of aggression from being converted into actual aggression.

Like any other similar documents this declaration will not execute itself. It is as strong as the reliability of its authors and no more.

We assume and we must assume that the Big Three—the United States, England, and France—acted and will continue to act in good faith.

However, in the light of past sad experiences and disappointments, we must rely upon the vigilance of the friends of Israel like your good self to see to it that the Department of State carries out honestly the terms of the said Big Three declaration.

As you well know, the past record of the Near East Division of our Department of State is one of unfriendliness to Israel. The "Bevin" line dominated.

Your noble services to the cause of Israel will always be remembered. The Jewish people are a grateful people; they never forget their friends.

You, dear Congressman, have proven yourself to be a true and tested friend.

With kindest regards and best wishes.

Sincerely,

ELIHU D. STONE.

Letter From Carl R. Gray, Jr., Administrator of Veterans' Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, the following letter from Carl R. Gray, Jr., Administrator of the Veterans' Administration, points up once again the appalling stupidity and selfishness of the American Medical Association in preventing legislation deplorably needed to breach the gap in medical facilities.

Those supporting the AMA position of depriving the Veterans' Administration of adequate medical staff may well search their consciences as well as their judgment in joining the multi-million-dollar opposition—the AMA—which has refused to consider the broad interests of our national defense and the welfare of the people. The letter follows:

I am informed that your committee now has under active consideration the so-called medical education bill (H. R. 8886) which is similar in purpose to a bill (S. 1453) which passed the Senate last fall.

While the Veterans' Administration would not be charged with administering this proposal, we are deeply interested in its underlying purpose, which is to create an increased supply of qualified medical, dental, and related personnel.

This Administration is now operating 138 hospitals. In the balance of this calendar year we will open 12 new hospitals. Other hospitals scheduled to be opened at later dates will provide a hospital plant of some 131,000 beds. This is the largest number of hospitals operated as a group in the world.

Securing an adequate medical staff is already developing into a serious problem because of the general shortage of qualified personnel. With the opening of additional hospitals, the problem will become intensified. Only 6,000 doctors are currently being graduated into the medical profession each year. To maintain adequate staff, we require such a large proportion of these that it is at present impossible to secure a sufficient number. The medical team which cares for the needs of veterans hospitalized by the Veterans' Administration now includes 6,500 full-time doctors (including residents), 12,500 nurses and nearly 1,000 dentists. In addition to these, we utilize the services of numbers of consultants and visiting physicians. Outside of the hospitals, we have agreements with 75,000 physicians and 55,000 dentists for veterans' "home-town treatment."

Because of the general shortage of qualified personnel, the problem of staffing our hospitals to provide for the growing load will no doubt become increasingly serious as time goes on. In addition to this we are faced with possible losses of doctors should the present crisis in international affairs assume widespread proportions, as 55 percent of our doctors and 60 percent of our dentists hold reserve commissions and are currently subject to call.

Should H. R. 8886 receive favorable consideration and become law, it is believed that it would furnish material assistance to the Veterans' Administration by making it less difficult to staff its new hospitals and by providing a more assured flow of medical personnel into this service.

Because of these considerations, I am in strong accord with the underlying purposes of this and similar legislation.

Sincerely yours,

CARL R. GRAY, Jr.,
Administrator.

Los Angeles Central Labor Council to Forefront in Opposing Communist Dictatorship and Complimenting President Truman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE DOYLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, under recent date I received from W. J. Barrett, the secretary of the Los Angeles Central Labor Council, a certified copy of resolution dated July 27, 1950, relating to the world situation and including the pledge of the thousands of members of this organized labor group to the United States Government, and to President Truman.

The resolution speaks out clearly and vibrantly. I commend these craftsmen for this forward-looking and timely action. The resolution follows:

Whereas since the end of World War II a serious conflict has existed between Soviet Russia and the democratic nations in the reorganization of national governments throughout the world; and

Whereas Soviet Russia through the pressure of a cold war has continuously attempted to impose communism and satellite dictatorship on small and defenseless nations; and

Whereas the United States, by means of the Marshall plan and with the assistance of the United Nations, has assisted many nations in recovering their economic independence, thereby preserving democracy and the right of the people to form a government of their own selection; and

Whereas the activities of the United States has made it impossible for Soviet Russia to impose Communist dictatorship on millions of people in these nations; and

Whereas Soviet Russia has now inspired the Communist dictatorship of North Korea to openly attack the South Korean democracy; and

Whereas President Truman displayed valiant courage in immediately ordering the assistance of the United States Government by supplying materials and armed forces to combat this unwarranted attack; and

Whereas most of the governments belonging to the United Nations have followed President's Truman's leadership and are now extending assistance for the preservation of democracy in South Korea: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Los Angeles Central Labor Council in regular session Monday, July 17, 1950, does hereby highly commend President Truman and the United States Government for the forthright and determined actions to stop the Communist aggression; and be it further

Resolved, That the council condemn Soviet Russia for inspiring and supplying arms to this conflict which may easily develop into another world war; and be it further

Resolved, That the delegates to this council pledge their full support to President Truman and the United States Government to stop the armed aggression of Communist dictatorship in Korea, or any other nation; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to each affiliated union requesting that they take similar action.

Adopted in regulation session of the Los Angeles Central Labor Council, July 17, 1950.

W. J. BASSETT,
Secretary.

This resolution concurred in and adopted by local lodge, No. 92, of the International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders and Helpers of America, A. F. of L., in regular meeting assembled on July 27, 1950.

E. V. BLACKWELL,
Secretary.

Bring Back the Experts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 11, 1950

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, on July 18, 1950, I called upon the President to bring back into the Government those genuine experts, particularly on communism and on the Far East, who understood the facts of life regarding the threat to our survival and were rewarded for their foresight by being let out of the Government. America needs them now. An editorial from the New Leader of August 26, 1950, points out the same urgent need. Under leave to extend my remarks I include the editorial:

AT LAST

There was heartening news last week for the anxious peoples of the world. A distinguished group of United States Senators—12 Democrats and 16 Republicans, headed by Senator RALPH E. FLANDERS, of Vermont—appealed to President Truman to launch a "psychological and spiritual offensive against the Kremlin." The aim of the offensive: to establish "relations of brotherhood" with the Russian people in order to "soften and erode the foundations of the Politburo."

Translated into blunt language, the senatorial proposal means encouraging the Russians to overthrow the present aggressive totalitarian regime. Translated into action (without which words are useless) it means giving the Russians the American support they require to accomplish that objective and thus spare mankind the ravages of world war III.

The Senate appeal to the President emphasizes that to get across our great message to the Russians "we need a new vigor, a new imagination, a new directness of speech. We need the message to be continuously, indefinitely, reiterated. We need to use new means and old, thought of, and unthought of, traditional, and revolutionary."

Even more heartening is the news that the President is wholly in sympathy with the aims set forth in the senatorial appeal. Senator FLANDERS quotes President Truman as saying: "You would be surprised to know how far we have gone along in this sort of planning."

The next step is to create the proper general staff, responsible to the President, to direct the political offensive against the Kremlin "in relations of brotherhood" with the Russian people. The urgent necessity of creating such a general staff, free of departmental domination, was pointed out recently by such eminent citizens as Dwight D. Eisenhower and Bernard Baruch.

But no program of action, however noble its intentions, can be better than the men responsible for its execution. The success of the bold new course proposed by the Senate group will depend on the intellectual and moral caliber of its directors. In breaking with the defeatist past that began at Yalta and ended in Korea; in finally abandoning the un-American doctrine that we can live in lasting peace and friendship with a savage tyranny, unmindful of the fate of its worst victims; in jettisoning our hollow fears, reminiscent of Munich, that by fighting despots we invite disaster (by "provoking" them to more terrible deeds than they already commit or plan); in burying the residue of appeasement and static "containment" in favor of a return to our deeper tradition as a world champion of freedom for all—we must make quite certain that the men chosen to steer this great course do not themselves belong in yesterday's camp of fear, defeatism, and slow surrender. The designers of our past failures in Europe, in Asia, and in Russia itself, cannot become the architects of our emerging policy of peace and victory through freedom for all.

Leadership must go to men who understood in 1943 and 1944 where the United States would find both its truest friends and its irreconcilable enemy. Fortunately for this Nation, for the Russians, and for all mankind, there is no shortage of such Americans. To lead this fight, they would gladly return to the Government.

Congressional Library Outlines Reapportionment of the United States House of Representatives for Congressman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE DOYLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, the subject of reapportionment of the United States for purposes of fixing congressional districts is certainly timely and is of real moment to all the people of our land.

As to the people of my native State of California, the recent census indicates there will be from six to eight additional Members of this House of Representatives from California in your midst after the 1952 elections. Hence it is that I became very much interested to learn more about the subject of reapportionment.

The following data and comments from our Library of Congress furnished me upon request, appears so valuable to all the Members of Congress and to others as well, that I herewith place it at your disposal:

MAJOR FRACTIONS VERSUS EQUAL PROPORTIONS: REAPPORTIONMENT OF THE UNITED STATES HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES CODE, TITLE 2, SECTION 2A AND UNITED STATES CODE, SUPPLEMENT V, TITLE 2, SECTIONS 2A AND 2B

I. HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

The first time a President of the United States exercised the right of veto was in 1792, when George Washington vetoed an apportionment bill enacted by the Congress. His reason for so doing is stated in the following language: [1]

"There is no one proportion or divisor which, applied to the respective number of the States, will yield the number and allotment proposed by the bill."

From that time on down mathematicians and scientists have tried to provide some fair, equitable method of apportionment. After the veto by the President in 1792, Congress adopted a ratio of 33,000. On that basis, 141 Members of the House resulted. The same general method was followed down to 1830, and between 1830 and 1840, two States were admitted—Arkansas and Michigan, Arkansas in 1836 and Michigan in 1837. Daniel Webster criticized severely the method then used, and as a direct result of his criticism in 1842 the House enacted an apportionment law adopting as the ratio 76,000 persons for each Member of Congress, and in that act we find the following language:

"One additional Member for each State having a fraction greater than one moiety of said ratio."

In other words, if a State had a greater fraction than one-half of the ration of 76,000, it got an additional Congressman. It was obvious under this method there was no possibility of regulating the size of the Congress. So in 1850 a new method was adopted known as the Vinton method, named after Sam Vinton, of Ohio, a member of the census committee. That method was followed from 1850 to 1900. That method secured 233 Members in the House. It divided the population of the country by 233, and that fixed the number of Representatives that each State was entitled to under this ratio, and then if you had any Members left over of this 233, it gave them to States in order of the size of the fractions. This proved to be inequitable and you could not regulate the size of the House by this method. So in 1911 a new Apportionment Act was passed by the Congress and the size of the House was fixed at 433 Members, but it was provided that in the event Arizona and New Mexico should be admitted to the Union, each of them should have 1 Representative. They both came into the Union as States in 1912 and added 2 Members to the House. Thereby and thereafter the membership of the House became 435, and that is the membership we have retained since that time.

Last year the Census Committee took up this question of apportionment. Because of the lame-duck amendment, the twentieth amendment of the Constitution, a hiatus was created under which no apportionment could be had. So we were simply confronted with the problem of curing, if you please, this hiatus left by the lame-duck amendment. At that the same five different methods were discussed. We were shown by experts and scientists who came before the committee that in 1910 there was no difference between the major-fractions and equal-proportions methods; that under either theory every State would have received the number of Members that it did receive. We were further shown that in 1930 there was no difference between equal proportions and major fractions. Both were identical. Since we were simply trying to cure a hiatus, the majority of the committee felt that we should not then go into the intricate mathematical and geometrical formulas necessary to understand these various methods. We were confronted with the proposition that the two leading methods, major fractions and equal proportions, were both provided for in the act of 1929 and would both be provided for in the act of 1940. We knew that the Congress, if it developed that one method was substantially preferable to the other, could elect as between the two.

II. THE FIVE MATHEMATICAL METHODS

For a detailed explanation in simple language of all five mathematical methods which have been advanced by various authorities see: Edvard v. Huntington, Methods of Apportionment in Congress, United States Senate Document No. 304, Seventy-sixth Congress, third session (Document Series, vol. No. 10469).

III. UNITED STATES CODE, TITLE 2, SECTION 2A

These provisions were introduced in the United States Senate as Senate bill No. 312, Seventy-first Congress. The question of major fractions versus equal proportions was discussed in great detail and appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 71, pages 1324, 1333, 1335-1336, 1610-1611, 1612, 1842-1845, 2071-2072, 2074, 2076-2077, 2275-2276, 2278, 2293-2299, 2360, 2615-2616, and 2715.

Pages 2293-2299 contain a rather lengthy list of references compiled by the Library of Congress on the subject Apportionment of Members of the House of Representatives.

This bill as finally enacted into law required the President to report to Congress at the beginning of the Seventy-seventh Congress and every fifth Congress thereafter, the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed, as indicated by the 16th and each subsequent decennial census.

The President was also required to report to Congress the number of Representatives to which each State would be entitled under an opportionment of the then existing number of Representatives by each of the three following manners:

1. The method used in the last preceding apportionment;
2. The method of major fractions; and
3. The method of equal proportions.

The act provided further that if Congress had not enacted a reapportionment law within 60 days of receipt of the foregoing statement, the States would be entitled to the number of Representatives shown in the statement based on the method used in the last preceding apportionmeht.

The President filed the required statement with the Congress; see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Seventy-seventh Congress, first session, at pages 51, 70, and 81. The Seventy-seventh Congress, under the rule that one Congress cannot bind another future Congress, did not enact a reapportionment law within the 60-day period.

IV. UNITED STATES CODE, SUPPLEMENT V, TITLE 2, SECTIONS 2A AND 2B

The provisions of these Code sections were introduced in the United States House of Representatives as House bill No. 2665. This bill being specifically to change the method of calculation from major fractions to equal proportions, the relative merits of the two methods were discussed in great detail. The discussion appears in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 87, at pages 1071, 1072-1074, 1077, 1080-1089, 1123-1120, 8050-8059, and 8076-8088.

This act was enacted long after the 60-day period expired and provided that each State was to have that number of Representatives in the Seventy-eighth and subsequent Congresses, until a new apportionment, as was indicated by the method of equal proportions: If any notices had been sent to the States under the prior act (major practices), they were to be recalled and new certificates issued.

The act further provided that the President would transmit to the Eighty-second Congress a statement on the population and the number of Representatives each State would have under the method of equal proportions. The other methods were dropped.

Accomplishments of the Eighty-first Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY M. JACKSON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 25, 1950

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, one of the outstanding accomplishments of this Eighty-first Congress is the passage of a bill expanding and bringing up to date our social-security system. This bill is a landmark in the field of social legislation. Ever since this bill passed the House last October, there has been widespread interest wherever I have traveled, in the provisions of the new law. Now that the bill has been signed into law by President Truman, I think it will be helpful to set forth the changes in the social-security system brought about by the new law.

MAJOR CHANGES SUMMARIZED

Summarized in a few sentences, the major changes are:

First. Larger benefits: The 56,000 Washingtonians now receiving social security payments will find that in the checks to be mailed out October 3, their benefits will be, on the average, roughly 75 percent greater than they have been. Second, for those who will retire after June 1952, benefits will be twice what they are now, on the average.

Second. Broader coverage: On January 1, 1951, nearly 150,000 people in the State of Washington, who up to now have not been covered by social security, will come under the system. For the first time the nonfarm self-employed, small-business men who own their own businesses—grocery store, retail store or gas station owners—will have social-security privileges.

Third. Easier eligibility: In general, it will take less years of social security "coverage" before you are eligible to draw benefits. Specifically, persons who are now 65 or over, and who have had six quarter-years (a year and a half) of social-security "coverage" can and should apply immediately for benefits. Any retired worker as well as survivors and dependents, will be able to earn $50 a month—as against the present limit of $15—without losing their benefit payments.

Here, in more detail, are the answers to questions I think will be of most general interest:

HOW MUCH LARGER BENEFITS?

First. How much larger will benefits be under the new law? Benefit increases will go to two main groups of people: (a) those who are currently receiving benefits, or who will begin receiving them before 1952; and (b) those who will reach retirement age after June 1952—these are called "new starts." Let me explain more fully how the new bill affects each of these groups.

IMMEDIATE INCREASES AVERAGE SEVENTY-SEVEN AND ONE-HALF PERCENT

There are about 56,000 people in the State of Washington who are now receiving social-security benefits. In the checks which they will receive early in October (their September payment) they will find that their payments will be, on the average, 77½ percent greater than they have been up to now.

The table below shows what the increases will be for an insured wage earner without any dependents, and for a married couple:

Retired wage earner without dependents		Retired wage earner and wife
Now	New law	Now	New law
$10	$20.00	$15.00	$30.00
$11	22.00	$16.50	33.00
$12	24.00	$18.00	36.00
$13	26.00	$19.50	39.00
$14	28.00	$21.00	42.00
$15	30.00	$22.50	45.00
$16	31.70	$24.00	47.55
$17	33.20	$25.50	49.80
$18	34.50	$27.00	51.75

INCREASES SENT AUTOMATICALLY

You do not have to apply for the increases—they will be sent to you automatically. If, for any reason, the increase fails to show up in your October check, it will show up very soon, in full. Recipients are asked not to start writing in for information because the more letters that have to be answered, the slower the program will be in getting under way.

BENEFITS DOUBLED IN 1952

For anyone who retires after June 1952, a new formula may be used to compute benefits which will yield roughly twice the benefits now being received. You can begin to use this new formula just as soon as you have worked for 6 quarter-years—or a full year and a half—under the social-security system after January 1, 1951.

The following table shows roughly how much the benefits will be, according to this new formula:

Average monthly wage	Single	Married
$50	$25	$38
$100	50	75
$150	58	86
$200	65	98
$250	72	109
$300	80	120

The minimum primary benefit has been raised from $10 to $25, in most cases, and the maximum family benefit has been raised from $85 to $150. These changes are long overdue in bringing our social-security system into line with high living costs.

WHO WILL BE COVERED NOW?

Second. What new people will be covered under the new law? On January 1, 1951, over 150,000 people in the State of Washington—nearly 10,000,000 in the Nation as a whole—will come under the social-security system for the first time.

THE NONFARM SELF-EMPLOYED

The largest and most important group to come under the system are the nonfarm self-employed—numbering about 94,000 in Washington State. For the first time, the druggist, the grocer, the gas-station owner, and thousands of other small-business men who are in business for themselves, will be covered by social security, and will be able to draw benefits when they reach the retirement age of 65. This does not include the farmers, nor does it include many professional people, such as doctors and lawyers.

ELIGIBLE FOR BENEFITS MUCH SOONER

At this point, I should emphasize, for the benefit of these businessmen—as well as all those who will come under the social-security system now—it will be much easier for you to become eligible for benefits under the new law. If you are 62 or over on January 1, 1951, and begin your coverage on that date, you will need only a year and a half of coverage in order to begin drawing benefits. That means that you will begin to draw benefits just as soon as you reach the retirement age of 65.

AGRICULTURAL WORKERS

Some 20,000 agricultural workers in Washington State will come under the social-security program on January 1. This includes not only persons who regularly work on farms, but also the so-called "borderline" agricultural workers—those engaged in processing agricultural products off the farm. Employees of farmer cooperatives, as well as of commercial handlers of fruits and vegetables are included in this group.

DOMESTIC WORKERS

About 9,000 Washington domestic workers in nonfarm homes will join the system next January, provided they work 24 days for one employer and receive cash wages of at least $50 during each quarter-year.

VOLUNTARY COVERAGE FOR STATE AND LOCAL EMPLOYEES

Roughly 37,500 employees of the State, and of cities, towns, or counties in Washington State may come under the system if a voluntary agreement is reached between the State and the Federal Government. In order that no existing retirement system will be hampered, no one covered by a State or local retirement system when the agreement is reached will be covered.

Employees of the Federal Government not presently covered by a Federal retirement system will be included under social security.

EMPLOYEES OF NONPROFIT INSTITUTIONS

Employees of nonprofit institutions—hospitals, churches, schools, and the like—will be covered only if the employer agrees to pay his share of the tax contribution and if two-thirds or more of the employees favor social-security coverage.

Ministers and members of religious orders will continue to be excluded.

SALESMEN AND TRUCK DRIVERS INCLUDED

The new bill will also include all full-time life-insurance salesmen, certain full-time traveling salesmen—other than house-to-house—many delivery-truck drivers and home industrial workers who satisfy certain conditions.

HOW LONG TO QUALIFY?

Third. How long will you have to work under social security before you can start drawing benefits? One of the greatest advantages of the new social-security law is that in the future you will not have to work under the social-security system nearly as long before you can retire and begin to draw benefits.

The retirement age is still the same—age 65—but under the new law, you will only have to be in "covered employment"—that is, employment under the social-security system—for half of the time elapsed since January 1, 1951. "Coverage" prior to that date can be used to fulfil this requirement. The present law requires "coverage" for half of the time since January 1, 1937.

In all cases, at least six quarter-years, or a year and a half, of coverage will be required. Under the old law, 27 quarter-years—nearly 7 full years—of coverage would be required for a person now 65 years of age who wants to retire.

These new provisions mean three things:

MANY AGED 65 CAN GET BENEFITS IMMEDIATELY

First. Any insured worker who is now 65 or over and who has had six quarter-years—of a full year and a half—of social-security coverage, can draw benefits immediately. He should apply for them at the nearest Old-Age and Survivors Insurance office. In my district, these offices are located in Bellingham, at room 321, Herald Building, 1143 State Street; in Everett at room 513, Commerce Building, 1803 Hewitt Avenue, and in Seattle in room 125, Federal Building, 909 First Avenue.

Second. Any worker who is 62 or over on January 1, 1951, even if he only starts his social security coverage next year, will be eligible to begin drawing benefits just as soon as he reaches the retirement age of 65, if he has had six quarter-years—a year and a half—of coverage.

ELIGIBILITY MUCH EASIER FOR THE NEWLY COVERED

Third. And most important to the thousands who will become eligible to join the social security system next year—it will be possible to begin drawing benefits upon retirement (at age 65) with much less coverage than now.

The following table shows how many quarter-years of coverage you will have to have under the old and new law. Simply look at the figure next to your age on January 1, 1951:

Quarters of coverage required to be fully insured

Age reached in first half of 1951	Present law	New law
76 or over	6	6
75	8	6
74	10	6
73	12	6
72	14	6
71	16	6
70	18	6
69	20	6
68	22	6
67	24	6
66	26	6
65	28	6
64	30	6
63	32	6
62	34	6
61	36	8
60	38	10
59	40	12
58	40	14
57	40	16
56	40	18
55	40	20
50	40	30
45 or under	40	40

BENEFITS FOR SURVIVORS AND DEPENDENTS

Fourth. How much will dependents and survivors receive under the new law? The primary benefit is the payment made to an insured wage earner who has no dependents. Generally speaking, dependents and survivors will receive the same part of the primary as at present. This means that their benefits will also be about 75 percent higher than at present, up until 1952, and double the present levels after that.

MAJOR CHANGES LISTED

The major changes in dependents and survivors' benefits are:

(a) A retired worker's wife who is under 65 can receive benefits if she has a child in her care.

(b) The benefit for a dependent parent has been raised to three-quarters of the primary benefit of the wage earner—it has been one-half.

(c) Lump-sum death payments, though reduced to three times the primary benefit of the wage earner, are now payable to the family of every insured worker. Formerly these payments were made only when no other member of the family was entitled to survivors' benefits at the time of the wage earner's death.

(d) Retired workers, survivors, or dependents may now earn $50 a month—as against $14.99 under the present law—without losing their benefit privileges.

This social-security bill marks a milestone in the field of social legislation. Its great advances are long overdue. Since 1945, I have introduced in the Congress bills to liberalize and improve our social-security system. Many of the features of my bills are included in the new law. I hope that soon the Congress will enact further improvements, such as including an insurance system for the permanently and totally disabled, and lowering the retirement age to 60—both of which I have long recommended.

As it stands, though, the new social-security law is a great step forward—a step of which I believe the Congress and the people can well be proud.

Happenings in Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EDWARD MARTIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, August 29 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a broadcast by me yesterday to the people of Pennsylvania on Happenings in Washington, being program No. 32 in my series of broadcasts.

There being no objection, the broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HAPPENINGS IN WASHINGTON—PROGRAM NO. 32

This is ED MARTIN, speaking to you from the Nation's Capital, and bringing you another discussion of Happenings in Washington.

In just a few days our boys of Pennsylvania's famous Twenty-eighth Division will leave to join the Federal fighting forces at Camp Atterbury, Ind.

Other Pennsylvania units of the Army Reserves have been called into active service. More Reserve units will leave in the near future.

Once more the sons of Pennsylvania are upholding its historic tradition of loyalty and patriotism.

This new call to arms is felt in every community in the State. It brings the Korean war closer to thousands of homes. Thousands of mothers, fathers, wives, and other relatives of these boys, as well as those who served with the gallant Twenty-eighth in prior wars, are deeply stirred.

Three weeks ago, at Indiantown Gap, it was my great privilege to witness the Twenty-eighth Division in its final review before answering the call into Federal service. It was a magnificent spectacle. It made me feel prouder than ever before of Pennsylvania's outstanding part in our Nation's defense.

There was deep and solemn inspiration as those fine young men passed in review with flags and battle streamers waiving beautifully in the sunlight.

There were tears in the eyes of many strong men as they watched the guardsmen march.

It recalled the grim realities of war and its tragic toll in suffering and sacrifice.

The review was also a stern reminder that every American must be alerted to do his full duty on the home front.

We are facing a time when the highest patriotic principles must be called forth in defense of our country and our way of life.

In the situation confronting us selfishness is sabotage. This is no time to think about increased profits. It is no time to demand wage increases. It is no time for business as usual or pleasure as usual.

It is a time for willing sacrifice in the service of our flag and our Republic. It is a time for Americans to practice 100-percent Americanism 100 percent of the time.

As the review came to an end I could not help but say to myself that never again must our country be caught as unprepared as we have been in the present emergency.

My fellow Pennsylvanians, I speak to you now not only as your United States Senator. I am talking as a soldier who fought in his country's wars and who commanded this same Twenty-eighth Division at the beginning of the Second World War, training it for combat against the Nazis.

I speak also as one who had fought unceasingly for a strong, well-armed America, adequately prepared to defend freedom against the menace of communism.

For many years I have favored universal military training. From my experience as a soldier covering almost half a century I know that a well trained reserve of manpower is one of the strongest elements in defense.

I know that military strength is a potent factor in preserving peace.

And let me tell you that a soldier trained to take care of himself in battle has more chance than one without that training. It may be the difference between life and death.

Long before I came to Washington I advocated the adoption of universal military training.

In 1947, I spoke in several parts of the country in favor of universal training. In an address at the annual convention of the Pennsylvania Veterans of Foreign Wars I said:

"I know this is unpopular with many mothers. I know that some are opposed to military training because of religious convictions. I know that it is also unpopular with some of my fellow Members of Congress and with many politicians. The politicians tell me that advocating such a course loses votes. But I have yet to see the day when political expedience will turn me away from what I believe is best for my country.

"I know that properly trained manpower is the best defense this country can have—today—tomorrow—or any other time in the future. * * *

"Trained manpower is a potent factor for peace."

My fellow Pennsylvanians—Korea today is proving the truth of that statement.

Everything that has happened on the front lines in Korea proves the great need for universal military training.

But down here in Washington this vital matter has become involved in so much confusion that it is impossible for me to tell you what is going to happen.

President Truman recommended universal military training in his message to Congress at the beginning of this session. Later he stated that he would not press for its adoption at this session.

Then, 10 days ago Secretary of Defense Johnson sent a letter to the chairmen of the House and Senate Armed Service Committees urging prompt action by Congress to approve universal military training for youths from 17 to 20 years of age.

Secretary Johnson stated that the letter had been authorized by President Truman.

One paragraph of the letter reads as follows:

"In my opinion the recent events in Korea have only served to emphasize the fact that universal military training is an essential element of an integrated and balanced system of national security."

The letter further stated and again I quote:

"Universal training is the only means of providing, on a continuous basis, sufficient number of men for the Reserve forces."

This was most encouraging to all of us who had been consistently advocating military training.

But it came as a great shock to learn that the very next day President Truman pushed Secretary Johnson's proposal into the discard.

The President told his press conference that he saw no sense in cluttering up Congress with such a controversial matter when it was already so badly cluttered.

Does the President have to be reminded that we have an extremely serious controversy with communistic aggression in Korea?

Must we avoid controversy in Congress when the future of our Nation is at stake?

The President's statement is hard to understand when at the same press conference he urged immediate consideration of the District of Columbia home-rule bill, which has been in controversy for many years.

Surely there is nothing in the District of Columbia bill that would contribute, even remotely, to national defense.

This, I regret to say, is another example of the uncertainty and confusion that still prevails here in Washington.

Had we adopted universal military training 4 years ago each year would have made available 850,000 trained young men. When the Korean attack occurred our potential strength of men ready for service would have been between 3 and 4 million.

Let me impress upon you, my fellow Pennsylvanians, that there is no political consideration in what I have said.

This is neither a Democratic war nor a Republican war. They didn't ask our boys of the Twenty-eighth Division whether they are Democrats or Republicans before sending them off to train at Camp Atterbury.

And no one will ask about their politics if they should be shipped overseas to fight in Korea or on some other far-off battlefield.

Let me assure you that I will continue to fight for universal military training legislation. In my opinion it would be dangerous for Congress to adjourn without enacting this vital part of our military defense program.

To our people back home let me say, one of the important things you can do for our boys of the Twenty-eighth Division and for our entire Nation is to speak up and tell your representatives in Congress that you want a universal military training law—now—not next year when it may be too late.

A few days ago the Senate passed the defense production bill.

This bill would place in the hands of the President tremendous wartime control over the Nation's economy.

It will enable the executive branch of the Government to mobilize the productive capacity of the United States for national defense.

This is the bill under which the President is given authority to fix prices and wages and to control consumer credit as a barrier against inflation.

It vests in the President the power to establish priorities and allocations of critical materials; to requisition equipment, supplies and materials needed for national defense and to expand the productive capacity of our industrial plant.

The bill passed by the Senate differs in some respects from the bill previously passed by the House of Representatives. It will now go to a conference committee made up of Members of the House and Senate. It is expected that they will reach an agreement upon the differences that exist in the two bills.

The conference agreement will then be submitted to each House of Congress for final approval.

I hope that the President will use the powers granted in this bill immediately.

Everyone knows that prices are constantly moving upward. With increased Government spending for defense they will rush even higher. Labor is already demanding wage increases to meet the rising cost of living. Artificial shortages have been created by some unscrupulous business men to extort higher profits from the public

Unless controls are put into effect at once, clear across the board, we will have a race between prices and wages that will mean a dangerous inflation.

Let me say that we cannot have wage control without price control. Neither can you have effective price control without wage control. They must go together.

The Senate is now discussing a new tax bill for 1950. The bill, which will be passed by the Senate in the next few days, will add approximately $5,000,000,000 to the Nation's tax bill.

Let me warn you that this is only the beginning. We must prepare to pay drastically increased taxes.

We must pay for as much as the cost of war as is humanly possible out of current revenues. That is the only way we can remain financially solvent and preserve our individual freedom.

I am confident that the American people will make any sacrifice in order to stamp out Communist aggression in the world.

We must be willing to assume these sacrifices and the increased burden of taxation.

It would be cowardly to pass these obligations on to our children and future generations and require them to pay for the mistakes and folly of our own time.

I know that the American people have the courage and the patriotism to face the facts if presented honestly and fully.

And, my fellow Pennsylvanians, here are the facts as I see them through the confused and foggy atmosphere here at Washington.

We are fighting with the odds stacked against us.

We are miserably unprepared.

We have no adequate plan for total military or industrial mobilization.

We have no adequate reserve of trained manpower.

We must act on the assumption that Red Russia's drive to conquer the world has been launched.

We are facing a war for survival. Time is running out.

Our enemy is well trained, well equipped and well prepared for cruel and ruthless aggression in any part of the free world.

With this situation confronting us, I ask you, my fellow Pennsylvanians:

What are we waiting for"

This is ED MARTIN, speaking to you from the Nation's Capital. I will be with you again in 2 weeks. Thank you for your attention.

Whom Do the People Trust—MacArthur or Truman?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend heretofore granted, I am inserting in the RECORD an editorial from the Washington (D. C.) Times-Herald under date of August 30, 1950, entitled "MacArthur on Formosa":

MACARTHUR ON FORMOSA

Gen. Douglas MacArthur transmitted a message to be read before the Veterans of Foreign Wars in convention in Chicago this week.

He proclaimed the island of Formosa vital to the defense of the United States and asserted that it must be prevented at all costs from falling into the hands of a hostile power.

By that he meant Soviet communism and the Chinese Communists as agents of the Soviet Union in particular.

STRANGE MIX-UP

On the eve of the VFW convention, General MacArthur informed the national commander that he had been directed to withdraw the statement. The White House subsequently admitted the order came from Mr. Truman.

Meanwhile, however, David Lawrence's weekly United States News and World Report had entered the mails carrying the full text of the statement. General MacArthur's headquarters then stated that, in conformity with usual practice, other publications need not be restrained from printing news already published and circulated.

This curious mix-up derived from the conflict between the position of the United States acting as a member of the United Nations and the United States acting as an independent nation in the interests of its security.

The position has been further complicated by the fact that, in ordering Formosa taken under American Fleet protection against any Red incursion, Mr. Truman acted independently of UN.

When the President on June 26 ordered General MacArthur to provide military support to South Korea against the North Korean Communists, he had no trouble obtaining UN approval of his intervention after the fact.

BRITISH OBJECT

But when, in the same order, he directed that Formosa be protected against attack, he acted unilaterally and his action was not approved by the UN. On the contrary, objections were raised by some of the member states, such as Britain, which were anxious not to alienate the Chinese Communists.

General MacArthur later flew to Formosa and conferred with Chiang Kai-shek, leader of the old Nationalist Government of China, who had installed himself in the island with a large force after the Communists had conquered the mainland.

The visit occasioned an outcry in Britain that MacArthur's activities might cause the conflict to spread in the Far East.

Britain viewed this possibility with concern, because it had already recognized the Communist regime in China in the hope of winning favor and preserving its large China investment, its trade with China, and the imperial outpost at Hong Kong.

In fact, General MacArthur on this visit was simply executing orders laid down by Mr. Truman for the protection of Formosa, and the White House approved his trip. In his statement to the VFW, the general was only justifying the policy already put into effect by Mr. Truman.

GENERAL MAC ARTHUR OBEYED ORDERS

The ambiguity arose solely out of the fact that, in Korea, the United States and General MacArthur are nominally acting as agents for UN, with approval of the whole non-Communist membership, including Britain, whereas in Formosa the United States is acting in its own behalf and MacArthur is acting as a general of the United States Army, not as supreme UN commander in the Korean pacification.

As a consequence of the VFW mix-up, Mr. Truman has sent a message to Warren Austin, American spokesman on the UN Security Council, reiterating the American position on Formosa stated by Austin on August 25.

This statement tries to reconcile the American action with reference to the island with UN objections to the President's unilateral action.

Mr. Truman denies that the United States has permanent designs on Formosa as a base and states that its legal status cannot be determined until there is international action to determine its future as conquered territory of the former Japanese empire.

The President here is in disagreement with General MacArthur, who plainly states the need to hold Formosa in the American defense perimeter as a means of keeping any future Pacific war 5,000 miles off the coasts of the American Continent.

The general's statement is realistic militarily, the President's is an attempt to relegate the interests of American military security to secondary status in order to affirm the paramountcy of a conflicting international authority.

WE ARE IN A TANGLE

This conflict between America's responsibilities to itself and to UN will undoubtedly be sharpened by the Chinese Communist complaint to UN that we have been guilty of aggression against Formosa. The Communist refer to the island as the territory of "the people's Republic of China" and affirm their determination to "liberate" it.

Formosa may well turn into a hotter issue than Korea.

If the Reds should send out a few junks, which our fleet then sank, we might even find ourselves at war with Communist China, without allies, while our forces were already committed to a UN war in Korea. UN, for which we are acting as military agent in Korea, would have none of us in any such war over Formosa.

Our Navy will be useful in keeping Chinese Communist divisions out of Formosa where they might fight Chiang's army, but they can walk into Korea to fight us.

In view of these possibilities, it is difficult to see what good UN and the concept of collective security are to the United States.

Mr. Truman has jockeyed himself into the position where we are the agent of UN in one nasty war while UN stands to disavow us in another even nastier.

Inside in Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OWEN BREWSTER
OF MAINE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 30 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an article entitled "Inside in Washington," written by May Craig and published in the Portland Press-Herald of August 28, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INSIDE IN WASHINGTON

(By May Craig)

WASHINGTON, August 27.—Political leaders are feeling their way toward the proper handling of the war, in their campaigns. We do not know how the Korean war is going to progress, what the situation will be in November, so politicians are a little cautious in their approach. It may seem ghoulish to involve the war in politics, but many people, in each party, honestly and earnestly believe that their party could handle the national security best. They will undoubtedly tell this to the voters.

Republicans are split as to how to handle the war in the campaign. The leaders of Republicans in Congress are all conservatives, and the policy they are carving out is beginning to be plain. They are attacking the conduct of the war, the events that led up to it, as far back as Roosevelt. They even go farther back, by implication at least, and blame Wilson for the First World War.

Senator BREWSTER of Maine is chairman of the Senate Republican senatorial campaign committee, so what he says and does can be taken as party policy, however much liberal Republicans kick against it—and they do. Senator TAFT of Ohio is chairman of the Republican Policy Committee of the Senate; MILLIKIN, of Colorado, is chairman of the Republican conference; WHERRY of Nebraska is floor leader. They are all conservatives. Representative MARTIN of Massachusetts is House Republican floor leader; HALLECK of Indiana and ARENDS of Illinois are his assistants; they are all conservatives. Guy Gabrielson of New Jersey is chairman of the Republican National Committee and the choice of the Republican conservatives.

The Republican leaders have been attacking Secretary of State Acheson, saying he should be fired. Many are also attacking Secretary of Defense Johnson, but not so much. Acheson is tied to the Republican-McCarthy charge of communism in the Government, put there and kept there by Democrats, they say. This is going to be an issue in the Republican campaign, so Acheson is a double target.

Senator BREWSTER does not attack Johnson as much as he does Acheson. This may be because of his personal friendship with Johnson, or because Acheson is doubly vulnerable; faulty foreign policy and communism.

At any rate, if Republican policy is to be judged by BREWSTER, then the speech he made recently to the Republican State Executive Committee in Charleston, W. Va., is important, because in that the Maine Senator stated flatly: "Acheson must go." He devoted a great portion of his speech to Acheson and the Democratic foreign policy in itself and as it relates to the war. This was a party speech to a party gathering and undoubtedly reflects party strategy.

Although BREWSTER did not precisely blame the Democrats for the war, past and present, he did so by implication. He reproached me, after a similar speech last June in Atlantic City, the night before the Korean attack, for saying that he blamed the Democrats for war. He said he was only stating facts. I said I could only draw one inference from what he said and that is that he blames the Democrats for getting us into war, over the years. Otherwise why the juxtaposition of statements? To be fair, I will quote some of what the Maine Senator said in Charleston. It may be true that the Democrats got us into war. But if so, the Republicans ought to come right out with their charge, so it can be combatted if possible.

This is what the Maine Senator said in Charleston:

"In 50 years, we have had 24 years of Republican administrations and no wars, and 26 years of Democratic administrations and three wars.

"I repeat what I said June 24 at Atlantic City, the night before the Korean attack. The Democrats seem unlucky. Under Wilson, it was 5 years to the First World War. Under Roosevelt, it was 9 years to the Second World War. Under Truman, it is 5 years to Korea and all that may entail.

"Yet 2 months ago, President Truman said we were nearer to peace than at any time in the past 5 years.

"I do not say the Democrats planned or wished the war. I do not even say the Republicans could have done any better. I simply say they could not have done any worse."

The Brewster speech is important because there is truly great uncertainty whether we should change our Secretaries of State and Defense. There comes a time when a public servant, justly or unjustly, has lost his value because of loss of public confidence. Then the Chief Executive must decide whether to replace him or not. The decision should be made in the public interest. There is some danger involved in changing horses in the middle of the war—the question is: Which is worse, to continue or to change?

Certainly we have suffered tragic losses in the Far East. Where the blame rests is matter for history to unravel. Democrats say there is no use wasting time with the past. Republicans say that we cannot entrust the future to those who have proven themselves unable to take care of this country's interests.

Senator BREWSTER spoke straight out, in the West Virginia speech, about the foreign situation. He said that, of course, both parties will give full cooperation to the war in Korea. But, he said:

"The American people want to know, and are entitled to know, how we got into this war. * * * Here is the most glaring ineptitude in our diplomacy. The record of the utter failure of our diplomacy in the Orient is clear to all. * * *

"Stalin was given the green light to take over Korea by Secretary Acheson. At the thirteenth hour, the signals were changed and MacArthur was ordered to enter the fight without previous warning of any kind that such action might be contemplated."

The Senator takes Republicans out from under responsibility—though the Democrats blame Republicans—for failure of the Far East policy. BREWSTER said, "In the Orient, there was no bipartisan policy. At no stage in this unfolding tragedy in the Orient in the last 5 years were Republican leaders consulted as to what our policy should be." This is absolutely true—Senator VANDENBERG, of Michigan, ranking Republican on Foreign Relations, complained of this, during the years. The worst aspect of this is that Acheson has to face the charge that not only was he mistaken but that he was either the dupe or the accomplice of Communists and pro-Communists, in the State Department and out, who planned our ruin in the Orient, and the victory of the Reds in the Far East. Dupe or accomplice, Republicans say with BREWSTER: "The American people can no longer have confidence in his conduct of our foreign affairs."

Activities of the Senate Subcommittee on Merchant Marine and Maritime Affairs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR
OF MARYLAND
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 30 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a statement by myself in regard to the activities of the Senate Subcommittee on Merchant Marine and Maritime Affairs.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR, OF MARYLAND

It has been announced that the Senate Subcommittee on Merchant Marine and Maritime Affairs is now terminating the work for which the special staff was engaged. The conclusion of this special activity is noteworthy because the undertaking was of greatest concern to a large segment of our people and which has become of increasing importance under international difficulties. The rehabilitation of the American Merchant Marine and the American shipbuilding industry is of such urgent nature that it demands the favorable attention of the Congress.

In our efforts in this direction I am happy to acclaim the leadership and the unswerving devotion to the cause evidenced by my distinguished colleague from the State of Washington, Senator WARREN G. MAGNUSON. As chairman of the Subcommittee on Merchant Marine and Maritime Affairs Senator MAGNUSON not only displayed a wide and thorough grasp of the many complex questions involved, but his enthusiasm and his consistent attention to the problem were a source of generous inspiration to us and to the very capable group of loyal Americans, leaders in the shipping and ship-construction fields, who gave us their utmost support.

Throughout our lengthy hearings Senator MAGNUSON was unflagging in his efforts to arouse our people to the necessities of these vital industries, and he, likewise, left nothing undone that could further the progress of the various legislative proposals introduced in connection with our efforts. The many thousands of owners, seamen, and shipyard workers are indebted to Senator MAGNUSON for his unselfish efforts in their behalf.

If our Nation, unfortunately, should be forced into a conflict of large dimensions, as well might happen, the wisdom of Senator MAGNUSON'S stand and the worth of his efforts for the merchant marine and shipbuilding industries will be all the more apparent. Now that the Subcommittee on Merchant Marine and Maritime Affairs is concluding its work for the session, I would be remiss in my appreciation of the distinguished Senator's work if I did not publicly attest to my admiration and regard for his constructive leadership.

No Rigor Mortis in Bradgate

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES I. DOLLIVER
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following from Life magazine. In its August 28, 1950, issue it has several pages of pictures and text under the heading "An Iowa Town Dies a Slow Death." That article prompted me to write the following letter to my long-time friend, Rev. Joe Share, whose picture appeared in the magazine. The letter follows:

AUGUST 30, 1950.

Rev. JOSEPH SHARE,
Bradgate, Iowa.

DEAR REVEREND JOE: The issue of Life magazine dated August 28 contains an article about Bradgate. It calls Bradgate a dying community—"An Iowa town dies a slow death."

I don't know who the reporter and photographer were who prepared that derogatory spread in Life magazine. But certainly they did not have an understanding of Bradgate and thousands of other small towns, and the relationship they bear to the entire country.

The fact is that Bradgate is not dead, nor is there any immediate prospect of rigor mortis. Situated as it is in the heart of the greatest agricultural State in the world, Bradgate will be alive and healthy when the huge and overcrowded cities—whence presumably the article originated—have been destroyed by atomic bombing. No aggressor will drop his bombs on Bradgate. Perchance if bombs are dropped, some of our unctuous and cynical friends in the city will be glad to find refuge in Bradgate or one of its thousands of counterparts across this country.

Because I daresay, for the vast majority of Americans, life in small towns like Bradgate is much more typical and much more wholesome than life in the palaces and slums of the great cities. Indeed, were it not for the smaller communities to furnish transfusions of new blood into the life of cities, long ago the great centers of population would have become even more corrupt and slum ridden and boss-plagued than they now are. Iowa communities in the Sixth Iowa District, such as Bradgate, have furnished some of our outstanding leaders. For example, the presidents of both the University of Iowa and the University of Michigan are products of small towns in the Sixth Iowa District.

In Bradgate people know each other. They go to school together as children. They attend church together. Their social life is not based upon caviar and cocktails but upon the community picnic or the family gathering. For me, I'll take fried chicken and sweet corn any time in preference to the elaborate feasts of the Waldorf Astoria.

The country can far better get along without the city than the city can get along without the country. If food were not provided from the farms and country towns the city people would starve within a few weeks.

For me, I'll take Bradgate and the country around it and the people who live in it. When they say Bradgate's dying, they don't know what they're talking about.

All good wishes.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES I. DOLLIVER.

Responsibility of News and Radio Reporters

REMARKS
HON. EUGENE J. McCARTHY
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Speaker, in a recent issue of the New York Times, Robert Trumbull reports that "anti-United States feeling in India has never been so widespread as it is now." Part of this feeling undoubtedly arises from the destruction of Korean towns and villages by the United States troops and from the fact that Americans are killing Asiatics in the present United Nations action in Korea. These are facts of war which we must accept. Part of the antipathy is the result of anti-European and anti-American attitudes and racial prejudices which have been deliberately aroused against us. Part of it is the result of our own failings, of our failure to try to understand the Asiatic or to try still lose the battle for Asia. We must realize that, even though we win the ultimate military victory in Korea, we may still lose the battle for Asia. We must not forget that along with the military war, we are engaged in a world-wide war of ideologies. Victories and defeats on this level are every bit as important to our success as are victories in the field. The Communists are sharply aware of this and are quick to capitalize on each of our failings, on every weakness in our ideological armor.

In a recently published book, The God That Failed, Richard Crossman, a member of the British Parliament warns:

> Whatever its failures in the west, communism still comes as a liberating force among the colored peoples who make up the great majority of mankind. * * * For them, western democracy still means quite simply white ascendancy.

Certainly this describes the Communist propaganda line in Asia today. We must be most careful to defend ourselves against this. We must be zealous to remove from our own thinking the false thesis of racial superiority, zealous to eliminate from our own culture the institutions and practices which rest on this false thesis. We must remember that every careless act or word on our part serves to strengthen the Communist propaganda efforts. Every lapse on our part plays into the hands of the enemy. One such lapse, and one which has been recurring with regrettable frequency, is the use in the Nation's press of the word "gook" in referring to the North Koreans.

It is reported that the word "gook" was first applied to the American soldiers, but that it has since been turned back and applied to the Koreans. It has taken on an overtone of disparagement which will quickly be exploited against us. It is not surprising, or even particularly distressing, that men in battle should apply disparaging terms to the enemy or fix derogatory labels upon them. "Destroy the infidel" was the battle cry of the Crusaders. The Germans were Huns in World War I. In the wars with Mexico we were gringos. Fighting men under pressure develop many words and phrases to express annoyance, impatience, or to provide outlet for the fears and frustrations born of battle.

My censure is not directed at the fighting men who use the term, but at the newspapermen and radio reporters who have exploited it. The first news story using the term "gook" involved an interview with a soldier on the Korean front. Since then it has appeared in headlines, in stories, in the comments of popular syndicated columnists, and in the reports of the radio commentators. Undoubtedly the men responsible for such usage think that the term lends local color or a ring of authenticity to what would otherwise be an ordinary news report. Even if this were the case, such literary value is poor exchange for the potential harm in the use of the term. No one holds that the press has the right to make indiscriminate use of the entire military vocabulary in order to create an on-the-scene illusion for the Nation's readers. No one questions the desirability of restraints on behalf of accepted conventions of decency. Certainly the press should not object to restraint and self-discipline for the sake of better relations between the peoples of America and Asia.

The responsible section of the American press has disciplined itself to eliminate the use of derogatory terms that have too often been applied to religious, national, or racial minorities in our own country. It should do the same in its references to peoples outside the United States.

Fundamentally this is a most important matter. It involves the very basic issue of the dignity of the human person, regardless of nationality, religion, or race. This practice of labeling is both undemocratic and un-Christian. It flouts truth because of its inaccuracy. It flouts justice for the same reason, and it flouts charity as well. Once a nation or a race—or its members—is checked and filed by means of a label, every individual subject to that label is done for as a person. It is difficult, often impossible, for them to return to their former dignity—either in their own minds or in the minds of others. True, great personalities or strong nations and peoples may, by concerted and almost superhuman effort, throw off the effect of the label. The ordinary people and the weaker nations, however, can be utterly destroyed by it. These are the people who are the concern of democracy and of Christianity. These are they who are exploited by totalitarianism.

I call upon the press to exercise the responsibility which is the condition of its freedom. To submit to self-discipline in the interests of truth and of peace is essential to the preservation of that freedom and a final, lasting victory in the war of ideologies now raging throughout the world.

A Way To Prevent Further Armed Aggression

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LANSDALE G. SASSCER
OF MARYLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. SASSCER. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, I include excerpts from Frank Edwards' broadcast, Mutual Broadcasting System, on July 24, 1950:

All over the world tonight there is just one big question: Is this the beginning of world war III?

To a large extent, no doubt, the answer to that question will depend upon our own policies and actions in the months ahead. There are but two great forces on earth at the present time, ourselves and the Soviet Union. War or peace, then, must necessarily hinge upon the actions of these two powers.

At this time I would like to submit to you a potential plan for utilizing our own strength to the utmost to prevent further conflict. I say a potential plan because it is one which each of you should consider in the light of your own reasoning.

As matters stand right now, we are engaged in a war thousands of miles from our own land; a conflict into which we are pouring American resources and American lives to stop armed aggression against a peaceful nation.

We could be bled white by a series of these little wars. And wherever they occurred we would either have to fight and die or else permit the ideology of brute strength to overrun the world.

It does not require a great deal of vision to see what is happening to us. Our potential adversary is sitting back, smugly awaiting the day when we shall be so enfeebled by these endless wars that we would no longer be able to successfully face a major power. We cannot fight all the sparring partners and still win the main event. When that day comes Russia could call the shots against us. For by then they would have equality in atomic bombs and overwhelming superiority in military equipment and manpower.

Is it necessary for us to play the game as our opponents prepare it for us? Is there no other alternative but for America to dance to the Russian fiddling? Must we squander our priceless resources fighting these little wars until Russia is ready to strike us herself?

Personally, I see no reason why the United States of America should take orders from any other nation on earth. I see no reason why we should permit world peace, which means our own, to be jeopardized by the deliberate and calculated actions of the enemy.

We have within our arsenal the most powerful weapon ever devised and we have more of them than all the rest of the world combined. The atomic bomb is not a defensive device—but it can be a decisive factor in stopping aggression.

Suppose that the United Nations notified the world that after a certain date in the very near future there must be no more armed aggression, or the aggressor would be subjected to atomic bombing for having deliberately endangered the peace of the world. That warning would be clear enough.

Then, after that date, any aggressor could be given 72 hours' notice by the United Nations—72 hours in which to cease firing and submit the trouble to peaceful mediation through the machinery of the United Nations—or if they persisted in fighting, to be prepared for an atomic bombing anytime after that 72-hour period had expired.

The loss of civilian life could be minimized by notifying them by radio to get out of the aggressors principal cities—clogging his roads and thoroughfares—reducing the cities to empty shells awaiting the bombing. Facilities, not people, are the real objectives.

The clear, unmistakeable warning of an atomic bombing in reprisal for illegal aggression would make the stooge nations think twice before they embarked upon such dangerous ventures as that in Korea. Russia could not guarantee them protection, because to do so would mean inviting atomic attack upon herself. The stooges would not dare to provoke an assault which would utterly destroy themselves.

It seems to me that with our predominance in the field of atomic warfare we should make our position plain to the other nations—that if they persist in endangering us by their acts of aggression—we will stop them by the quickest means at our command. That if they deliberately choose to involve us in war—it is going to be war on our terms—for a change.

It's something to think about—and high time we did some thinking.

As Mr. Edwards says, this is "something to think about," and it is time we did some thinking on this subject.

Potato Scandal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OWEN BREWSTER
OF MAINE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, August 30 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Potato Scandal," published in the Portland Press-Herald of August 28, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POTATO SCANDAL

Maine is bound to be interested in a Collier's magazine article, the Great Potato Scandal. Briefly stated, the argument of the article is anti-Democratic, antiadministration. It is that last year we raised such a surplus of potatoes under the price-boosting policy (that cost the taxpayers $100,000,000) that the Department of Agriculture had to buy and destroy 78,000,000 bushels. Yet, at the same time we allowed to be imported 14,000,000 bushels of potatoes from Canada growers who never had it so good. On the contrary, Maine's Aroostook County has more people out of work than at any time since 1933, while its farm income has dropped 50 percent in 2 years.

The Collier's article makes the point that it has been possible to shut off the flow of Canadian potatoes; that the State Department, under an escape clause of the reciprocal trade agreement, could have revised import quotas of the commodity, and that the Secretary of Agriculture also could have acted. That is what Senator BREWSTER urged all along. To be sure, a mere 14,000,000 bushels was relatively a small part of the problem; yet it was nothing short of infuriating to read that Maine's market in some areas was seriously impaired while Canadian potatoes were flowing over the border. A New Brunswick potato dealer, asked what he thought of the administration's price support and low potato tariff policy replied, "They're wonderful; they make me rich."

One has to wonder of how many other commodities this has been true: That the price supports and low tariffs hit the taxpayers hard and the industries, and advantage the nationals of other countries. Maine knows all about it, not only in the matter of potatoes but also in that of fisheries. Only recently has the Government acted to keep foreign fishermen from availing themselves of the loophole in the tariff acts which permitted dumping in the market.

All this merely confirms Maine people in the Republican faith, and is likely to help swing the coming election, now barely 2 weeks away.

Resolution of Army and Navy Legion of Valor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LANSDALE G. SASSCER
OF MARYLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. SASSCER. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, I include a resolution passed at the sixtieth annual reunion of the Army and Navy Legion of Valor, held at Boston, Mass., on August 9, 1950.

Although this organization of American heroes was disappointed that the bill referred to in the resolution was not given the consideration that similar legislation has been given in other countries, their resolution demonstrates to a high degree the Americanism and patriotism within their breasts. The resolution follows:

Whereas the Army and Navy Legion of Valor has had before the Congress of the United States, H. R. 3263 since 1948; and

Whereas H. R. 3263 is a proposed amendment to the act of 1916, granting special pensions to highly decorated veterans; and

Whereas even today we feel that in view of the very special pensions being granted by foreign countries to their highly decorated veterans, as evidenced by letters in the hands of the House Veterans Affairs Committee Members, furnished by us, that our great Nation should do at least as much for its own highly decorated veterans; and

Whereas our decorations are proof enough that we value our American way of life and all it means more than life itself; and

Whereas our Nation is now facing a most dangerous threat to our ideals and way of living, with our service men and women once again locked in an all-out struggle with people who would destroy our much cherished freedom; and

Whereas the additional expense of this present national emergency is going to cost tremendous sums of moneys, thereby necessitating the placing of larger financial burdens on our people: Be it therefore

Resolved, That the Army and Navy Legion of Valor request the Hon. LANSDALE G. SASSCER, Member of Congress from the State of Maryland, who introduced H. R. 3263 into the Congress, to request the Congress of the United States and the House Veterans Affairs Committee to take no further action on this bill (H. R. 3263) until the present national emergency has been passed and our fighting forces once more returned to their homes and loved ones.

ARMY AND NAVY LEGION OF VALOR,
JOS. F. MANNION, DSC,
Chairman, Legislative Committee.

Unanimously approved, Boston, Mass., August 9, 1950.

Port of Embarkation's New Chief

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. ROONEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Brooklyn Eagle of August 29, 1950:

PORT OF EMBARKATION'S NEW CHIEF

The appointment of Brig. Gen. Edward H. Lastayo as commander of the New York Port of Embarkation, including the Brooklyn Army Base at the foot of Fifty-eighth Street, brings back here a familiar and well-liked figure. For he served as Deputy Port Commander and Chief of Staff from February 1946 to June 1949.

General Lastayo has had a distinguished career in the Army Transportation Corps. In the last war in the North African invasion he commanded the port of Oran and, after other important assignments, he became chief of transportation of the Mediterranean theater of operations.

It is highly appropriate that a man of General Lastayo's ability and experience should take over the Brooklyn post, for it is the largest single installation of the Army Transportation Corps.

Renegotiation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OWEN BREWSTER
OF MAINE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, August 30 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Renegotiation," published in the Portland Press-Herald of August 28, 1950. The editorial seems to me to be a most important one.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RENEGOTIATION

With action on an excess-profits tax evidently postponed to 1951, renegotiation of war contracts may be used as an interim method of taking the profits out of war. Secretary of the Treasury Snyder has said: "Some device to prevent undue war profits will be adopted through a tax bill or the renegotiation process."

The House Ways and Means Committee is considering a bill setting up new renegotiation authority. This measure, if enacted, would probably shunt aside the Tydings bill, supported by the present War Contracts Price Adjustment Board, to liquidate that Board.

An excess-profits tax in itself will neither curb inflation nor take profits out of war production, according to Bernard M. Baruch. "Excess-profits taxes—standing alone—have no effect whatever in checking inflation," he told the War Policies Commission many years ago. "Their only effect is to increase it * * * there is more incentive to increase prices—and therefore profits—under an 80 percent excess-profits tax than there is without it."

The Sixth Supplement Defense Appropriation Act of April 28, 1942, provided for renegotiation of war contracts over $100,000 to recover "excessive profits." The measure established penalties ranging up to a $10,000 fine to 2 years' imprisonment for withholding financial data or furnishing misleading information.

Within 5 months the Navy Department reported that renegotiation of contracts under the act had saved the Government some $2,000,000,000 on naval contract prices. Cash recoveries of $7,700,000 had been sent to the Treasury.

In 1943 the Truman committee of the Senate estimated that 80 percent of all savings effected through renegotiation would have been recaptured through taxation of excess profits. While renegotiation could "hardly be justified as a revenue measure," the committee said, it served to "put pressure on contractors to avoid waste of materials and manpower by reducing costs." A 1943 amendment to the 1942 act classified war brokers as "subcontractors" and subjected their fees to possible reduction if payments totaled more than $25,000 a year.

The Revenue Act of 1944, passed over President Roosevelt's veto, raised the floor of contracts not subject to renegotiation from $100,000 to $500,000. It created a six-member War Contracts Price Adjustment Board for purposes of review. It also permitted appeals in most cases to the United States Tax Court.

In explaining his veto, Mr. Roosevelt pointed out that the measure limited renegotiation authority to December 31, 1944. Actually the act gave the President authority to extend renegotiations for 6 months, which he used. And in 1945 Congress extended the termination date to December 31, 1945.

Renegotiation, in the 4 years the act was in effect, brought $10,195,698,000 to the Treasury in recoveries. An estimated $3,058,709,000 of that amount, the Brewster committee (successor to the Truman committee) reported in 1948, would not have been recovered in war taxation. It now seems certain that we will hear more about renegotiation in the near future.

Textile Tariff Rates

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters:

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF WOOLEN AND WORSTED OVERSEERS,
Holyoke, Mass., August 22, 1950.

Hon. JOSEPH R. BRYSON,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At our recent semiannual meeting our association unanimously voted to send you this letter protesting against any further cuts in the textile tariff rates because we honestly believe that they threaten the future of our industry and our jobs as well as those of the help under us in the textile mills of the country.

In this connection, we would like to give you an outstanding example in corroboration of our fears. If you will remember, Mr. President, after World War I the Japanese textile economy became highly developed. As a consequence, and because of its low wage scale and longer hours of work Japan was able to undersell the world in textiles. The influx of Japanese wool and cotton goods into this country became so serious that the cotton industry of the South sent a commission to Japan to ask the Japanese textilists to not only stop increasing their sales of textiles to this country but to reduce them if possible. Our textile industry simply could not meet the ruinous prices of the Japanese under the tariff rates that then existed even with our modernized equipment in place. And this was before there was as much reduction in textile rates as now exists.

Moreover, what Japan did to the textile industry of this country and to other high wage textile nations at that time, other low-wage textile countries were able to duplicate like, for instance, Czechoslovakia, which undersold us on shoes, linens, and other textile items. So we ask you, Mr. President, in all sincerity how much worse will the situation become if the textile tariff rates are given a further cut that will enable the low-wage textile countries to sell their goods on our markets easier than before in competition with our textile industry operating under the highest wage scale in the world?

Multiply the examples of Japanese and Czechoslovakian potentialities with that of other low-wage textile nations out to sell us under still more attractive textile tariff rates and perhaps you can then understand our fears for our industry and our jobs.

For your own information the National Association of Woolen Worsted Overseers, established in 1885, is the largest organization of its kind in the world reaching into every mill in the wool-manufacturing industry. It is the parent organization of all the overseer group organizations that recently sent you a combined letter of protest against any further cuts in the textile tariff. The letter was headed by the Pennsylvania Textile Executives Association and we, as a body, voted to unanimously subscribe to its contents.

For your further information there are over 900 wool-manufacturing plants in the United States in which more than 4,700 production executives are employed. Under the direction of these men there are anywhere from 40 to 100 employees in each department of a textile plant so that you can visualize that our association is one of high standing, influence, and authority in the production end of the textile industry.

Trusting that you will weigh as carefully as you can our strong reasons for asking that there be no further cuts in the textile tariff, we are,

Respectfully yours,
NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF WOOLEN AND WORSTED OVERSEER., CHARLES AULERICH, President.
JAMES J. EURNS, Secretary.

P. S.—To you—a Member of Congress from the textile States to whom we are sending a copy of this letter to President Truman—we ask that you add your unqualified appeal to the President and the State Department not to cut the textile tariff rates any further if we are to preserve our industry and our jobs from ruinous low-price foreign competition. A note from you placing yourself on record will be most appreciated.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 30, 1950.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF WOOLEN AND WORSTED OVERSEERS, Holyoke, Mass.

GENTLEMEN: I have just received your letter of August 22 regarding the oncoming conference soon to be held at Torquay, England, for possible further lowering of tariffs on foreign textiles.

We have a few woolen or worsted plants in our section and I, of course, am interested in their well-being. My principal interest, however, is in cotton textiles. In order that you may know my position more fully, I am sending you herewith two statements I have made lately.

I am fighting this threat to our way of life with all might and main.

Very respectfully,

JOSEPH R. BRYSON.

Hon. James W. Wadsworth, of New York

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. STERLING COLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, one of the foremost authorities in the Congress on national security and military operations is our distinguished colleague from New York, JAMES W. WADSWORTH, whose entire service in the Senate and the House, covering a period of 35 years, has been identified with legislative problems of a military nature. All of us have looked to him for guidance and counsel. He has been steadfast and sound in his judgment, ofttimes displaying a vision far beyond the capacity of many of us to share.

Recently the Reserve Officers Association of the United States adopted a resolution concerning Mr. WADSWORTH which I am pleased to include as part of my remarks, together with the letter of transmittal from the executive director, Gen. E. A. Evans, in order that the Nation may be apprised of this well-merited commendation. The letter and resolution follow:

RESERVE OFFICERS ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., August 9, 1950.

H.n. JAMES W. WADSWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WADSWORTH: It gives me a feeling of extreme satisfaction to present to you the enclosed resolution. This resolution was unanimously adopted by the delegates in attendance at the twenty-fourth annual convention of the Reserve Officers Association held in Washington, D. C., June 28–July 1, inclusive.

I can assure you, Mr. Congressman, that the thoughts expressed in this resolution are most sincere and emanate from a sense of appreciation of your job well done.

Yours most sincerely,

E. A. EVANS,
Executive Director.

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE TWENTY-FOURTH ANNUAL CONVENTION OF THE RESERVE OFFICERS ASSOCIATION HELD IN WASHINGTON, D. C., JUNE 28–JULY 1, 1950

Whereas the Hon. JAMES W. WADSWORTH, Congressman from the Forty-first Congressional District of New York, has announced his voluntary retirement from public life; and

Whereas the object of the Reserve Officers Association of the United States is to support a military policy that will provide adequate national security and to assist in the development and execution thereof; and

Whereas the record of Mr. WADSWORTH as a statesman shows supreme devotion to that object, in that, while serving as a United States Senator from 1915 to 1927 and as a United States Congressman from 1933 to the present day, he has, among other things, presided as chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs from 1919 to 1927, authored the National Defense Act of 1920 and the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940, successfully championed extension of draft service in the critical prewar days of 1941, zealously advocated peacetime citizen military training after both World Wars and earned a reputation as an authority on defense legislation; and

Whereas Mr. WADSWORTH is one of a long line of patriots who have borne arms in the defense of the Republic; and

Whereas his achievements merit specific recognition by this associations: Now, therefore, be it

Address of Hon. George A. Smathers, of Florida

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. HERLONG, JR.
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. HERLONG. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a speech which my colleague from the Fourth District of Florida, the Honorable GEORGE SMATHERS, delivered at the State convention of the Junior Chamber of Commerce in my city of Orlando, Saturday night August 12, 1950.

The people of my district approved and applauded the sentiments which were expressed in this speech, and I think that those things which our colleague, a Member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, said at that time should be a matter of record. Mr. SMATHERS' speech follows:

I wish it were possible to bring you good news. It is always nice to do so—always popular to be the bearer of good news—but it is not always honest to bring good news, for news is not always good. The news from Washington could not be classified as good tonight, for at this moment we find ourselves, as a Nation, in great and grave difficulties.

Some measure of our present difficulty can be traced to the fact that for several years back too many of us wanted to hear only good news. We wanted our officials to tell us that which made the future seem bright and hopeful. We wanted, naturally, to be free to live our lives as individuals, and even as a nation, as we wanted to live them—without irritations from outside, without interference or control. We resented those who told us that taxes would not be lighter for a long time to come. We were irritated with those who, right after World War II, told us it was a mistake to demobilize as rapidly as we were doing. We turned our backs on those few voices who several years ago warned of the threat of a new tyranny on the march and asked us to get prepared. We ignored them even though we saw communism reaching its fingers out into all parts of the world, grasping in more and more of the bewildered and shocked peoples of Europe and Asia.

There were even those who contributed to our complacency and delusion by preaching that the men in the Kremlin didn't want war; that they were taking over 11 countries of eastern Europe only to build a wall to defend themselves against an attack from an impoverished and obviously impotent Western Europe. There were even those who thought they saw some connection between communism and the cause of liberalism here in America. They shouted that those who opposed the advance of these new "people's democracies" were "against the little people" and were "reactionaries."

Why, I remember even as late as 6 months ago that there were many who said it was unpopular to warn of the threat of communism, for people were tired of hearing about it. They wanted to hear of good things, joy to happen.

Well, it's different today. As of June 24 when, without warning, without provocation, the forces of communism in North Korea cynically and brutally attacked across the thirty-eighth parallel—with tanks, flame throwers, and machine guns—the independent Republic of South Korea, created by the United Nations; as of that date, doubt was removed, opinions crystallized, and the madness of the men of Moscow was revealed to a shocked and frightened world.

The men of the Kremlin acknowledged by that act that they were willing to risk total war in order to satisfy their lust for world conquest.

June 24, 1950, now appears as one of the saddest days in the history of the world, but it could prove to be otherwise. For with all Russia's preparation and planning with the North Koreans, one little fact was forgotten, a fateful fact which may change the course of world affairs. Several weeks before the attack on South Korea, the Soviet Union had withdrawn from the Security Council of the United Nations, because the Security Council would not recognize and seat the Communist government of China. And so it was that on June 25 the Security Council was able to meet, and without Russian obstruction and veto estimate the situation and quickly and unanimously condemn the Communist attack in Korea for what it really was—open, inexcusable, cynical aggression. Without that Russian veto to hamstring the Security Council, it was able to call upon all member nations of the United Nations to join together and resist this Communist attack.

It was a soul-searching question the leaders of the United States had to decide. What should our reaction be to this call of the United Nations? They knew of the difficulty of fighting in Korea. They knew of the ineffectiveness of our few and untrained troops. They knew of the obstacles of a 5,000-mile supply line.

But weighed against those difficulties was the stabbing realization that if the authority of the United Nations were so grossly flaunted, it would cease to exist as an effective instrument for peace; it would, like its forerunner, the League of Nations, go down for the third and final time.

Then, too, at the moment of decision it was realized that if the United States failed to act, the remaining democratic countries of the world, who look to us for leadership, would feel so deserted and become so frightened and demoralized that the Communist elements within them might easily stampede them into quick agreement and surrender. Such a development would have left the United States the sole remaining citadel of democracy and freedom in the world—without friends and without the necessary outside resources with which to wage war. We would have been left a single island surrounded by a sea of communism—and those waves would have soon begun to wash heavily against our shores.

Then, too, I think that those who had this monumental decision to make must have remembered the hundreds of thousands of young men who fought and died on foreign soil in World Wars I and II. They remembered those men who had sacrificed for the ideal of freedom, individual liberty, and lasting peace. Had we—America—not stood firm somewhere along the line in defense of those ideals for which they gave so much, we would have made of their sacrifice a useless, hollow mockery.

And so we made a choice. It was not a happy one, nor will it be a popular one for a long time. It was not an easy decision, but it was a brave decision. For the road over which we must travel is rough and rocky. It has in its make-up many heartaches, many sacrifices, many tragedies. It's too bad that we can't run upstairs and pull the cover over our heads and imagine it's all a bad dream. But in our own self-interest and the interest of our children we can't do that. Our days and nights will be grave and fearful. They will be black and long and bloodstained. None in this great coliseum tonight, none who read or hear these words, will escape the burden which will blanket our Nation. For if we lose we must remember there will be no second try.

Bernard Baruch said that America is in the most critical period of its long and illustrious history. And when we look at the facts we can well understand that statement. In 1940 the democracies had the balance of power. On our side were a strong France, a healthy England, and the great country of China. Today France is militarily prostrate; England is willing but weak; and China with its vast manpower is on the other side.

My friends, we are in a battle for survival and the price of survival will be high. But who is the man who will measure his freedom against his wealth; a human life against dollars and cents; the right to worship God against money? Tonight young men, Florida's young men, are dying in the rice paddies of Korea. This is no talking matter with them. They face the grim horror of enemy bullets and bombs and a life painfully and suddenly ended. They send back to us at home one clear cold message, a message written in grim tears, a message which as Americans we cannot ignore, a message that tells us this is no time for business as usual, pleasure as usual, or politics as usual. It is instead a time for ruthless realism.

We must get ourselves militarily prepared. The Russians have for 5 years been talking in upside down language about peace, while all the time planning for war. Today they have 175 well-equipped divisions against our 6. They have 25 armored divisions as against our 2. They have airplanes that outnumber ours by a ratio of 6 to 1. They have 50,000 tanks against our 6,000. And they have submarines in greater numbers and more deadly than Hitler's. Furthermore, they have stolen from us the secrets of the A-bomb which they now have. Therefore, to survive we must quickly build back our fighting strength which died on the false hopes of a United Nations with a veto, a unification plan, and a program of false economy. We must not only ready ourselves, but we must assist those other countries who will join in this effort with us. We must train the Japanese to defend Japan; we must train Germans to defend Germany.

This military preparation will obviously unbalance our home economy somewhat. It will require sacrifice and a firm resolve, but let's remember those who are doing the fighting. Three weeks ago, with a full realization of the distaste the American people have for governmental regulations, I advocated on the floor of Congress complete mobilization of our industry, manpower, and wealth. There should be no special privilege for any person, any business, or any group in this time of national emergency. We must adopt legislation to take profit out of war. Some men should not be permitted to grow rich out of the bloodshed of others. It seems inexcusably selfish and shortsighted for certain concerns to raise prices at this time, regardless of the reason or excuse, knowing full well that in sneaking a little extra profit now, they injure many others and bring rationing and controls for all.

I believe the time has come when we must give serious, dispassionate consideration to those admitted Communists and fellow travelers here at home. It doesn't make sense to be fighting Communists 5,000 miles away while permitting those here who care nothing for the land of their birth to operate freely. It doesn't make sense to say we will pick them up within 12 hours after Russia strikes if she strikes. That may be too late. It takes a long time to rebuild a defense plant or repair a power unit. An immediate and effective surveillance should be undertaken on all known Communists and confirmed fellow travelers. Sensible laws should be quickly adopted to enable us to defend ourselves from within as well as without.

Such an example of all-out firmness and determination to see this problem through, an example of realistic mobilization on our part could accomplish several things:

First, such a cause presents the only hope at this time for lasting peace. If the mad men of Moscow have not already made up their minds to start the wheels of world war III in motion—then this evidence of our willingness to lay aside our pleasures, and to sacrifice for the survival of our way of life may change their minds. They have heretofore looked upon the United States as a decaying democracy. They have believed we would not fight until it was too late to do so. All-out effort on our part now might impress them, might frighten them, and might dissuade them. If not, if they have already started the little fires leading to the conflagration which will mean world war III, then every effort we make now places us in a better position to meet the hardships which lie ahead.

Secondly, such an example of realistic mobilization on our part will encourage the other countries of Europe and the world to take hope. They will see that they are not to be abandoned to aggression. They will, under our leadership and prodding, begin to ready themselves, realizing that their efforts are joint efforts with ours for the protection of all. And let's never forget that, outnumbered as we are in this present situation, we need them.

All of us here tonight recall vividly with what high hopes we as a Nation subscribed to the purposes of the United Nations Charter. It envisioned for a world wary of war an international organization for peace—an organization fortified with a police force—a force capable of meeting and stopping any and all aggression—a force made up of soldiers from all the countries of the world.

Then we all remember late in the fall of 1945 when the big nations of the world failed to put the full pound of sovereignty into the common pot of peace—and retained the right of veto to all the member countries of the Security Council. In the intervening years we painfully recall some 30 Russian vetoes that have stranged and all but choked the life out of the United Nations.

And yet this past June when freed for just a moment from the stricture of Russian veto, the United Nations blossomed forth and fulfilled a part of the faith that the freemen of the world had in it. Without the obstructionism of the Communists, the United Nations acted quickly and in a manner for which it was set up. It condemned aggression and force, and it rallied some 46 countries to join together in opposing this Communist act of tyranny.

However, Russia soon realized her mistake in abstaining from the United Nations and so last week sent Mr. Jacob Malik back into the Security Council where for two solid weeks he has raped honesty, ravished the truth, and raised the hand of monumental deception and subterfuge. His studied course of obstruction and attack has made it impossible to even set an agenda for the Security Council—and once again the United Nations is sick with Russian stomach cramps.

In view of all this, it may now be the moment for the nations of the free world to consider taking the final step of reshaping the United Nations Organization without the Soviet Union. Many sincere students of world affairs have shied away from this thought, believing that as long as the Soviet Union stayed in the United Nations there was hope for a peaceful solution. But it appears Russia has made up her mind what she wants, and it is not world cooperation for peace, and therefore Russia will continue to use the United Nations only as a sounding-board for her propaganda and to cover up her evil purposes. A reorganized United Nations can still become a vital force for peace.

We have learned that a permanent United Nations Commission empowered to inquire into aggression, threatened or real, direct or indirect, wherever it may be, with the weight of 51 countries behind it, and backed by their joint military might, a force now being born in Korea—such a Commission, such an organization, could well be a great force for peace. We have learned that justice without force is powerless.

When the Communist leadership fully understands that any aggression—direct or indirect—will be met by force, a force supplied by the peace-loving people of the world and a force large enough and strong enough to do the job, then the initiative can be taken away from the Communists and a real peace offensive gotten under way. Already progress has been made along this line. By our action in Korea under the auspices of the United Nations the aggressors of the world are on notice that no longer will peace-loving people stand idly by and permit little people and little countries to be overrun by tyranny and dictatorship.

In addition to building a strong military force for ourselves and assisting other democracies to do likewise, we must go one step further. A quick review of history shows that while military might can win battles and wars, it cannot win the hearts and minds of people, and therefore cannot win lasting peace. The United States has won two world wars, but we have yet to win a lasting peace. We obviously need something in addition to a military machine. Today we must understand that we are fighting to capture not only the bodies of men but the minds of men as well. The vast majority of the people of Europe and Asia are looking for something better than that lot in life to which they were born, or that which they now have. The Communists are exploiting through propaganda all the misery and disappointment that comes to the average Asiatic and European. They have waged a great offensive in this war of ideas and have pretended to supply the answer to a better and fuller life.

They have made many converts all over the world. And we must remember that these converts are fanatic. They do not think of themselves as Americans or Frenchmen or white man or Negro, or rich man or poor man—they think of themselves only as Communists. They recognize no higher law than communism. They recognize no closer kinship than the kinship of Communists. That's why a Communist will sacrifice his brother, his wife or his child for its cause. The Mohammedans of centuries ago were taught that if they died fighting an infidel they would go to a happy hunting ground with everlasting life, and so they lined up to die for Mohammedanism. Today the small-fry Communist has been sold the idea that "comes the revolution" he will get all that he has wanted and that his tormentors of the past will become his slaves. Having such a dream of the future, is there any wonder why he will go to any extreme to attain it? Well, we in America know that that philosophy is so much hogwash. We know that every tyrant who has come to power did so by building a military machine based on a trick philosophy of helping the little man, and we know that once he came to power, he exploited and abused the little man with more cruelty and brutality than ever before.

Because we are the most literate nation in the world we know that human society doesn't work the Communist way. We know that where men are free to govern themselves, they achieve more happiness, more worldly goods and more freedom than under any other system of government. We know all this, but millions of people don't know it—and they are the millions that the Communists are trying to take over so as to turn them against us.

I'm chairman of a subcommittee which is now looking into what we as a nation are doing to sell the advantages of democracy over communism to the bewildered people of the world. We've discovered that the Russians are spending more money and making more effort to sell communism in the city of Berlin alone than we are spending in selling democracy all over Europe. The Russians, as nearly as it can be estimated, are spending about 15 times as much money, using 15 times more men and effort in selling communism. Britain spends 50 percent more of its income attempting to win the minds of men to the cause of freedom than we do. As the greatest salesmen in the world we have sold everything but ourselves, our system of government, our democracy. Well, the time has now arrived when we must take the offensive in this propaganda war to win people's minds. The time has come to lop 35,000 persons off the rolls of existing Government agencies and put them into programs selling America. Like the disciples of old, we must make the masses see that underlying all the shooting, all the propaganda, all the maneuvering, there is a basic battle: Christianity versus paganism, spiritualism versus materialism, freedom versus slavery. We must convince them that free men under God are better off than slave men under Stalin.

America stands in peril today. It's a battle for our survival. The price of survival is high, and the question is, will we pay the price in sweat and tears and sacrifice? In traveling around the State in recent weeks, I have found hope in the attitude of the American people, for I find in them that irrepressible American spirit which is willing to accept the challenge, believing as we do in freedom and democracy.

Holifield Asks Expulsion of Soviet Russia From the United Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHET HOLIFIELD
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, American soldiers, sailors, and marines are fighting today in Korea as an American unit of the United Nations.

We are proud that our military action to repel the aggressor in that battle-torn land has the overwhelming support of the free nations of the world. We rejoice in the clear and decisive stand taken not only by the United States, but by the United Nations. The flag of the United Nations flies side by side with our own. General MacArthur commands not only our own military forces but those contributed by other members of the United Nations.

Let us be frank to recognize, however, that only a curious twist of circumstance has made possible this collective action of the United Nations to repel aggression in Korea. The Soviet member of the United Nations Security Council has been absent from his Council seat for several months. Had he been present, the Soviet veto would have prevented the Security Council from taking positive action in Korea. We would have been in there fighting alone, convinced of the rightness of our cause, but lacking the moral support and prestige that stems from the collective judgment of the free nations of the world.

This twist of circumstance which removed the Soviet obstruction worked in our favor. We cannot expect such a circumstance to continue. The Soviet delegate resumed his seat on the Security Council August 1. He assumed the presidency of the Council as of that date. Under the alphabetical rotation system designating the presidency, Mr. Malik was entitled to claim this office August 1.

It must be recalled that Mr. Malik walked out of the Council on January of this year because the Council refused to unseat the delegate from Nationalist China, Dr. Tsiang. At that time, Mr. Malik stated that the U. S. S. R. would boycott the Security Council until Dr. Tsiang was removed. Dr. Tsiang still retains his seat in the Security Council, so we must expore the reason for this change of Soviet policy which they claimed involved a vital principle.

Almost since the establishment of the United Nations, the U. S. S. R. has harassed and blocked the function of the Security Council by arbitrary use of the veto. In almost every major policy decision, the U. S. S. R. found its one vote arrayed against the other four votes of the permanent members of the Security Council. By this single-member veto, the U. S. S. R. had created a complete state of frustration in the United Nations.

Mr. Speaker, the wisdom of hindsight is useful only as it points the way to wise actions in the future. For several years, thoughtful observers have anticipated the problem before us today and have emphasized the need to modify the veto privilege which allows the Soviet Union to make a shambles of the United Nations.

In July 1947 I introduced House Concurrent Resolution 116 of the Eightieth Congress, requesting the President to use his initiative in calling a general conference of the United Nations to consider amendment to the Charter of that body. Among other things, that resolution pointed to the necessity of establishing, without delay, an international police force as originally contemplated by the United Nations Charter, and of eliminating the veto provision of the Charter.

At the same time, in July 1947, I introduced House Concurrent Resolution 117, which would have served notice to the world of our willingness to waive the right of veto at such time as other nations relinquished the same right.

In May of 1948, I introduced House Concurrent Resolution 194 which restated, in more comprehensive terms, the urgency of amending the United Nations Charter to make it a working instrument of world peace. In calling again for the establishment of a world police force and the elimination of the veto, I recognized full well the likelihood that Soviet Russia would not approve such revisions of the Charter, and therefore my resolution proposed in that event that like-minded nations, without the participation of the abstaining states, proceed to establish a more effective international organization for mutual defense on the basis of the revised United Nations Charter.

I regret to say that no action was taken by the Congress on these resolutions. Had we, in those days, addressed ourselves earnestly to ways and means of improving the United Nations and of giving it the military arm to put down aggression, our task in Korea today might not have been so difficult and so costly in terms of human lives.

In embryo, my resolution of May 1948 contemplated a possible United Nations Organization without Soviet Russia—a situation that we are compelled, by the brute force of events, to consider seriously today.

We must remember that the recent prompt and decisive action of the Security Council in, first, condemning the aggression of the North Korean Government; and, second, calling on the member nations to mobilize military aid for the South Korean Republic was made possible only because the Soviet delegate had voluntarily absented himself and was not present to veto the Council's actions. No responsible person would doubt for a minute that the veto would have been used against Korean intervention had Mr. Malik been present.

So we must conclude that the action of the Security Council came about only because of a fortuitous, a wholly accidental situation in the Security Council. With the flip-flop in Soviet policy evidenced by Mr. Malik's return, will the Security Council now fall back into the state of frustration and impotence previously experienced under the threat and use of the single member veto?

The answer is "Yes."

What will this mean in terms of future Security Council action on developments in Korea?

What will it mean if aggressive military action starts against Formosa, Iran, Yugoslavia, or west Germany?

Only a foolish man would predict that the Soviet would refrain from using the veto to block United Nations' action to resist aggression.

Some may think that the General Assembly could be called upon to fulfill the duties of suppression of breaches of the peace in case of U. S. S. R. veto in the Security Council. I do not believe such an argument can be sustained in the light of Charter provisions and limitations. Such provisions assign to the General Assembly the duties of hearings, recommendations, and investigations only; and even in this field the Assembly is limited from taking action on certain matters which have been considered by the Council.

We therefore must come reluctantly to the conclusion that in the field of military action by the UN to suppress breaches of the peace, the single member veto of a permanent member of the Security Council can prevent the United Nations from taking action, such as it did recently in Korea.

The potential danger of further aggressive action is clear. Intervention in behalf of world peace by the United Nations may be impossible without the acquiescence of the U. S. S. R.

What is the answer to this dilemma? Amending the United Nations Charter to eliminate the veto could itself be defeated by a Soviet veto. If this be true, and I believe it is, we must find a way to preserve the peace of the world by the cooperative action of 85 percent of the United Nations members who have consistently tried to live up to the principles and purposes of the Charter.

Two methods of achieving the goal of a continuous and successfully functioning international organization seem indicated:

First. The formation of a new international organization with all of the provisions of the present Charter except the single-member veto provisions; the Soviet Union and its satellites would remain outside this new organization unless and until they were prepared to accept its terms; and Second. The expulsion of the Soviet Union from the present United Nations and the subsequent elimination of the veto provision by amendment.

The first proposal, in my opinion, is possible and may be highly desirable as an alternative to continued frustration in the immediate and dangerous future. A conference of delegates of the member nations, as requested in my resolution, could have prepared the way for such action.

The second proposal stems from the fact that Article 6 of the present UN Charter provides that a member of the United Nations which has consistently violated the principles of the United Nations Charter may be expelled from the organization by the General Assembly, upon the recommendation of the Security Council.

The record is replete with Soviet violations of the principles and purposes of the UN Charter, and it has been fully documented by our State Department.

We regard the action of the Security Council on the Korean intervention as being valid in view of Russia's willful absence from the Council and in view of Article 28, which provides that the Security Council shall be continuous in its operation.

I therefore urge that in the same way action was taken on the Korean matter, the Security Council should take action to expel the Soviets the first time that they willfully absent themselves from the Council's deliberations. The working members of the Council can recommend to the General Assembly that Soviet Russia be expelled as a persistent violator of the principles of the UN Charter. I have no doubt that the necessary two-thirds of the voting members of the General Assembly would support this recommendation for Soviet expulsion.

No individual has the right to endanger the common society in which he lives, and no nation has the right to expose the citizens of every nation in the world to the horrors of a world war III.

Time and events have clearly shown that the U. S. S. R. has refused to cooperate in the spirit which was envisaged by the UN Charter. She has refused to adapt or modify her relations to the procedures and practices of the great majority of the member nations.

In the Security Council and the General Assembly, Soviet Russia has pursued guerrilla parliamentary tactics. She has tried to cripple, not cure, every important world problem. She has refused to participate and cooperate with the auxiliary agencies and commissions designed to solve social and economic problems which prevent the easier interchange of goods, knowledge, and ideals.

The Soviet Government has trained and encouraged through diplomacy, economics, and armaments, the Communist forces throughout Europe and Asia. Behind the front of invective against free nations and peace propaganda to the credulous, she has established herself as the great pariah outside the family of nations.

We have not isolated her; she has built her own wall of isolation, not only by dropping the iron curtain at the outside border of every Soviet satellite but by showing at every contact point with the free nations in the United Nations, that the ideological iron curtain is more real than the national border iron curtain.

I therefore call for a realistic reevaluation of our attempts to solve the age-long problem of international peace.

The one world ideal has been murdered by deliberate Soviet design. Let us stop now following the beautiful but shattered dream of one world harmony and build that which is still possible, a functioning, international organization of free nations and free peoples dedicated to pool our collective strength to attain the strongest and safest position possible in this dangerous atomic age.

That Children May Live

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD M. SIMPSON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESEN' ATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial which appears in the New York Times today, August 30, 1950:

THAT CHILDREN MAY LIVE

The number of times within the past few years that near-knockout blows have been dealt to the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund approaches the fantastic. The record of this agency is one of the proudest and most heroic in UN's—and United States—annals. Since the end of the Second World War, the Children's Fund, with strong American support, has gone into the far-flung corners of the world with food, milk, and cod-liver oil for children on the ba's of need. It has sponsored, with American approval, medical and antituberculosis programs which averted epidemics in critical areas. It has done all this while desperately short of contributions from governments who praised its efforts and achievements to the skies and defaulted on the hard cash that made broader programs possible. Periodically, it has been forced to go, hat in hand as it were, to governments to match the American contributions in order that American funds might be released.

Because of this matching formula—which many have believed hindered the operations of the Fund—$25,000,000 of American money authorized last year but never appropriated was lost to the fund. Several months ago a new authorization of $12,500,000 was voted for the fund, but never acted on. Yet so certain was this Government of support for the fund that only 2 weeks ago, when the Economic and Social Council met in Geneva, the United States delegation cosponsored a resolution making the fund a permanent UN agency for the continuing needs of children.

Now, in one callous action, both the House and Senate have struck the entire $12,500,000 from the omnibus appropriations bill. It is, of course, unthinkable that the Children's Fund should be written off in this way.

Surely Congress cannot deprive the refugee children of Korea of supplies that the Children's Fund has been rushing in. Surely it cannot end its life-sustaining programs in the Middle East, in Greece, in Yugoslavia, in Italy, where millions of children depend crucially—in some cases wholly—on Children's Fund help. In honor and in pure humanity we are called upon to continue this aid to millions of innocent, unfortunate and helpless children the whole world over.

Gen. Douglas MacArthur

HON. ANDREW JACOBS
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, Henry Wallace was properly repudiated when, as Secretary of Commerce in 1946, he publicly disagreed on foreign policy with Secretary of State James Byrnes.

There were cries of censorship by those who agreed with Wallace, even as today those who idolize MacArthur cry censorship.

Why? Because General MacArthur is addressing himself to political rather than military matters. It is a known fact that the General has for many years aspired to the Presidency by even permitting himself to be voted upon while he remained abroad and retained his commission as a high general. And this despite the fact that the founding fathers provided no man shall be eligible to the presidency "who shall not have been 14 years a resident within the United States."

I do not seek to detract from General MacArthur as a soldier. However, it would be well for him to capture for himself the spirit of General Sherman thusly expressed:

I will not accept if nominated, and will not serve if elected.

It was widely understood that General Sherman was unyielding in his viewpoint that the military should not interfere with the civil government. He thus carried that viewpoint to the personal extreme that he would disdain the honors of civil office.

History records how Gen. John C. Fremont tried, during the Civil War, to exercise the Presidential prerogatives by issuing an emancipation proclamation, which President Lincoln promptly and properly repudiated.

In a learned work entitled "A History of the Great War," Mr. Cruttwell has this to say:

The dividing line between politics and strategy in history has always been blurred. * * * Ministers were apt to find themselves at the mercy of the idols which they had created. * * * In Germany the Centre Party of the Reichstag actually went so far as to pass a formal resolution calling upon the Chancelor to be guided principally in the conduct of the war by the views of the general staff (October 1916).

And, incidentally, history records that Mr. Lincoln was confronted with the same presumptuous conduct by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. Cruttwell continues:

Even in France and Great Britain, where ministers held the reins with a far firmer hand, we have seen how great was their difficulty in controlling or dismissing generals in whom they had lost confidence earlier than the public.

This morning's Washington Post has an excellent editorial upon this subject though, unfortunately, it does not delve into the historical experience. It is the teachings of the past that make it imperative that the military perform its function in executing the task assigned to it by the civilian government, and not attempt to dictate to, nor embarrass, that government.

Stockpiling of Critical Minerals and Metals

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK OF ARIZONA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, having just obtained permission to extend my remarks and include an item from the Washington Post for August 30, 1950, entitled "Precious War Metals," by Marquis Childs, I want to make a brief introductory statement of my own. I feel that this timely statement is quite important, and it sums up my thinking on the subject.

In a brief space it would be impossible to indicate what the House Committee on Mines and Mining has done and has attempted to do toward stockpiling of critical and strategic minerals and metals during the past 14 years, but there have been many efforts, and I had some part in those efforts, beginning with my first term in Congress.

On May 18, 1937, when the Faddis bill was before the Military Affairs Committee, I appeared as a witness, suggesting an amendment in the interest of the buy-American provision. At that time I felt that we could not hope to get anything from abroad in the way of manganese and the like in payment of war debts, and I so stated. That particular bill was amended, but even so I felt then—and I still feel—that far too little has been done to promote domestic mining. To keep the record straight, I would like to quote three paragraphs from my statement before the House Military Affairs Committee on May 18, 1937, as follows:

[Excerpt from hearing before the Committee on Military Affairs, May 18, 1937]

My impression is that manganese is found in Russia, in Brazil, and certain other countries, but in those two particularly. I cannot understand, gentlemen, how we could get much from Brazil in payment of the world war debt; nor can I understand how we could get much manganese from Russia in payment of a world war debt. The Czar's government obtained a lot of money from us during the world war, but that government has gone to oblivion and the debt has been repudiated. I think we could not get anything from the present Soviet Government, manganese, or what not, in payment of that debt.

I am opposed, gentlemen, to having this country depend on foreign countries for these necessary materials, especially when we have them in such abundant supplies right here in our own country—the testimony in these hearings to the contrary notwithstanding. In several Western States, including my own State of Arizona, there are known deposits of manganese, such as at Artillery Peak, in Mohave County. I mention that particularly. All around the neighborhood of Boulder Dam there are deposits. I believe it is estimated there are 60,000,000 tons of manganese in sight at Artillery Peak, in Mohave County, Ariz. It may be actually twice that amount. That would be about one hundred and ninety-some-odd miles from Boulder Dam, about 25 miles east of the Colorado River, and perhaps within 5 miles of the Bill Williams River and within less than 30 miles of a railroad. It is easily reached by highway and automobile roads. This is rather high-grade, fairly high-grade manganese. * * *

I want to call your attention to this fact, that Boulder Dam is now finished and producing power. Eighteen percent of this electric power has been assigned to Arizona and 18 percent to Nevada. New processes have been developed whereby low-grade manganese can be prepared for the market by the electrolytic process, and it seems to me the sheerest folly to depend upon a foreign supply when there is so much available in our own country. * * *

The article by Marquis Childs is as follows:

[From the Washington Post of August 30, 1950]

PRECIOUS WAR METALS—DOMESTIC MANGANESE IS VITAL

(By Marquis Childs)

There is one precious metal of which America has an overflowing store. In the vaults at Fort Knox, Ky., gold bars are piled rank on rank, probably the greatest treasure in the history of mankind.

But gold is a soft metal. It cannot be used in airplane motors, to line gun barrels or to harden steel. The metals for these purposes are manganese, chrome, vanadium, tungsten. These precious metals are in tragic deficiency in the so-called stockpiles ordered to be built up 4 years ago.

Manganese may well be the most vital of these minerals since it must go into every scrap of steel that is made. In this space recently was a dicussion of the difficulties encountered by engineer-promoters seeking to develop domestic sources of manganese ore. Virtually all of America's manganese has been imported from Russia, Africa, Brazil, and India.

As a result of that column a worried stockholder of the United States Steel Corp. wrote a letter of inquiry to Irving S. Olds, chairman of the board. Mr. Olds has been kind enough to send me a copy of his reply. In it he says:

"Everyone connected with the American steel industry would be delighted to see developed any worthwhile manganese ore deposits in this country, which are capable of being developed in a sound and economic manner. Heretofore, most of the few known manganese ore deposits in the United States have been of such low quality, or of such small tonnage, as not to be capable of producing manganese ore in competition with better manganese ore obtainable from abroad.

"I have no personal knowledge about the extent of the stockpile of manganese ore which may have been built up by the Government. We have on hand in United States Steel a satisfactory supply for our own immediate use. But this does not mean that we are not vitally concerned with the maintenance, both by the Government and by industry, of an adequate supply of good manganese ore for the future."

In March of 1948, R. M. Lloyd, assistant to the vice president of the United States

Steel Corp., testified before a House committee as to the company's position on manganese. Summing up, he said:

"At this time, because of the current high rate of demand for manganese, substantially all available domestic production and importations are required for consumption and, consequently, any large quantity of ore to be used for stockpiling necessarily must come from other than present sources. Such supplementary sources, if they could be developed to some extent domestically, would provide stockpile tonnages, and result at the same time in approaching domestic self-sufficiency with regard to manganese in the United States for the long-range future."

In other words, there was no available manganese for stockpiles. It was all going into the steel being fabricated for automobiles and washing machines. Domestic consumption of steel went to new high levels in the all-out boom this year, so that there would have been even less manganese available than at the time of Lloyd's testimony.

New mining and processing developments were not encouraged. They appear in some instances to have been deliberately discouraged.

Alexander C. Barker, then vice president and director of H. A. Brassert & Co., for over 50 years consulting engineers to the iron and steel industry, outlined before a congressional committee a plan to develop an electrolytic process to produce manganese from low grade ores. The company had private capital for the development. They were only asking that stockpiling authorities agree to buy a part of the output. They got nowhere and the project was abandoned.

Other independent promoters and developers, some with a long record of experience, have had the same kind of frustrating response from Government. Certain of these independents believe one reason is the pressure of business-as-usual from the big companies that dominate supplies of critical metals. Chairman Olds says this is not true that in fact "there have been numerous discussions for many months past between men in the steel industry, and representatives in the Government, about the need for the development of new or increased supplies of manganese ores from sources other than Russia, especially as there are no known deposits of high grade manganese ore in the United States of any considerable size which do not require beneficiation."

If there were differences between the independents and the big companies over this question in the past, they should be ended. All sections of the industry must work with the Government, which must be stirred out of its lethargy and incompetence to obtain the metal far more precious than gold.

Report on My Efforts To Amend the Railroad Retirement Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, with the Eighty-first Congress scheduled for early adjournment I want to express my keen disappointment over the fact that no action has been taken with respect to increasing benefits and liberalizing the provisions of the Railroad Retirement Act.

Since the Eighty-first Congress convened in January of 1949, I have constantly been active in trying to get action not only on the 2 bills I introduced but on the 45 bills sponsored by other Members of Congress. At no time have I limited my efforts to my own bills but I endeavored to obtain general hearings on the subject of liberalizing the Railroad Retirement Act.

In addition to introducing legislation and talking to Chairman CROSSER and members of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I have been in touch with members of the Railroad Retirement Board, representatives of the railway brotherhoods and the A. F. of L. and the CIO.

The purpose of my contacting the Railroad Retirement Board and labor organizations was to, not only keep abreast of developments, but to encourage them to assist me in securing congressional action.

Mr. Speaker, I assure you that I have left no stone unturned in my efforts to get action on the Railroad Retirement Act because I live in a railroad community and I know the retired railroader or his widow is suffering because of the high cost of living.

In addition, those who are still actively employed are also anxious that the Railroad Retirement Act be liberalized. In view of the recent action of Congress in liberalizing social-security benefits, it is difficult to explain why Congress has not taken similar action with respect to the Railroad Retirement Act.

Mr. Speaker, there is not a Member of Congress who has been more diligent than I have been in trying to obtain action on railroad-retirement legislation. For an illustration, shortly after the Eighty-first Congress convened in January 1949 I contacted Chairman William J. Kennedy, of the Railroad Retirement Board, as well as representatives of the railway brotherhoods, regarding legislation I drafted to increase present benefits, reduce the age limit and years of service, and aid the widows by liberalizing the provisions of the Railroad Retirement Act.

While some changes were suggested in my proposed bill, I was definitely informed from the very beginning that I was wasting time and that the railroad-retirement fund would not stand any liberalization of benefits.

Regardless of this attitude on the part of the Railroad Retirement Board, the chairman of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the railway brotherhoods, on February 21, 1949, I introduced H. R. 2898, a bill designed to provide for a 20-percent increase in survivor annuities and lump sums payable under the Railroad Retirement Act.

After introducing H. R. 2398, I was informed that the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce would give no consideration to any amendments of the Railroad Retirement Act until a Board of Actuaries, studying the financial structure of the railroad retirement fund, made its report.

During the spring of 1949 I was in touch with the late Mr. A. F. Whitney, president of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, and, after his death, with his successor, president W. P. Kennedy. As the result of an exchange of views, the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen agreed with me that the Railroad Retirement Act should be liberalized, and we continued to exchange correspondence regarding a bill I had drafted to provide a 20-percent increase in present benefits.

On July 28, 1949, Mr. John F. Collins, administrative assistant to Chairman W. J. Kennedy, of the Railroad Retirement Board, informed me by letter that—

> An actuarial study of the railroad retirement account is now under way in accordance with section 15 (d) of the Railroad Retirement Act. The report on this study will not be completed for several months.

Upon receipt of this information I conferred with Chairman ROBERT CROSSER, of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which has jurisdiction over all legislation pertaining to the Railroad Retirement Act. Chairman CROSSER informed me that the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce would take no action until the board of actuaries had completed its study.

On September 27, 1949, I asked Chairman William J. Kennedy, of the Railroad Retirement Board, for an estimate of the cost of my bill, H. R. 2898, and also the cost of the several proposed bills that I had drafted and which I was about to introduce in Congress.

When I experienced a delay in obtaining a reply to my request, I contacted the Washington office of the Railroad Retirement Board, and as a result Chairman Kennedy, accompanied by a representative of the Railway Labor Executives' Association, called in person at my Washington office. They told me it would be unwise for Congress to take any legislative action at that time and that we should wait until the board of actuaries submitted its report. It was not until late January 1950 that the report was made available to Congress.

After studying the actuarial report, I found myself faced with the fact that it stated:

> Under the present method of financing, no major increase in present benefits is possible without an increase in payroll-tax rates.

Upon completion of my study of the Actuarial Report, I conferred again with representatives of the railway brotherhoods and with Chairman ROBERT CROSSER, of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, only to be informed that no legislation would be considered because the railroad retirement fund could not stand the expense. It was suggested that I should wait until after the Social Security Act was amended, but I replied that I failed to see what effect that would have on the question of amending the Railroad Retirement Act.

In early March of 1950, I again approached the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen and was informed that a liberalization of the Railroad Retirement Act including a slight increase in benefits was possible without increasing the payroll tax. Therefore, on March 13, 1950, I introduced H. R. 7671 to increase the annuities paid to retired employees by providing an increase of $15 monthly to retired employees and widows.

When I contacted Chairman CROSSER, of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and requested hearings on H. R. 7671, he informed me there was still no plans for hearings on railroad retirement legislation during this session of Congress. He repeated the assertion of the Board of Actuaries that liberalization of the Railroad Retirement Act was impossible unless payroll taxes were increased. From March 15, 1950, to June 30, 1950, I made repeated requests by letter and in person for action on railroad retirement legislation. My efforts include an exchange of correspondence with the Railroad Retirement Board, railway brotherhoods, and Chairman ROBERT CROSSER, of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with whom I had talked on numerous occasions. As a matter of fact, I had talked so often to Chairman CROSSER and members of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that their patience with me had reached the breaking point.

Yet, on June 30, 1950, when I realized that liberalization of the Social Security Act was about to become a reality, I launched a determined effort to secure action on railroad retirement legislation since I realized Congress would adjourn in early September and there was little time left to obtain any action.

Between June 30 and July 12, 1950, I wrote personal letters to not only chairman ROBERT CROSSER, but to every member of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. In addition, I wrote to the following persons requesting their assistance and the aid of their organizations in my effort to secure action on railroad retirement legislation.

W. P. Kennedy, president, Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen.

A. E. Lyon, executive secretary, Railway Labor Executive Association.

John Corbett, national legislative representative, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.

William Green, president, American Federation of Labor.

Robert Walkinshaw, regional director, United Railroad Workers of America, Altoona, Pa.

Philip Murray, president, CIO.

Elton J. Layton, chief clerk of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Finally, on August 23, 1950, I wrote to Chairman CROSSER again pointing out that since social-security benefits are being liberalized, it would be difficult to explain to the retired railroader or his widow why benefits under the Railroad Retirement Act have not been increased.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat again that I have diligently sought action on amendments that would increase benefits and liberalize the provisions of the Railroad Retirement Act.

I think that any fair-minded person will admit that it is easy to make glittering promises about amending the Railroad Retirement Act, but it is a mark of insincerity to do so when you realize the difficulty of getting congressional action even on the reasonable provisions contained in the amendments that I sponsored.

My purpose in speaking to you on the subject is to point out the sincere efforts I have made to amend the Railroad Retirement Act and to convince recipients of railroad retirement benefits that we face a difficult task in obtaining congressional action on such legislation and that no amount of demagoguery can hide that fact.

Laboring Men Are Tired of Being Kidded

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, since the CIO officials and some other labor bosses have put the success of the Democratic Party first and the interest of labor they are supposed to represent second, it is time that labor understands just what they are doing.

They support every measure the administration wants whether or not it is in the interest of labor. They then tell you that those who oppose the administration's program voted against labor. They made the charge some months ago that I voted 12 times against labor in the first session of the Eighty-first Congress. There was not a word of truth in what they said. They will later make the same sort of charge against my record in this Congress. Again, they will not state the truth.

I have not in this Congress or the last Congress supported legislation that would be unfair and unjust to labor. I have voted favorably on many bills seeking to be helpful to labor.

It is about time the clear-thinking Democrats in the ranks of labor, and it is about time the Republicans in the ranks of labor resent being kidded and used as a political cat's-paw to gratify the ego of the labor bosses here in Washington who are attempting to deliver your votes to this administration.

I shall analyze a few of the charges made against me by the CIO to show just how silly and false they are.

Their deception starts with listing in the CIO News magazine on January 2, 12 bills when, in fact, only 3 affect labor. They know that by charging I voted 12 times against labor it will sound much more than 3 times. In fact, my vote on these 3 bills was in the best interest of labor. They were just 100 percent wrong, as I will explain by analyzing each bill.

First, I will explain the nine bills they threw in to make my record look bad. This will expose their deception.

1. MILITARY AID PROGRAM

I voted against giving $1,500,000,000 in aid to the European countries because I thought it was entirely too much. Certainly that was not a labor bill. They list that vote as wrong. Is it wrong to try to protect you as a taxpayer? They have to take a part of that money out of your pocket.

2. ADDITIONAL ECA FUNDS

It was proposed in this bill to give over $4,500,000,000 in Marshall plan funds to European countries. An amendment was offered to reduce it by $150,000,000. I voted to save this $150,000,000. It would have saved some taxes for labor and everyone else; yet, it was not a labor bill. To prove I was right ECA had over $150,000,000 left over at the end of the year.

3. TRADE AGREEMENTS

This bill gave the President the power to further reduce import duties or tariffs and increase the flood of foreign-made goods into this country that to date has thrown hundreds of thousands of men and women out of jobs.

I voted against lowering these tariffs to protect the workers of our country. They say that vote was against labor. Do you agree that it was? Of course, you do not.

Let me give you one of hundreds of instances where men are thrown out of work by these heavy imports.

The Waltham Watch Co. of Massachusetts closed down and 3,000 watch workers lost their jobs. The international president of the union pleaded with the Congress and President Truman to raise the import duty on watches pointing out that with cheaper labor Switzerland is now furnishing 85 percent of watches sold in the United States. Over 100,000 glass and pottery workers in Ohio are now out of employment for the same reason; thousands of men in glass and other industries in West Virginia are now losing their jobs because of this flood of imports. Shoe and oil workers in my district, and all over the Nation are urging us to try to raise the import, or tariff duties because they are losing their jobs.

I have a letter from Earl W. Jimerson, president of the Amalgamated Meat Cutters of Chicago, stating that millions of pounds of imported meat are reaching our country for sale from Poland which is now behind the iron curtain. He says:

> Our international executive board representing 200,000 meat packing employees recently went on record to support Senate bill 3055 introduced by Senator GILLETTE. We will appreciate your support of this measure when it reaches the House.

This is to increase tariff duties, which I tried to do. Yet the CIO says my vote was against labor.

4. RULES COMMITTEE CHANGES

This bill has nothing to do with labor, except when they changed the rules in the Eighty-first Congress it made possible the passage of unnecessary legislation increasing the cost of Government over $500,000,000 each year which adds to the taxes labor and all of us must pay.

5. NATURAL GAS ACT

It is a silly deception to list this as a labor bill.

This bill had the backing of the administration and the sanction of the President. If it had not been agreeable to him, his leaders in the House and in the Senate, namely Senator LUCAS, Speaker RAYBURN, and Congressman MCCORMACK, who always confer with the President on what bills shall come before the Congress, it would never have been offered in the Senate, or the House. It was passed also in the Senate.

Congressman RAYBURN spoke for the bill and pointed out that it would not raise the price of gas 1 cent to anyone in the Nation. And it will not. This was not a labor bill. The CIO leaders later got the President to favor them with a political veto.

6. ANTIMONOPOLY—CELLER BILL

This bill has nothing whatsoever to do with labor. It is not really worth explaining.

7. HOUSING—REES AMENDMENT

This was a public-housing bill, to put the Federal Government into the building of houses and the renting of them to the low-income group at what they could afford to pay in rent. The balance of their rent to be paid out of the Federal Treasury, taxing all of the other people of the Nation to help pay a part of their rent bill.

The bill will cost the Government probably $15,000,000,000. I voted against it. Again, this is not a labor bill but it will cost the laboring man and everybody who has built their own homes and are now having to pay heavy taxes, to be taxed a little more to help pay the rent of those who are only paying a part of the rent they should pay. I think you will agree I voted right.

8. RENT CONTROL—WILLIAMS AMENDMENT

Representative WILLIAMS offered an amendment to permit local government units, cities, counties, States to decontrol rents in their own communities. It would seem the local people should have a chance to run their own business rather than leave it up to bureaucrats here in Washington. The bill passed a few weeks ago, voted for by all of the labor crowd in the House, contains that same provision. Yet they say my vote was wrong.

Real labor bills. Now I will take up the three bills in which labor is justly interested.

1. SOCIAL SECURITY—RECOMMITAL MOTION

In considering the social-security bill in the House, I voted to recommit the bill and bring it back in such form that it would increase social-security payments for those in the lower wage brackets earning up to $3,000. These increases were in the interest of labor and the Senate bill has recently made such increases proving I was right. I then voted for the social-security bill.

They bring in this recommital vote, hoping to deceive you into believing I voted against social security when, in fact, I voted for and spoke in favor of the bill on the final House passage.

In this second session of Congress, when the Senate and House agreed upon a social-security bill that would increase social-security benefits from 50 to 85 percent which is regarded as the finest piece of social-security legislation ever offered, I spoke and voted for the passage of this legislation. Yet, these political top labor leaders will tell you that I did not support the passage of this fine piece of social-security legislation.

2. MINIMUM WAGE—LUCAS BILL

I voted for the Lucas, of Texas, amendment, the purpose of which was to more clearly define the law as to who should come under the act. I then voted for the 75-cent minimum wage law that is now on the statute books, yet, they say my vote was wrong. In other words, in their report, they would have you believe that I voted against minimum wage and social security when, in fact, I supported both bills and spoke in favor of them. They just do not tell you the truth.

3. THE WOOD BILL

In discussing the Wood bill or the Taft-Hartley Act, I should like to point out that when the Taft-Hartley law was written all railway workers were exempted from any control by this law. The railway men were exempted because they work under the Railway Labor Act. The proposed Wood bill granted them the same exemption.

In an attempt to meet the objections of labor to the Taft-Hartley bill so far as we could and yet write a sound bill fair for labor, business, and everyone, we wrote the Wood bill. In the Taft-Hartley bill, after a 2-year trial, we found that in 20 instances we could amend the law as requested by labor.

We did this and wrote a fair and just bill which could not fail to be acceptable to the rank and file of labor, and to business as well.

The big labor bosses and the President, who wanted to keep the Taft-Hartley law on the statute books to use in this campaign, realized if the Wood bill was passed, we Republicans, aided by a few Democrats in the House, would get credit for writing an acceptable new bill and settling this question. They knew that it would swing a big labor vote our way with the election of a Republican Congress this November if they were unable to defeat our efforts.

After 3 days of intense pressure led by the President, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, Boyle, and by the big labor leaders who were playing the game with them, they were able to recommit the bill by only three votes.

They refused to bring another bill out of the committee. The administration and the big labor bosses kept the Taft-Hartley bill on the statute books. They did not want it repealed. They prevented the great rank and file of labor from having a better bill.

They wanted to keep this bill as a bug-a-boo so they could call upon the laboring men to kick millions into the campaign. They wanted more millions from the pockets of labor.

Mr. Speaker, the gradual increase in employment, higher wages, better contracts for the working men and the prosperity of labor which has come about during the past 3 years is proof that has finally convinced the laboring men and women that they are in better shape today than ever before.

It has proved to them that the big labor bosses, for political purposes, have been attempting to deceive the rank and file of labor throughout this time when they have assailed the Taft-Hartley Act, and other labor legislation as measures that would enslave labor.

Walter Reuther, president of the United Auto Workers, bargaining across the table under the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act with the great General Motors Corp., and without any strike or serious threat of strike, under this law, a few weeks ago signed a contract with General Motors giving greater benefits to the laboring men than any contract in the history of this country or the world.

Mr. Reuther, when the contract was signed, said:

The total gains for the workers during the life of this agreement would exceed $1,000,000,000, and in the fifth year alone will add $700 to the income of the average General Motors worker's family.

Mr. Reuther said:

It was a historic agreement regarded by the union as the most significant development in labor relations since the mass production industries were organized in 1936 and 1937.

Mr. Speaker, there is but one instance of hundreds of contracts written between labor and management during the past 3 years, every one of which is a better contract than they have ever been able to obtain in the past. It belies the false charges of the labor bosses.

What the laboring man and all of us need now is to stop this inflation and reduce the high cost of living. To do that we need a new administration in Washington that will quit deliberately feeding the fires of inflation and driving the cost of living higher, through the waste and reckless unnecessary spending of the taxpayers' money that is and has been the policy of this administration.

They have spent billions of dollars more than they have taken in every year. This is extremely inflationary and works a hardship on the laboring men and women and on all the people.

I have fought against increasing taxes on the laboring men and all of our people and wasting their money to the tune of billions of dollars a year.

If enough of the Members of Congress would vote as I do, to quit wasting the taxpayers' money, we could stop increasing the Federal debt and reduce the cost of living. That is a wage rise that will really do labor some good.

World Peace Without Honor?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY J. DAVENPORT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following articles from the Sun Coast News of August 16, 1950:

WORLD PEACE WITHOUT HONOR?

The people of the United States, looking on at this war that has begun in Korea, appear to view it with about equal parts of fury, incredulity, confusion, and frustration. It's a war we don't want and have tried in every way to avoid. Two world wars would seem to be enough. Now we have a third.

But we do have it, and unless we win it we shall lose it—and if we lose it the earth, including the United States, will be governed from Moscow. The worst thing we can do at this moment is to take it for granted that we shall win. We can win only if we use our heads and hold nothing back, for the Russians have the jump on us. They are so confident that they hope not to have to fight us at all, but to run us ragged with minor engagements fought by stooges all around their periphery till we are worn out and can put up only guerilla resistance when taken over.

Part of our confusion and frustration are caused by the fact that we have never been in a war like this one. This is not the first time our forces have been mauled at the beginning, but it is the first time when our enemies looked forward with confidence to the long pull. If we let it go that way, this war may last the rest of our lives, even the lives of those who are young. Russia counts on growing constantly stronger during the next 30 years. If we are harried by minor campaigns all over the world our economy and our morale are going to be subjected to such strains as they have never known. We shall have to put on stringent controls and we are going to have to do without a lot of the things we've been used to if we're to produce the quantities of munitions and train the numbers of men needed for the almost predictable series of emergencies.

The action in Korea shows us what would happen to us in the Pacific if Russia were to send her own forces against us. We could not hold Korea, we could not hold Japan, we could not hold the Philippines, we probably could not hold Alaska and perhaps not Hawaii. A recent discussion in the House of Commons exposed very frankly what would happen to Europe if Russia decided to march west. Eighty Russian divisions and four or five thousand tanks are mobilized and ready. Nothing could stop them before they reached the English Channel. There is only one reason why Russia has not already annexed our Pacific holdings and western Europe. She is afraid that if she makes open war on us we will drop atomic bombs. And we probably would. The world has no other reply to the enormous military machine Russia is holding over our heads.

There are many honest men who are wondering whether anything we could win by a war would be worth the immense and prolonged sacrifices a war will certainly demand of us. But one steady look at the Politburo makes it obvious to any American that he could not endure existence in that vast concentration camp which is Russia and her satellites. We know democracy is not perfect; it is only a political system which tries to give all its citizens a fair chance under rules of fair play. It's not perfect, but it's the best men have had so far and the Communist slave state is probably the worst. There are conditions under which life is not worth living, and those are the exact conditions now offered by Russia to the rest of the earth. Living in a democracy we are prejudiced against violence and try to avoid trouble when we can, but the men of violence are marching their slaves against us again. We cannot accept what they offer. Weary of war though we are, it's better to fight.

Ultimately we shall win. The atom bomb is still ours and is holding the Russians at their borders. Invention and thought, which are dead in Russia, are very much alive among us, and they will begin to find ways to defeat the massed power of slaves and steel. Every soldier in our armies is a potential leader, every working brain is a potential leader of thought. We shall fight our way out of this trap, no matter how long it takes.

But from now on, let us make no mistake about it: The war is on, the chips are down. Those among us who defend Russia or communism are enemies of freedom and traitors to the United Nations and the United States. American soldiers are dying in a battle against slavery, against Russia's attempt to enslave mankind. Every man's house will be in a target area before this thing ends, whether we like it or not. The United Nations is on our side because Russia is at war with every nation that insists on being free. Fortunately President Truman has seen the Russian danger, and he knows as well as Churchill how boldly and rapidly we must act if we, as a nation, are to come out of this conflict alive. He will make very heavy demands on us, and very soon. He will have to make them, and we shall have to give everything we have to defend our liberty. Well, let us give it, and let us give ourselves, till Russia too has been taught that our free world is more than a match for the world of Genghis Khan.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Dominion News, Morgantown, W. Va., of August 25, 1950:

IT MAY INTEREST YOU
(By Bill Hart)

More than 2 years ago—it is now 3—I first saw him. He came into the office with that boyish grin, a lilting laugh in his voice and his step was quick and firm, but he had country about him for all his assurances and city clothes. We knew him then as a stanch worker in his own home county, a chap who had won his own way, been chosen by ballot to office and now he was saying: "I'm thinking about running for Congress. Are you people going to have any candidate for the nomination from Monongalia?" The negative answer was forthcoming and thus we knew that HARLEY STAGGERS was thinking about seeking the Democratic nomination for Congress from the Second Congressional District of which Monongalia is the pivotal area from several standpoints including population as well as having the only Democratic daily newspaper in all of the congressional district.

How well he would campaign we didn't know even after he emerged with a solid victory in the Democratic primary with several opponents all of whom made more noise and breathed a great deal more confidence than our friend who throughout the general as in the primary just kept working away, going to see people and telling them in his frank, open-face sincere way that if he went to Congress he would work as hard as he knew how to represent them as he knew they'd want him to represent 'em—looking after his district after playing whatever role fate might cast him in as the national affairs cycle rolls along the corridors of the halls of Congress. The people heard, they believed, and they sent him to Congress—and now, the time comes to see if he will be returned.

What has this Congressman—this HARLEY STAGGERS been doing since the people took him at his word and elected him to Congress? Probably no man has ever gone to Congress who has tried harder and few have worked harder. The day has not been too long, the night not too dark for STAGGERS not to be out pitchin' at his job of being a Congressman and no person has written him who didn't get an answer and a helping hand, if possible. The truth is that many people knowing how much he is capable of doing have imposed upon him trivial things that they should have performed themselves or better still never thought about. But of such is the life of a Congressman who is never in conference and whose door stands open, whose hand is outstretched and his heart is sympathetic to any worthy cause.

Thusly, we are now moving into a campaign to determine whether this man of the people is to remain in the Halls of Congress or to be turned out in favor of another gentleman whose backers have unlimited funds and will undoubtedly strive with might and main to send him to the seat now held by STAGGERS. Against this money and the admitted talents of the Republican nominee; against this great force, STAGGERS must depend almost entirely upon his record the past 2 years, his sincerity, his honesty, his frankness, his warm handclasp, his infectious grin, his ability to get around to a lot of places a lot of the time. He has a tough battle for talent and money combined are not easily beaten and the Republican nominee for Congress has both. STAGGERS has the talents, talents plus, but he has no financial angel. He has no slush fund, he has nothing save his friends and all of them are poor.

In Monongalia County—where politics are meat and fiber for many throughout all of the days of the year—the Democratic workers are finding legions of their Republican friends who are saying to each other: "STAGGERS is a worker; he's our friend; he is always around when we need him; he's winning his fight for the synthetic liquid fuels laboratory—the greatest boost Morgantown and West Virginia University will have ever had if it comes about—we're for him and we're going to ask our friends to vote for him." Yes; more and more people every day are saying in words or effect the foregoing. They are saying those words with the best of feelings for the Republican nominee who is a fine gentleman with a good war record. STAGGERS' war record, too, stands out, but like his Republican opponent, he boasts not of it. Both did their wartime jobs and well.

Labor Day, STAGGERS comes here to once again be amongst some of his warmest friends for here in Monongalia where we usually accept people slowly and with reservations STAGGERS has come to number his friends by the hundreds and hundreds and he is the living example of the time-tested principle that any person who looks for friends and wishes to be a friend to people usually realizes that ambition. STAGGERS will be among friends here Labor Day. Let us hope that on election day his friends will remember the great record he has compiled. STAGGERS must rely on his friends. He is poor, he has no great financial angel.

Medical Education Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from James Stevens Simmons, M. D., brigadier general, United States Army, retired; president, Association of Schools of Public Health:

HARVARD UNIVERSITY, SCHOOL OF PUBLIC HEALTH,
Boston, Mass., August 21, 1950.

Hon. JOHN W. MCCORMACK,
Representative in Congress,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MCCORMACK: The present critical military situation in Korea and the imminent threat of another global war places new emphasis on the need to provide for the Nation adequate facilities for the postgraduate training of specialized experts in public health and military preventive medicine. This need for training is essential to the development and operation of a fully effective wartime health conservation program both for the civil population and armed services. The direct practical relationship between the preventive techniques of public health and the conservation of national manpower is now well recognized. Our experience in World War II leaves no doubt that an aggressive all-out program of military preventive medicine is just as necessary to the success of a modern army as are modern equipment and weapons.

With this fact in mind, it is of urgent importance to take stock of all the facilities now available in the country with which to meet this emergency need for trained specialists in public health and preventive medicine and to make sound plans for whatever the future may bring. In view of recent action deferring the passage of H. R. 8886, which would provide a portion of the emergency financial assistance needed to enable the schools of public health, the schools of medicine, and the allied professions to meet their expanding responsibilities to the Nation, I am writing as president of the Association of Schools of Public Health to earnestly request reconsideration and early passage of this bill.

The Health Resources Division of the National Security Resources Board has responded to the association's request for an early conference at which the Government would outline for the schools of public health the additional training demands that will be made on them in the military and civil preparedness effort. Arrangements are under way for such a conference. Obviously, the success of any program adopted will depend on adequate financial support. Without additional funds, the schools will be helpless in fulfilling their obligation to the Nation.

Detailed statements showing the present unsatisfactory financial situation of the 10 schools and departments of public health, now engaged in the post-graduate training of public health and preventive medicine, have been presented to the Congress during the last year at hearings on H. R. 5940, and therefore need not be repeated here. These statements show that the schools of public health not only lack the financial support required for peacetime operation but that their total output of post-graduate trained specialists is about one-fifth of the number needed to properly operate the country's peacetime health programs. If the present Korean situation results in an all-out war, the additional demand of the armed services for such highly trained specialists will make this already critical situation hazardous.

This letter is written as spokesman for the association. However, I should like to add that from my 30 years of experience in military preventive medicine while on active duty in the Army, and especially from my observations as Chief of the Preventive Medicine Services in the Office of the Surgeon General throughout World War II, I am convinced that one of the most important responsibilities which now faces the Congress and the country is to take immediate steps to insure the training of an adequate and continuing supply of experts, to insure the prevention of disease and the conservation of health among our workers and our fighting men. It is my sincere belief that the need for early passage of H. R. 8886 is imperative. Its cost compared to the enormous outlays necessary for armaments, is relatively minor. Yet the need it would serve is of major importance to the maintenance of the Nation's strength.

With best wishes, I am
Sincerely yours,
JAMES STEVENS SIMMONS, M. D.,
Brigadier General, United States Army (Retired), President, Association of Schools of Public Health.

Labor Leaders Again Fight Mundt-Nixon-Wood Bill, H. R. 9490, Aimed To Protect the United States Against Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, blind labor leaders are again resisting the efforts of this Congress to write reasonable legislation that would curb the un-American activities of Communists, traitors, and fellow travelers. Yet it was only yesterday that Lee Pressman testified that he was a member, for 1 year, of the Communist Party. From 1935 until 1948 Pressman has been a top-flight labor leader. He was attorney for Philip Murray and the CIO during the time when labor moguls were fighting the Taft-Hartley law and the Mundt-Nixon bills in the Eightieth Congress. Since enactment of the Taft law, labor has really started to clear their ranks of Communists but until that time and even now, they have resisted every move to expel the "Red rats" from their ranks. Except for vigorous action by Congress who knows but that this Government might have been overthrown by the radicals in this time of emergency. A heavy hand rests upon the sane labor leaders in this country. The rank-and-file union member is far ahead of his leader. Most union members are loyal and patriotic and they oppose the Communists in their ranks.

Mr. Speaker, H. R. 9490 is another piece of legislation that comes from the House Un-American Activities Committee. It is a testimonial to the wisdom of this House in establishing that Committee on a permanent basis in the Seventy-ninth Congress. The American people should be grateful to those who voted to continue the committee. Alger Hiss and his comrades of the Communist Party would still be spewing their poison in this country if the committee had not been established.

Mr. Speaker, if I thought for one moment that this bill would give power to thwart the liberty and freedom of any group I would oppose it most violently. I am satisfied that it does not. It aims to compel the registration of Communist and fellow-traveler organizations to register the names of their members. Is there any loss of liberty there when we consider that we are presently in a war against communism in Korea? The answer is obvious: The charge that it goes so far as to control thought has no basis in fact. It is a specious argument designed to be sensational for public consumption. Constitutional safeguards are in no way impinged by this bill.

Mr. Speaker, this measure comes to us for consideration by a unanimous report of the committee so it is strictly nonpartisan. Mr. WOOD, the chairman, and the other members of the committee have spent hours listening to testimony and in writing the bill. Great credit is due them and especially the able gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER] and the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. NIXON]. We have been informed that only three organizations appeared against the measure, the American Federation of Labor, the CIO, and the Communist Party. In support of it are all the patriotic organizations in this country.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that H. R. 9490 will pass this House by an overwhelming majority. I shall vote for it.

Speech of Hon. Paul V. McNutt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. NOLAND
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. NOLAND. Mr. Speaker, Paul V. McNutt, a great American, who has served his country well in war and peace addressed the American Legion at a dedication of their National Headquarters Building in Indianapolis on August 20. A past national commander of the Legion, Paul McNutt has been governor of Indiana, High Commissioner to the Philippines, Federal Security Administrator, head of the War Manpower Commission, and Ambassador to the Philippines. His address on the position of the United States in international affairs is quite noteworthy. It follows:

For God and country we of the American Legion have associated ourselves together and we dedicate this national headquarters building to the service of the same high purpose. We are profoundly grateful to the people of the State of Indiana for making it available.

It has been our lot to see more history made than we read in the books during the days of our youth. It has been our privilege to serve our country in two world wars and to help in the solution of the difficult problems which are the inevitable aftermath of armed conflict.

Through the years the American Legion has kept the faith—with community, State, and Nation, with the disabled, the orphans, and the widows, with our comrades, without way of life. It has been a living force for good, a great stabilizing agency in the successive and mounting crises which have beset us since the day of the Legion's birth. Never was such a force, never was such an agency more needed than today as we face the greatest crisis of our time.

For those of us who are now in middle age, virtually the whole of our adult lives has been spent amidst the disturbances, the threats, and the dangers of crises. There were a few years, say from 1924 to 1929, when it seemed that the earthquake of 1914 was over, that the ground beneath our feet had ceased to tremble, and that in our Western World at least the destruction was being repaired, the wounds were healing, and men had resumed the works of peace. We now know that this was an illusion, that there was only a temporary lull, and that then there came upon us convulsions greater than any for which we were prepared.

Thus for more than 35 years, with only short intervals of comparative calm in which to catch our breath and compose our spirits, we have lived in the storm and stress of immense and incalculable events. Not every generation goes through an ordeal of this kind. Our fathers had their troubles. In the Nineties they had to work their way through panics and acute economic disorders. But only two other generations of Americans, those who made the Republic between 1776 and say 1810, and those who held it together between 1861 and 1880, have really known what it meant to have to defend the very foundation of civilized living against a breakdown into the anarchy of separated, quarreling groups. It is difficult, I think, to overestimate the nervous strain to which responsible men and women, those who, as the Quakers say, have had a concern of mankind, have been subjected in those years. Think back to 1914 and then realize how tremendous have been the demands upon human energy, the constant peril and the terrible anxiety first of World Waf I and its huge miseries, then of the peacemaking and the enormous complication of high ambitions and violent passions, then of the revolutions which overthrew all the empires of continental Europe, then of the first reconstruction in the Twenties, in which men had to fight every foot of the way for small instalments of reason against the fierce resistance of terrorized and shell-shocked masses of people, then the break-down in 1929 and all the panics, and the revolutions which have swept mankind. Then this was followed by catastrophic World War II, which all but destroyed civilization. Its implications we do not realize, its consequences we cannot know. Any man who has lived through these tremendous years and has tried as a responsible leader or as a conscientious citizen to do his part, to rise to the occasion, to contribute what he had in him, has endured anxieties, has drawn upon his reserves of moral force, to a point where at times it seems inhuman to ask any more of him. We need not be astonished that statesmen have become confused, that the peoples have again and again acted as if they were more than a little mad. The generation which has been passing through the ordeal of this crisis is shocked and weary and nervously spent. It has been frightened by blow after blow for which it was unprepared, bewildered by events which it could not understand, disappointed as one fair hope and one fair promise after another have been dashed to pieces. In the considered opinion of many students of contemporary history, we face today a greater test of our devotion to American principles than we have at any time in the past.

The great war through which we passed from 1941 to 1945 was a challenge to everything we believed in—to all our principles and even to our national survival. Today we face a challenge not only to our survival as a nation but to the very existence of mankind in the state we now know. It is not only the challenge of resurgent totalitarianism. It is a challenge to the basic truths of modern civilization. We thought we had firmly established those truths by our victory in 1945. We know today that we have not. What we accomplished was merely the defeat of one particular group of forces which arose to threaten modern civilization. We find today that there are other challenges more sinister and more forbidding than any in the recorded history of man.

We thought we had established beyond all question and doubt the concept of "one world," the concept of the indivisibility of peace and of the brotherhood of man. We thought we had fixed beyond challenge the truth of the statement that human, individual rights and the dignity of the human spirit were to be recognized above all other values. We thought we had firmly established the fact that governments are instituted among men to protect and preserve their inalienable rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and that governments exist only by the consent of the governed, under justice and law.

Today, 5 years after the end of hostilities, we find these truths again challenged. We find one nation arrogating to itself the right to determine the fate of others and the right to rule others.

Such action is the antithesis of democracy. One of the great purposes of the American Legion is to safeguard and transmit to posterity the principles of justice, freedom, and democracy. Justice and freedom define themselves. Democracy is the unrestricted right of the people to choose or change their form of government. The important thing is freedom to choose or change. Many of us have hoped with all our hearts for a world in which all would be free to make such choice or change and, being free, would sit around the table to settle differences as people of good will have always done. We desire to live in peace and do our part as a member of a community of nations. It would seem sensible to have a single community, one world, as some have put it. The League of Nations was and the United Nations is such an organization. Fragile as it may be and feeble as its efforts seem, it is a step in the right direction, the ultimate method of achieving universal peace. It deserves and is receiving our wholehearted support. An overwhelming majority of the nations and the peoples of the world believe in it. They can, if they will, give it the strength to keep the peace and to maintain a system of ordered liberty. To borrow an expression from our Navy—"Make it stow."

However, events of our lifetime, I trust, have made us realists. Therefore, if, for the time being, in the nature of men and things, there cannot be one world then let there be two or more. We do not seek to impose our way of life upon any other peoples. By the same token we will not tolerate the efforts of others to impose their way of life upon us. We join with all others of like mind to preserve freedom for all of us in that world to which we belong.

For the record, it is well to point out on this memorable occasion, that, from the day of its birth, the American Legion has carried the unceasing fight against communism, fascism, and totalitarianism in any form. Its members were the martyrs of the unforgettable Centralia massacre. Its action blocked the plan for an American revolution which envisioned enlisting large members of ex-servicemen under the Red standard. Its voice has been the vigilant voice of warning as to the enemy in our midst. Its hand has been raised to maintain law and order in every emergency or disaster. Its leadership has been steadfast in promoting an understanding of and devotion to American democracy, a program which we have seen fit to call our Americanism program.

No organization has more consistently supported and urged an adequate national defense. For this stand Legionnaires have been the target of all manner of silly epithets, jingoists, sabre-rattlers, war mongers, and superpatriots. Neither name-calling nor well-financed, skillfully directed opposition has changed the stand of the American Legion. And now, at long last, the American people and the responsible officers of Government have recognized the absolute necessity of preparedness. The American Legion is not in the least concerned with the fact that for 30 years it was a voice crying in the wilderness. It is vitally concerned with what is done about national defense now—right now.

The American Legion is for universal military training.

The American Legion is for the mobilization of all of our resources.

Never again must be learn the bitter lesson of too little and too late.

Americans love freedom with such a passion that they instinctively resent any move which smacks of regimentation. If I am any judge of their temper at the moment it would seem that, after mature consideration rather than emotional judgment, they are ready to submit themselves to such controls as are necessary during, but only during, the period of national danger.

That this is a period of grave national danger is apparent to all.

We thought that we were born in an age of reason, of truth, of enlightenment, that the shadows at the beginning of the century were the shortening shadows of the dawn of a better day. To our great dismay we have found ourselves constantly fighting unreason, untruth, and ignorance and that an iron curtain cuts off all light.

Three years ago an oriental of high standing and great influence said to me that the only thing which gains and holds respect in this day and age is superior force. I replied that I had never listened to such cynicism. The East has seen centuries of man's inhumanity to man and I have come to understand that he was quoting from the book of experience.

If, as it would seem, we face the threat of another of the dark ages it behooves us to carry a sword in one hand and the torch of liberty in the other. We must be the superior force in order to keep alight the torch of liberty which illumines the path to a better day.

It is not enough that we be strong for our own sakes. We have earned a position of world leadership. All freedom-loving nations and peoples look to us. We are ready to support and befriend our allies and to cooperate with movements designed to isolate totalitarianism and tyranny. We have acknowledged and accepted our responsibilities. In a world crisis of such magnitude, such violence and such complexity, it is for us to take whatever steps are necessary to maintain peace.

In the stress and strain of the moment we must not forget those who, through the years, have been our steadfast friends. Yonder is the last flag to fly over the Philippines as an American possession. It is the flag which was lowered in honor and glory on July 4, 1946. Its stars were made and sewed by loving hands from every province of the Philippines. The Indiana War Memorial was selected as its sanctuary by the President of the United States.

On a comparative basis the Philippines suffered more damage than any similar area in the war zones. The Filipino people had more casualties in proportion to population than any other peoples in World War II. Manila's destruction was greater than that of any war capital with the possible exception of Warsaw. It is still the city of missing faces and missing places. One other fact must never be forgotten. The Philippines was the only one of the possessions or colonies of the Allied Nations to stand fast from the beginning to the end. The Filipinos fought with unsurpassed bravery from the first day to the last. Our conduct in the islands for half a century and our prompt fulfillment of the promise of independence give the lie to the statements of the Soviet member of the Security Council. The offer from the Philippines of 5,000 troops is no idle gesture in reply.

The Republic of the Philippines is our experiment in democracy in the Far East. The islands are a very important part of our western defense line. The present economic troubles of the Filipinos are due, for the most part, to the war. They need substantial help now. For our own sake as well as for theirs, we must not delay. I cit this as a primary example of what must be done outside the borders of our country.

A new flag bravely flies on the battlefields of Korea. For the first time it flies over this memorial plaza. It is the emblem of the United Nations. To me it symbolizes a familiar phrase in the preamble of the Legion's constitution: "To make right the master of might." It is an expression of the continuing hope of men of good will and good sense everywhere that world wars can be averted, that the forces of order in this world are still more powerful than the forces of chaos.

I am glad the two flags fly together. Freemen in all parts of the world are our fellows in this great adventure of man's history. Freedom now fights back. It has awakened to the challenge. It is aware of the grave danger, which is twofold: externally through powerful military aggression; internally through infiltration on the one hand and certain failures of the free system to meet man's needs on the other. The free must meet the danger in both of its aspects.

The United Nation's peace forces, manned largely by the United States, have their backs against the sea in the Korean bridgehead. Dangers of similar military onslaughts exist in half a dozen other soft spots throughout the world. It is the crafty strategy of the Soviet totalitarians to strain the resources of freemen to exhaustion without exposing their own forces directly. They have made cat's-paws of their slaves, who are victims of police-state thinking, children of fear, born of ignorance.

In reality we fight for their freedom as well as our own. We must teach them the fruitful footsteps toward individual-based society. The achievement of the free system is not merely a higher standard of living but the opportunity it affords to God's individual man.

This is no time for fear or frustration. If we stand firm, the day will come when the democracies of the world will be able to say, as Pitt said: "We have saved ourselves by our own exertions, and the world by our example."

When the curtains of this night are pinned together with a star, may that star be the star of Bethlehem. He who was born under that star said: "I am come that they may have life and that they may have it more abundantly." The words of the Master, who is the Prince of Peace, must be the pattern of the peace.

In that spirit, as we dedicate this building, we rededicate ourselves to God and country. May God give us the vision to see the path and the courage to follow it. With divine help we will not fail.

Concurrent Resolution With Regard To Armed Aggressions by Russia or Satellite Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT HALE
OF MAINE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement:

Congressmen HALE, of Maine; HERTER, of Massachusetts; and JUDD, of Minnesota, today filed a concurrent resolution in the House of Representatives in effect holding the Government of the U. S. S. R. responsible for any new outbreak of war which might occur as a result of an armed attack against any nation by a Russian satellite or by Russian-occupied Germany. In filing this resolution they made the following statement:

"For a few weeks after the attack by North Korea on South Korea it was the policy of our Government never to mention Soviet Russia as being in any way responsible for or connected with this attack, although all the evidence available to the United Nations or to the United States pointed directly to the contrary. Presumably our policy was motivated by the wish to give the Soviet Union an opportunity to disavow the action of North Korea. Its failure to do so has given every indication that the Soviet Union believes it can make use of its satellites in order to launch attacks on noncommunistic countries and escape direct responsibility for the consequences. The resolution which we have filed is intended to make it absolutely clear that, insofar as the Congress is concerned, Soviet Russia can no longer inspire its satellites to aggressive action without being held accountable for such action through the appropriate agency, namely, the Security Council of the United Nations. We believe that a forthright statement of this kind, concurred in by the Senate and the House, would serve in some measure as a deterrent to further acts of aggression of the type initiated by the North Koreans, and would clear the atmosphere with respect to accountability, should such further acts occur.

"We further believe it important to point up to the satellite nations that we have no illusions as to their foreign policy and their military activities. Obviously they are under the direct control of the Kremlin."

The text of the resolution follows:

"Whereas the action by the government of North Korea on June 25, 1950, characterized by 53 nations as an act of unprovoked aggression, has clearly received the approval of the government of the U. S. S. R.; and

"Whereas this action of the government of North Korea comes as a sequel to repeated acts on the part of the government of the U. S. S. R., clearly evidencing its unwillingness to cooperate in maintaining international peace; and

"Whereas the government of the U. S. S R. has armed, equipped, and trained nationals of countries contiguous to it or occupied by its army: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved (the Senate concurring), That (1) it is the sense of the Congress that any armed attack by the governments of the U. S. S. R., Poland, Rumania, Bulgaria, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Russian-occupied Germany, Albania, or Communist China, or by any one or more of such governments, upon the peoples of any nation must be regarded by the Congress of the United States as a threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression on the part of the U. S. S. R. itself. Such attack, as in the case of North Korea, must be deemed to call for appropriate action by the Security Council of the United Nations for the maintenance or restoration of international peace and security.

"(2) Upon the adoption of this resolution, the President of the United States is respectfully requested to communicate its terms to the Security Council of the United Nations."

Aid and Comfort for the Enemy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. NOLAND
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. NOLAND. Mr. Speaker, following is an editorial from the Bloomington (Ind.) Star-Courier, which is one of the finest newspapers in the entire Nation.

This analytical editorial demonstrates that the people of America are able to see through the clouds of confusion stirred up by the partisan maneuvering of certain politicians. The editorial follows:

AID AND COMFORT FOR THE ENEMY

The Communist movement is a world-wide menace which must be met with such strong and determined actions as we have taken in Korea. But, right here in our own country there is another immediate and dangerous situation which must be headed off before it causes irreparable harm.

This growing danger in our midst is the violent stand which some unscrupulous Republican politicians have taken against the administration's pursuit of the war effort. Within the last few weeks these thoughtless politicians have seized upon the Korean situation as the long awaited excuse for a campaign issue. Their bombastic oratory, at times, has bordered on the subversive. Moscow could not do a better job of attempting to undermine the faith of the American people in their government than is being done by these political opportunists.

Indeed, there are times when one cannot help but believe that these politicians in their misguided zeal for a campaign issue would welcome the defeat of the Allied forces in Korea in order to lay the bloody corpse at the feet of the American people and declare: "This is the fault of a Democratic administration."

It is the right and the duty of the minority to criticize the party in power, but when that criticism borders on the sabotaging of a nation, it is going too far for political purposes.

While American boys are dying on the Korean front, these politicians are taking the opportunity to confuse the people at home and thus hinder the nation's war effort. Here is a real and immediate danger for all of us.

In the midst of this new surge of political oratory and opposition to the administration are three Hoosiers: Senators CAPEHART and JENNER and Representative HALLECK. These three Hoosier congressmen, who consistently voted against every effort of Congress to stem the tide of communism in Europe, now would blame the war in Korea on the President and a Democratic administration. CAPEHART, JENNER and HALLECK were lined up with the isolationist wing in Congress that opposed the Marshall plan aid for Europe. Fortunately, we were able to pass the aid bills despite the hamstringing tactics of the isolationists. And, it has been the Marshall plan aid which has helped to save Europe up to now from being completely overrun by communism.

Our aid to Greece and Turkey helped to save those countries. The Red forces were repulsed in Greece. Turkey was saved as a buffer against any Russian movement into the Near East, which would mean the loss of the vital Iranian oil fields. In Italy, in France, in western Germany and in the Low Countries the forces of democracy have been triumphant over communism. Yet in the Congress of the United States, Senators CAPEHART and JENNER and Representative HALLECK were against economic aid for the democratic forces in Europe.

Now along comes war in the Far East. What about our policy in the Far East? Why did the war break out in Korea? Was our State Department remiss in its handling of the Far East relations?

We don't think so. We believe that every effort within our power was made to give the people in the Far East reason to oppose communism. But, the Far East is unlike Europe. Culturally and industrially the teeming millions of Asia are far behind the rest of the world. There was nothing to begin with, and it was recognized that all the great wealth of this Nation could not hope to bolster an economy that had no foundation. Aid for the Chiang Kai-shek regime in China was abandoned after we had poured millions of dollars into the country only to see it disappear into the pockets of the greedy war lords surrounding Chiang. In South Korea we fostered a democratic regime and gave the people food and arms, but apparently it was not enough. Yet, it was all that economy-minded Congressmen in both parties saw fit to give.

The Democratic administration in Washington is accused of negligence by these political-minded men and of spreading our aid too thin. Let us not forget that it was many of these same politicians who now criticize the administration for failing to be ready for the Korean emergency who fought the hardest to cut all appropriations. If they had had their way we would now be facing the Communist hordes in Europe as well as in Asia.

Our memory takes us back only a few short weeks when the cry of these same politicians was economy, economy, and more economy. They wanted economy where there was no place to economize except in our appropriations for defense which then were taking some 70 percent of the annual national budget.

We are now engaged in a bitter war in Korea. It is a war which will test the strength of a democratic world as opposed to the Communist ideology. It is going to take a united front here and in all democratic nations of the world to win.

The Capeharts, the Jenners, and the Hallecks who are creating dissension in the ranks are aiding the Russian cause. They are unwittingly providing aid and comfort for the enemy.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 30 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, a very interesting biographical sketch of our former colleague and able Senator from New York, Mr. James M. Mead.

The article describes the broad experience of Jim Mead, and shows how devotion to his duties and a brilliant and active mind have led him up the ladder of success. The friends of former Senator Mead will read this article with much interest.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Enginemen's Magazine of July 1950]

UNCLE SAM'S CHIEF COP—FROM WATER BOY ON LACKAWANNA TO CHAIRMAN OF FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION: JIM MEAD'S GREAT RECORD

(By Ruben Levin)

Back in 1910, a tall, handsome, genial youngster, with a remarkably winning personality, was appointed to the Capitol Police force. For a year he served as a cop in and around the Legislative Halls of Congress.

Today, that youngster—now graying at the temples, but with the same charm and persuasiveness—is Uncle Sam's chief cop. His job is to see that business goes straight and to crack down on monopoly.

Railroaders hardly need to be told that this man is James Michael Mead, the one-time water boy on the Lackawanna, whose rise to fame and influence is a typical American saga.

Last fall Jim Mead was appointed by President Truman to membership on the Federal Trade Commission, the agency which has the responsibility of policing business and curbing monopoly.

Late in May, Truman moved Jim up to the chairmanship of the Commission. That job is now a particularly important one because, under a reorganization plan approved by Congress, extensive new powers are vested in the Chairman. He becomes the top cop in reality, as well as in name.

Behind him is an extraordinary career, with which old-timers on the "iron horse" are already familiar, but this is a good time to retell it for the newer generation on the rails.

Jim was literally born into railroading. His father and mother both worked on the railroads. Jim and all his four brothers did the same. So did scores of relatives. At one time it was possible to count a hundred members of the Mead and related families who held jobs on the "iron horse." They toiled in almost every craft and belonged to almost every union on the rails. There were enough of them to run a fair-sized railroad, all by themselves.

Jim's father was a maintenance-of-way worker on the old Pittsburg & Shawmut. His mother, Mary Jane Kelley, herself the daughter of a railroader, was employed in railroad station restaurants at Hornell and Canaseraga, N. Y. Mary's sisters and brothers also labored on the railroads all the livelong day.

As Jim recalls it, those were the days before diners were common on the rails. Trains stopped long enough for passengers to hop off and grab a bite at the depots.

"Many young girls of the countryside found jobs in these depot restaurants very attractive," Jim Mead said. "They didn't stay long—for a very simple reason: The engineers, the firemen, the trainmen, and others who ate in those restaurants married the belles."

That was how Jim's father, Thomas Mead, met and married Mary Jane Kelley. They moved into a little rough shack by the side of the tracks on the Lackawanna at Mount Morris, N. Y. Tom Mead was then a foreman and he was provided by the railroad with that shack so he could readily be picked up at any time of the day or night in case of a wreck or other emergency.

It was in that little home that Jim first saw the light of day back in December 1885, and where he spent his earliest years. Jim has a photo of that hut on the walls of his office now. "When the trails rolled by, it rattled like an accordion," he remembers.

While Jim was still a young boy the family moved to Buffalo. The family grew and the youngsters had to seek work at an early age to help make ends meet. Jim had to quit school at 12. His first job was that of water boy on the Lackawanna, carrying buckets of water to thirsty section hands.

Soon he was promoted to lamplighter, taking care of switch lamps; then to a maintenance-of-way worker. The waymen weren't organized then, but about that time the carmen on his road struck for higher pay. When strikebreakers tried to use the section shanty for their tools, he threw them out and chalked up a sign: "No Scabs Permitted Here" For that he was fired, ending his career as a track worker.

Then he got a job with the Pullman Co., working on car dynamos, and joined the electrical workers.

When the opportunity arose to become a cop at the Capitol in Washington, he grabbed it. On the side, he spent all possible spare time studying law, boning far into the night.

When he resigned to return to Buffalo, he told his fellow cops lightly: "I'll be back in 10 years as a Member of Congress."

In Buffalo, he went to work for the Erie as a switch tender and became active in the switchmen's union. Three years later lodge 226 elected him as president. His brothers were similarly active in unionism. One was president of a local lodge of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, another was a member of the railway clerks, a third of the trainmen, and a fourth was a dispatcher, later killed in line of duty.

The year 1913 marked his first entry into politics. He ran for the Erie County board of supervisors and made it. He launched an immediate fight for reforms.

Then he tried for the legislature in 1915 and won. He was elected an assemblyman for four successive terms, each time with larger pluralities. He made a great record there as a champion of workers and the public welfare. For example, he led successful battles for a full crew law, for a semimonthly pay bill, for a cab safety act, and many other progressive measures. A Democrat in a Republican-controlled legislature, he developed a reputation as a legislator who got things done.

His big test came in 1918. At the urging of organized labor and liberal forces, he ran for Congress, and triumphed in the race. He came to Washington as a Congressman at the age of 33—in 2 years' less time than the prediction he had made to his fellow "cops" in 1910.

For 20 years thereafter he served in the House, winning reelection each time, even during Republican landslides. Assigned to the House Post Office Committee, he became one of the ablest champions of postal workers in Congress, scoring many gains for them.

He was an outstanding supporter, too, of all rail labor legislation, as well as every other measure in the interest of those who toil for a living. He helped put through the Railway Labor Act, the Railroad Retirement Act, the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, and many other progressive laws.

When the late Senator Royal S. Copeland died in 1938, Mead was unanimously chosen by the Democratic State convention to run for the post. He was elected by a thumping majority then—and again in 1940, when he ran for the full 6-year term. In 1946 he was persuaded to run for Governor of New York State, and was defeated—for the first time in his career.

His record in the House and Senate is unparalleled. Not only did he have a perfect score from labor's standpoint, but he never ducked a vote. There were no misses, no absences in his box score. He was always at hand to register his stand, and to fight for what he believed was right.

Mead served on many outstanding committees. He was active on several that dealt with the problems of small business. He was also a member of the famous Temporary National Economic Committee, which probed the evils of monopoly and big business.

During World War II he served side by side with Harry Truman, later to become President, on the famous Senate War Investigating Committee, and when Truman became Vice President in 1944, Mead succeeded to the chairmanship of the committee.

He did a superb job. Like Truman, he turned the spotlight on war contract swindlers, on makers of defective war materials, on other abuses in the war production program. Quite a number of crooks were sent to jail, due to Mead's efforts. Equally important, he saved the taxpayers hundreds of millions, if not billions of dollars, in war contract expenditures.

How does he react to his present position—is it the most interesting and challenging he has held? This writer put that question to him.

"No, I would demur to that," he replied. "It is a very important task. But I still believe that to be a Member of the House of Representatives from any State is as interesting, exciting, and constructive a position as anyone can hope to aspire to in the public service. I would say the same of Senators, except that those from the big and populous States do not have sufficiently adequate staffs to prepare themselves as thoroughly as they would like to for the big debates and issues up before Congress."

Mead's experience in Congress with the problems of small and big business, and his administrative experience as chairman of important committees, have come in good stead. Under his leadership, the Commission has been injected with new life and energy.

Many reforms have been instituted to expedite action on cases involving monopolistic practices and flagrant abuses in business. John Carson, another newer member of the Commission, has also played a major role in this "transfusion." Like Mead, Carson is a veteran of many battles for progressive causes and a former leader in cooperative and consumer movements.

One of the most unusual developments is that for the first time in years, the Commission has cleaned up all cases which are ready for decisions, and it is now current in its work. To achieve that objective has meant much toil on Sundays, holidays, and nights for Mead and his associates.

Mead stressed, however, that the aim of the Commission is not just quantity of cases, but real protection of the consumer as well as small business—and, above all, maintenance of an honest American system of competition.

One final point: Jim Mead has been a member of many organizations, but one of his greatest prides is the life membership he holds in the Switchmen's Union of North America. It was unanimously conferred on him by the 1927 convention of the Switchmen in recognition of his great service to workers on the rails and his championship of the people's welfare. In his office is a silver plaque, emblematic of that membership, and it holds a high place there in a case full of mementos of a long and valiant career.

Speech of Assistant Secretary of Defense, Marx Leva, at Veterans of Foreign Wars National Encampment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, one of the distinguished speakers at the Fifty-first Annual Encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, held in Chicago this week, was Mr. Marx Leva, Assistant Secretary of Defense. It was appropriate that Mr. Leva, as a representative of the Department of Defense, should have made the chief subject of his address a report on the first 3 years of unification, with a further report on how the successful working of the unification of the armed services is affecting the course of our operations in Korea. I say successful because, as Mr. Leva pointed out, we can truthfully say that—

> Today we have in Korea more men and more arms than we sent to the invasion of north Africa in November of 1942, 11 months after Pearl Harbor.

The streamlined defense establishment that we now have seems made to order to meet the situation that confronts us. There is no reason to believe that it will not prove equally efficient if a different situation should arise.

Unification has not only brought the three military services under one civilian head, and together operationally under the Joint Chiefs of Staff. It has produced more efficient shipping, more economical procurement, and a uniform code of military justice. It has permitted an economy in administration that has directly affected the combat readiness of the services. To quote only one of Mr. Leva's illustrations:

> At the time of the Communist coup in Czechoslovakia, in March of 1948, only 28 percent of the Army's manpower was in combat units. By the time of the Communist invasion of Korea in June of 1950, this figure had grown to 43 percent.

Mr. Leva did not confine his remarks, however, to a report on actions taken within the Department of Defense. He paid tribute to things the President and the Congress have done in recent years which have helped the free world to make progress in rehabilitating itself from the hunger, fear, and despair that followed in the wake of World War II. Such actions have considerably strengthened hope of peace, and therefore the security of the United States. These actions have indeed given such encouragement to the hope of the free world for an enduring peace, that it is not surprising that the masters of the Kremlin should have instigated aggression in Korea, to reverse the flow of the tide.

If blame for the Korean situation is to be placed on anyone, it must be placed on the Communist aggressors who broke the peace. Instead of blaming our own administrators for it, we will—if we are honest and wise—place the blame where the blame belongs, but be grateful that in our own country we had, even before Korea, built up strength that permits us to withstand the attack.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend, I insert Mr. Leva's able and encouraging report in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It follows:

I am very glad to have this opportunity to be with you today, at this fifty-first encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars. Since I spent 26 months on sea duty on one of the Navy's LST's during World War II, I believe I am eligible for membership in your fine organization—but because of the fact that I have been working for the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of Defense continuously since the close of World War II, it has been my feeling that, at least while I continue to hold public office, I should refrain from joining any of our great and patriotic veterans' groups.

I have, however, watched with much interest the work which you have been doing—especially in the legislative field, which happens to be one of my responsibilities within the Department of Defense. The strong support you have always given to legislation necessary for our national defense—the most recent example being Mr. Ketchum's very excellent letter of last week, on universal military training—has been greatly heartening to those of us within the Department of Defense who have responsibility for the defense portion of President Truman's legislative program.

I should like to discuss with you, this morning, some of the highlights of the first 3 years of unification—together with some of the implications of the ebb and flow of the battle in Korea.

Unification of the Armed Forces will be 3 years old in the very near future—on September 17, 1950, to be exact. On September 17, 1947, James Forrestal took the oath of office as our first Secretary of Defense. His successor, Louis Johnson, became Secretary of Defense on March 28, 1949. The first 3 years, therefore, reflect 18 months tenure by Secretary Forrestal, and 18 months tenure by Secretary Johnson. I have had the great privilege of working with both the Secretaries throughout the entire 3 years. In discussing some of the highlights of unification with you, I shall not attempt to break the subject down and say "Secretary Forrestal did this" or "Secretary Johnson did that." In the first place, the work of the two men has been too closely interrelated to permit of such a breakdown—and in the second place, it is the job that is important, and not the man. But, since I have worked closely with both men throughout their tenure in office, I do want to express my personal opinion at the outset of my remarks—and it is my opinion that both Secretaries of Defense have made great and lasting contributions to our national security. It is the nature of those contributions, and how they were achieved in spite of great obstacles, that I want to discuss with you this morning.

As most of you are aware, the old War Department strongly favored unification—and the old Navy Department was somewhat less enthusiastic. I have been fond of saying that unification represented a marriage of the Army and Navy, and that, in this marriage, the Army was an overardent bridegroom, and the Navy was a most reluctant bride. Gordon Gray, when he was Secretary of the Army, added this additional thought: He described the Air Force as the in-law who moved in with the newly married couple on the day of the ceremony—thereby adding somewhat to the marital turmoil.

So, you see, the problems with which we have been dealing have not been simple ones.

Nor would I want you to think that all our problems have been solved. Many have been solved—and I will mention several of them in a moment—but many remain to be solved.

Today, in Korea, unification is undergoing its "ordeal by fire"—and how well or how badly we have solved our problems can be judged to some degree by the way in which the Department of Defense has responded to the Korean crisis.

In this connection, I believe that you will be interested in the following excerpt from a recent message from General MacArthur to President Truman—and I quote:

"The skill and valor * * * displayed in successive holding actions by the ground forces * * * brilliantly supported in complete coordination by air and naval elements forced the enemy into continued deployments, costly frontal attacks, and confused logistics, which so slowed his advance and blunted his drive that we have bought the precious time necessary to build a secure base.

"I do not believe that history records a comparable operation which excelled the speed and precision with which the Eighth Army, the Far East Air Force, and the Seventh Fleet have been deployed to a distant land for immediate commitment to major operations."

I believe you will also be interested in what the August 21 issue of Time magazine had to say on the subject. Time -which has often been extremely critical of the administration—said this about the fighting in Korea—and I quote:

"The American effort and the American soldier in Korea are magnificent. Doubtless we could and should have been better prepared. But the more important fact is that never before in all our history have we been so nearly prepared at the start of any war as we were at the start of this one. Today we have in Korea more men and more arms than we sent to the invasion of north Africa in November of 1942, 11 months after Pearl Harbor.

"Already, though still outnumbered, we have the greater weight of arms, on the ground and in the air and at sea. We know how to use and coordinate the arms, as we did not know for many months after the start of World War II. It is a wonderful and thrilling thing to see * * * infantry in action with the support of fighters from the Air Force, bombers from a naval carrier, and, if the field commander had wanted it, bombardment from warships standing off shore * * *. The buildup of American power has been achieved at a pace and on a scale that would never before have been possible so early in a war so far from home."

Now, both of the statements from which I have just quoted—General MacArthur's, and Time magazine's—deal in generalities. Accordingly, in order to back up these general statements, I will give you a few specific illustrations of what has been accomplished. Among the illustrations that I would enumerate in this connection are the following:

1. The phenomenal record that is being made by the consolidated shipping line which the Navy is operating—a shipping line which, through unification, has replaced the competing fleets which the Army and the Navy formerly operated. In a few short weeks, the consolidated line tremendously stepped up its weekly trans-Pacific tonnage. The speedy and orderly way in which merchant vessels have been taken out of mothballs to supply our forces in Korea is without parallel in the history of warfare.

2. The teamwork of the services—a matter to which General MacArthur has referred again and again in the most glowing terms, including the quotation from his message to President Truman, which I read earlier. A perfect example of the sort of teamwork referred to by General MacArthur was the record crossing of the Pacific by the U. S. S. Boxer—an aircraft carrier which crossed the Pacific in 8 days with a load of 147 planes for the Air Force, large numbers of Air Force personnel, Army personnel, and Navy personnel, and a very heavy general cargo to help support the Korean fighting strength of all three services.

3. The ability which our Army forces have shown—in the words used by General Collins in reporting to the President, "to convert quickly from the peaceful duties of occupation to the grim duties of war," and the ability of our Navy, Air Force, and Marine planes to assist the Army and Marine forces on the ground in every possible way. A good example of the speed of reinforcement is the fact that one infantry regimental combat team arrived on the field of battle on the other side of the world 19 days after it was alerted in this country. An example of Air Force mobility is the successful completion of a mission directed at targets in northern Korea within 8 days from the time the units were alerted in the United States.

4. The speed with which newly developed weapons have been brought into action—for example, the new Army antitank rocket had been developed in research during the spring of 1950 and production had been started on it only 15 days before the Communist invasion of Korea. Yet, through fast staff action and the whole-hearted cooperation of the Military Air Transport Command, a supply of the rockets, together with the necessary launchers and personnel trained in their use, reached the troops in Korea on the 18th of July. Twenty-five days after the invasion the new rocket had knocked out several Red tanks.

5. The prompt action of the Joint Chiefs of Staff in acting on General MacArthur's requests—for example, requests are frequently received, acted upon, approved by the Secretary of Defense and the President, and implemented, all in the same day. If it had not been for this record of speed and decision, and if it had not been for the brilliant delaying action of the Army, Marine, and South Korean ground forces under General MacArthur's inspired leadership, we would not now be in a position where—very shortly, we hope—our forces, joined by forces of other members of the United Nations, will soon be able to take the offensive in order to reestablish peace in Korea.

You will recall that, as my first illustration, I referred to the job that is being done by our consolidated shipping line. Prior to unification, the Army operated several hundred oceangoing vessels. We have now consolidated this entire operation under the Navy—and the Navy handles oceangoing shipping for itself, for the Army, and for the Air Force. This consolidation took place well in advance of the Korean crisis, so that, when the Communist invasion of Korea occurred, we were ready to meet our shipping needs in a prompt and orderly manner.

The same sort of consolidation has also taken place in the field of air transport. As many of you know, during World War II the Navy operated its own airline- the Naval Air Transport Service--and the Air Force operated its own airline—the Air Transport Command. One of the first consolidations put into effect by Secretary Forrestal was the consolidation of these two airlines—and the consolidated airline—now known as MATS, the Military Air Transport Service—furnishes air transportation for all three services. It was this consolidated airline which did such an outstanding job; in behalf of our national security, at the time of the Berlin blockade. The fruits of unification in the field of air and sea transportation are paying dividends in Korea today, just as MATS paid dividends at the time of the Berlin airlift.

I note from your program that you heard from Father Cavanaugh, of Notre Dame, on Sunday night, and that fact reminds me that I really should tell you of a major unification step for which Father Cavanaugh was largely responsible. More than 2 years ago, we set up an all-civilian advisory commission to review for us the field of military pay. Father Cavanaugh was the vice chairman of the group. Father Cavanaugh and his associates spent almost a year in studying military pay, and out of their study came the Career Compensation Act of 1949, enacted by Congress just about a year ago, and a very major contribution to the unification of the services. This legislation, which represented the first comprehensive overhaul military pay scales since 1908, put the three services on a more nearly uniform basis and gave us a modern pay structure. It is typical of the innumerable steps toward unification which have been taken during the past 3 years.

A similar illustration, which will be of primary interest to your commander in chief, Mr. Lewis, and the other members of the VFW who are lawyers, is the Uniform Code of Military Justice. This code replaces the old Articles of War and the Articles for the Government of the Navy, and gives us a code that is uniform for all the personnel in all three services, regardless of which service an individual is in, and regardless of what his rank may be. When we first looked into the subject of military justice, we found that the Articles of War had been revised somewhat after World War I, and the Articles for the Government of the Navy had not been revised very materially since the Republic was established. Indeed, there were those who said that the Articles for the Government of the Navy went back unchanged to the time of Cromwell's Navy—but in any event, Congress has now enacted the Uniform Code of Military Justice, which represents a tremendous stride forward in the unification of the services.

Mention should also be made of the work that has been done in the field of coordinated procurement. When unification first began, we could have abolished the purchasing that was being done in the Army and the Navy and we could have said: "We will centralize all purchasing in one place, and we will set up a Ministry of Supply on the British pattern"—but we had existing purchasing organizations in the Army and in the Navy, and the nucleus of a very excellent purchasing agency in the Air Force, and we therefore proceeded in a quite different manner.

The manner in which we proceeded came to this: We assigned to one or the other of the military departments the procurement responsibility for a given commodity, and that department then procured the item for all three military departments. For example, the Air Force was assigned responsibility for handling all purchases of photographic equipment for itself, and for the Army and for the Navy. The Navy was assigned responsibility for buying all hand tools—all hammers and saws, for example—for all three services. The Army was assigned the responsibility for buying all basic foods for all three, and all automotive equipment as well.

Some other procurement was handled in a different manner. We had to set up a central purchasing agency for handling our purchases of petroleum because that item loomed so large in the total picture. We also set up an office to buy all medical supplies jointly.

In any event, the entire program of coordinated procurement has proceeded to a point where approximately 85 percent of the total dollar value of military procurement is now handled on a coordinated basis. You can readily see the value which we derive from this coordinated procurement system, at a time like the present, when the volume of our purchases is expanding by leaps and bounds.

Mention should also be made of the unified command set up under unification. Unified command now exists in all overseas theaters in which we have major troop elements. The unified commander—regardless of the color of his own uniform—has under him the forces of all three services. Examples of this are the Alaskan theater, under Air Force command; the Caribbean theater, under Army command; the Pacific theater, under Navy command; and the Far Eastern theater, which, as you all know, is under the command of Gen. Douglas MacArthur.

In this general connection, mention should also be made of the strenuous effort, begun by Secretary Forrestal and continued by Secretary Johnson, to get more defense for each defense dollar. One example of this is the constantly increasing percentage of Army personnel who are in combat units. At the time of the Communist coup in Czechoslovakia, in March of 1948, only 28 percent of the Army's manpower was in combat units. By the time of the Communist invasion of Korea, in June of 1950, this figure had grown to 43 percent.

The same general condition prevailed in the Navy. In March of 1948, there were 177 vessels in the Navy's active fleet that were so undermanned that they could not get under way and fight. When the Republic of Korea was invaded on June 25, 1950, every ship in the active fleet was capable of moving into action.

The manpower strength of the Air Force increased materially during this same 2-year period. In addition, the number of Air Force groups operationally ready for action increased by almost 50 percent, while at the same time the number of planes per bombardment group was raised considerably.

During this same 2-year period—from March 1948, to June 1950—the number of Reserves and National Guard men in a drill pay status in all three services increased by almost 100 percent—from 435,000 in March of 1948 to 834,000 in June of 1950.

Further in this same connection, it is worth noting that the percentage of the total military budget that goes to pay for hardware—planes, ships, tanks, and other weapons—has increased from a low of 6 percent for fiscal 1947 to a high of 19½ percent for the fiscal year that ended on June 30, 1950. It is also worthy of note that "hardware" accounts for 65 percent of the President's recently recommended supplemental budget of $11,500,000,000.

Time will not permit the sort of detailed list of accomplishments that I would like to present to you—so I will close this part of my remarks with one further illustration. We made a survey of the different forms and sizes of officers' commissions, and we found that there were a total of 45 different forms, sizes, and shapes—ranging from a great big parchment for admirals and generals down to a very small piece of paper, indeed, for ensigns and second lieutenants—so we solved that one by unifying everybody's down to the size of the ensign's.

Everything that I have said up to this point has been addressed primarily to the things that we have been doing, within the Department of Defense. Before concluding I would like to broaden my remarks somewhat by discussing briefly some of the things which the President and the Congress have done in recent years which, in my opinion, deserve far more thought than they are currently receiving.

I mention this because of my own strong feeling that the free world in the past several years has made tremendous progress in rehabilitating itself from the hunger, fear, and despair that followed in the wake of World War II. The people of the United States have ample cause to be proud of the part they have played in causing this progress to be achieved. Anyone who visited abroad between 1946 and 1948 knows from his personal experience the almost utter hopelessness which confronted us on all sides in the immediate postwar years. Today, in the place of hopelessness and despair, we see throughout the world constantly increasing evidence of the courage of free people who are determining to band themselves together and with us in the interest of the collective security of the free world.

The Greek-Turkish aid program which the Congress of the United States enacted in the spring of 1947 marked the turning point from a world of increasing chaos to a world of increasing hope. The Marshall plan which Congress enacted in early 1948 was a major step along the road, as was also the Vandenberg resolution of the same year. The North Atlantic Pact and the Mutual Defense Assistance Act were logical and heartening developments of the same pattern. Simultaneously with these developments, there were events elsewhere in the world which brought a new surge of pride to free men everywhere—events of transcendent importance such as the emergence of the free and independent nations of India, Pakistan, Israel, Indonesia, the Republic of Korea, and the Philippine Republic. Between 1948 and 1950 the tide of hope was running strong in the free world—so strong in fact, that the Communist masters who thrive on misery and chaos sought to put a halt to the resurgence of freedom by launching their unprovoked aggression against the Republic of Korea. But like King Canute, the masters of communism will find that the power of the tide cannot be repressed simply because they have ordered the waters to stand still.

A few days ago this same thought was expressed far better than I have been able to express it, by Chairman MAHON of the Armed Forces Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations. Speaking on the floor of the House of Representatives, Chairman MAHON said:

"Some people have been so busy blaming the situation on the complacency of the American people, or the Department of Defense, Department of State, or Congress, that they seem to have overlooked the fact that the disturbers of world peace, the Communist aggressors, and they alone, are responsible for the Korean situation. Let us get a clear perspective of the picture and put the blame where the blame belongs."

A cartoonist for one of our Washington newspapers put it even better, in a cartoon in which he showed Stalin sitting down, with Molotov by his side, both of them rocking with laughter. Stalin was reading a paper which said "Democrats blame GOP for Korean war" and Molotov was reading a paper which said "Republicans blame Democrats for Korean war." As the Chinese say, one picture is worth 10,000 words—and I wish I had an enlarged picture of that cartoon to show you, for it would convey to you, far better than any mere words, the thought I would like to leave with you this morning.

Celebration of One Hundred and Fiftieth Anniversary of the Boston Naval Shipyard

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ZALES N. ECTON

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 30 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. ECTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by the Secretary of the Navy, Francis P. Matthews, at the celebration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Naval Shipyard on Friday, August 25, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, Secretary Tobin, Governor Dever, Mayor Hynes, members of the Armed Forces, ladies and gentlemen, an historic occasion has transpired in Boston today. The recording of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the establishment of the Boston Naval Shipyard is an event pregnant with significance for every American. That is true because of the profound effect that the event which we commemorate here had upon the existence of the present day United States Navy. Without the contribution which the Boston Naval Shipyard has made to the current character of our modern Navy, we would not have the most powerful Navy in the world today. Without such a Navy and its glorious accomplishments of more than a century and a half, America could not have become the leading power in the family of nations. Without our Navy's and its Marines' triumphs on the sea, in the air and on the ground, the rare privilege of American citizenship would lose much of its luster and appeal.

The Navy has done much to make freedom and liberty realities for every American citizen in a world threatened by despotism and tyranny. The Boston Naval Shipyard's part in that accomplishment of the Navy is worthy of the anniversary tribute with which we salute its record this evening. I am grateful for the opportunity of joining with you, as Secretary of the Navy, in tendering that salute.

Tonight, the world as it was in 1800 when the Boston Naval Shipyard was established, is interesting to contemplate. John Adams was then President of the United States. The Republic had just been started on its road to Destiny. Liberty and freedom, through the American Revolution, had acquired a new meaning and significance in the minds and hearts of men.

The establishment of a safe home for liberty in a world which had been dominated by governments existing without regard for the choice of the people, and without the consent of those whom they governed, was an epoch-making event in the experience of mankind. It was the culmination of an expenditure of blood and treasure, and an exemplification of sublime and patriotic heroism such as has never been surpassed in the historical record of the average man's ceaseless struggle to elevate himself from subjugation and serfdom to the exalted stature of a free man.

The American Colonies had been the theater of that struggle. Massachusetts and Boston had been the stage on which some of its most vital scenes had transpired. Its benign results were, even then, beginning to blossom in all their fragrant promise.

It had not been a pretty struggle. It involved bitter and brutal war. Men had left home and business and wife and children, and had died to make their families and their neighbor's families free. They paid the supreme sacrifice to make it possible for the children of men to live in dignity and self-respect, as the Divine Creator whom they worshipped, each in his own way, had decreed was their inalienable right and privilege.

They had launched their fight for that blessing by starting a war with the mother country. They became aggressors for freedom. It was their powder and bullets, fired from the protecting ramparts bordering the roadways leading to Concord and Lexington, that started the fight that was to make them free. As the firers of the first shot to reverberate around the world, they were the aggressors in the Revolutionary War, but they violated the peace of their time in a most holy cause.

They sought liberty for mankind. They battled to make men free. They gave the world the ideal of man living in the majesty of his individual independence, and enjoying personal sovereignty over the destiny of his own soul.

It grips our hearts as we contemplate the enormity of the issue which their struggle embraced. Until they flew the banner of their cause, the world was mostly unaware of the goal which they espoused. Men's minds and bodies and souls were in chains, forged by despotic rulers who denied the principle that natural and unalienable rights exist for equal enjoyment by every human being. It was in a world universally joining in the rejection of that philosophy that they pursued their cause to victory.

The fruits of that victory have illumined the course of human experience in every generation and in every land throughout the intervening years. We, and our predecessors as Americans, have endured and flourished because of them.

They strengthen and make vibrant our system of government. They are reflected in the assurance which characterizes the relations of the citizen of this Nation with his Government. They are embodied in the confidence with which Americans regard their national future. They touch every home in the land, and they color and shade the social texture of our national family life.

If the battles of the Revolutionary War had been lost; if defeat had been the outcome instead of victory, the United States of America would never have been born. The history of the world could now well be a bleak and dismal record to review. If men had not had the will and the courage to fight and sacrifice and suffer and die at Concord and Lexington, at Bunker Hill, at Ticonderoga, at Brandywine, at Philadelphia, at Valley Forge, at Yorktown and on many other battlefields of the Revolution there would be no Fourth of July to celebrate, no Liberty Bell to revere, no Washington Monument or Lincoln Memorial to cherish, nor any other of our many inspiring national traditions to stir our souls and animate our patriotic emotions.

Nor would there be many of the blessings which distinguish our favored American way of life from the common lot of the average citizen under every other government in the world.

We of this generation must be brought to realize that those blessings and our favored position as a nation did not just come naturally.

They are the precious fruit of pain and suffering. They are the product of bravery and courage. They were won through the grimmest of self-sacrifice. They were possible because, as pilgrims and pioneers, the colonists of that day were hardened and trained by rigid self-denial for the test in mind and soul and body that the struggle for the freedom they craved involved. They realized the cost they would have to pay to attain their cherished goal. They measured the price that would be exacted in blood and tears and treasure to achieve the priceless possession and the unfettered enjoyment of the sacred privileges of liberty and freedom with which, through their God-fearing philosophy, they knew all men are endowed by their Creator.

We live in America today as their descendants and their successors. We are the most favored beneficiaries of their unselfishness, of their intrepid fortitude, of their penetrating foresight, of their sublimely inspired vision. The heritage of the accumulated blessings flowing from the cost they expended to vindicate their concept of human life, and the nature of man's unalienable rights in its enjoyment, have been bestowed upon us with lavish unrestraint.

We are the trustees of this sacred inheritance.

The perpetuation of their victory, and the survival of the doctrine that governments are instituted among men to secure the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness to mankind, will depend upon our individual worthiness to be citizens of the Nation they founded under God.

The test which confronts us, my fellow Americans, is no less than that. It is as grave as the issue which made the Colonists aggressors for liberty at Concord and Lexington, and sustained them through the ordeal which culminated in their immortal triumph at Yorktown.

The question which each of us individually must answer in the privacy of our own consciences, and which collectively as a nation we must answer before the world is: Are we worthy of the sacred trust that has been imparted to us?

Will we preserve inviolate the precious charter of individual liberty that is America, and ours to enjoy as her people?

We have become the custodians of the Holy Grail from which emanates the inspiration of the Magna Carta and the Declaration of Independence.

We are the repository of the Ark of the Covenant, in which are enshrined the imperishable hopes of man to live in peace and freedom.

Will we prove worthy of that trust? Will we prove true to our sacred mission? Will we survive the test?

I believe we shall. I am convinced we will because valiant and brave men from the homes and families of America are dying in Korea today in vindication of our national character and in fulfillment of the sacred mission that is ours.

Those men, in life, had but one desire in their hearts. Like all Americans, they craved peace. They hated nobody. They coveted nothing from anybody or any other nation. They knew of nothing any other nation could give them or our Nation that we did not have except peace—peace with freedom and honor.

Their sacrifice is our challenge. Let each one of us ask ourselves in our secret hearts, are we worthy of the price they are pouring out on the altar of peace and freedom. In our national consciousness let us inquire, as this Nation's citizens, are we collectively worthy of their last full measure of devotion?

It behooves each one of us to get right with himself if we are not already in line on that issue. There is nothing that we can give our country in its present grave need that can surpass the price delivered at her shrine by our soldier dead who have died in Korea.

The Boston Naval Shipyard, in all its 150 years of observations and memories, can find no more exalted patriotism to extol than their contribution to our country and the world represents.

The greatest challenge of our national life confronts us. It is for us in our generation to decide if it is ever again to be possible for men to live in freedom and peace. That is the struggle of the Revolution over again, not to acquire liberty and freedom, but to preserve them for ourselves, for the whole of mankind and its posterity.

Only an affirmative and vigorous national policy will make that possible. A true democracy ordinarily does not seek international accord through resort to violence. For 163 years, the United States has settled its international differences through peaceful negotiation. Never have we drawn the sword unless first attacked and so compelled to fight in self-defense. It is possible that we shall be forced to alter that pacific policy.

Self-preservation in the present world can be purchased only by those who are capable of resisting successfully a violation of their rights. We have no choice other than to build our military power to the strength which will make it impossible for any enemy to overcome us. To reach that position, all the resources of the Nation should be dedicated.

We should first get ready to ward off any possible attack, and, reversing the traditional attitude of a democracy, we should boldly proclaim our undeniable objective to be a world at peace. To have peace we should be willing, and declare our intention to pay any price, even the price of instituting a war to compel cooperation for peace.

Only the forces who do not want peace would oppose our efforts to transform the hostile nations embroiled in the present international conflicts into a tranquil world. They would brand our program as imperialistic aggression. We could accept that slander with complacency, for in the implementation of a strong, affirmative, peace-seeking policy, though it cast us in a character new to a true democracy, an initiator of a war of aggression, it would win for us a proud and popular title; we would become the first aggressors for peace.

It is a role which, in my opinion, we cannot escape. It is a cause to which we shall be compelled to dedicate our total and ultimate resources. From no other course can there be effected the salvation of the free world.

The X-Ray Grab by Omaha and Milwaukee Doctors

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, the reading public of our Nation was horrified to learn lately that certain doctors of our Republic, in our present hour of great peril, had used their medical knowledge and equipment to unduly enrich themselves, while others—their fellow Americans—were making great sacrifices in the Republic's behalf and some of our service men were doing the "heroic sublime"—giving their very lives for their country.

I am extremely sorry that the city of Omaha, Nebr., the largest city in the State, was compelled to suffer disgrace by reason of the greedy activities of Dr. Roy W. Fouts and that the honor of the city of Milwaukee, Wis., was also besmirched by the similar activities of one, Dr. Irving Cowan. I do not know what political faith Dr. Cowan professes but I do know that Dr. Fouts is a most reactionary Republican and was the big bell-weather of the American Medical Association in preventing the consideration and passage of the National Compulsory Health Insurance bill which in addition to providing for Compulsory Health Insurance on a National scale, but also contained chapters relating to the education and training of additional doctors, aid to medical schools and hospitals and other most necessary and important legislation in the light of what is right now happening today.

Both Dr. Fouts and Dr. Cowan were paid a total of $5 for each X-ray of the chest of selective service candidates and a reading thereof.

No effort was made by the Army men to ask for bids. If they had done so, I am advised by a competent X-ray doctor of Omaha, Nebr., that he would have done this work for a total fee of $2. The wholesale cost of each X-ray film of the type used is 70 cents, thus leaving $1.30 for interpretation of the film, which is perhaps the only real work any doctor would do in such a situation. I say this because I have knowledge of the fact that technicians do the X-ray work exclusively. A competent doctor can read X-ray films very rapidly as will be disclosed hereafter by the great volume of work each of these doctors performed daily.

I wish that the proper authorities, military and otherwise, would investigate this matter fully and learn if there is any truth to the rumor going the Omaha medical rounds that Dr. Fouts has in the past entertained almost royally the United States medical men and has an absolute "in" on United States medical services in the Omaha, Nebr., area. Let us have the facts as to whether entertainment was all which has been put out by Dr. Fouts.

In order that these men who have used the occasion of X-raying candidates for the selective service as an opportunity to garner in the gold, may be properly publicized and evaluated in the eyes of their friends and neighbors and the whole Nation as well as the entire world, I wish to place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, certain newspaper articles which appeared in the Omaha World-Herald in reference to this matter and in order that the seriousness of the situation might be fully appreciated, I wish to advise my readers in advance that the Omaha World-Herald is the most reactionary newspaper in the United States, west of the Chicago Tribune. The Omaha World-Herald articles follow:

DOCTOR GETS $1,125 DAILY—MILWAUKEE PHYSICIAN CHECKS X-RAYS

A Milwaukee physician has averaged $1,125 per working day so far this month, examining X-rays of men processed through an Army induction center there, the Associated Press reported Thursday afternoon.

The physician is Dr. Irving Cowan, who is paid $5 for each X-ray checked, said Capt. Thomas Appleby, Jr., public relations officer at the induction center. The X-ray machine is owned by the Army, and Dr. Cowan pays two technicians $1.50 per hour each for making the pictures.

This report came out after the United Press had reported from Chicago that an Omaha physician—later identified as Dr. Roy W. Fouts—had grossed about $10,000 already this month, taking and interpreting X-rays of draftees and volunteers here.

From Des Moines, the United Press reported that Iowa draftees and recruits are sent to hospitals for X-rays. Iowa Methodist Hospital handles most of the examinations at $2.50 each.

ARMY X-RAY BILL IS HIGH—OMAHAN GETS ABOUT $10,000 IN MONTH

One Omaha physician has grossed approximately $10,000 this month taking and interpreting chest X-rays for the Army.

This was revealed Thursday by a Fifth Army spokesman in Chicago to a United Press reporter.

While the name of the doctor was not revealed, it was found to be Dr. Roy W. Fouts.

Dr. Fouts said he did not consider the situation a matter for comment.

The Army's spokesman here, Col. Hardin C. Sweeney, said the Nebraska Military District had contacted all available X-ray specialists before awarding the business, but no other doctor seemed interested.

NEVER APPROACHED

But at least one other X-ray specialist said his office never had been approached by the military.

The United Press story from Chicago quoted a Fifth Army spokesman as saying: "There is nothing we can do about the situation * * * Colonel Sweeney told me that if he didn't have that one man, he'd have to shut down enlistment operations."

The spokesman gave this background:

An Army Department circular has set a price ceiling of $5 each for 14 by 17-inch chest X-rays, including interpretation.

HAD 177 IN 1 DAY

The Omaha doctor X-rayed 177 men in 1 day, fewer men in other days so far this month.

The war in Korea caught us napping without Army X-ray equipment and technicians, so the only way to get X-rays was to deal with private physicians.

Colonel Sweeney said that through August 21 the Nebraska Military District has sent 1,897 draftees and volunteers, plus an uncertain number of Reserve officers, to the physician for chest X-rays. All were at the $5 rate. The total number of cases is right at 2,000.

WOULD WELCOME OTHERS

He asserted that "we looked all over for someone to handle the business. If any other doctor in town now thinks he can handle some of it, I wish he would get in touch with me."

He said he had sought to have Army X-ray specialists assigned here to handle the work, but none is available.

Dr. Fouts said:

"They asked us if we would take it and, though it interferes with our regular route, we will continue to do it as long as it is satisfactory. War is an expensive business."

If the objective of the Chicago story "is to show Army extravagance," he said, "then no one is in a position to dispute that it is an expensive proposition. Let it go at that."

X-RAY PROFITS TO BE CHECKED—LARGE FEES GROSSED BY TWO DOCTORS

Two agencies in Washington said Friday they would investigate the profitable business of taking X-rays for the Army.

Fifth Army spokesmen in Chicago Thursday revealed that one Omaha physician has grossed about $10,000 so far this month, and a Fox Point, Wis., physician has been averaging $1,125 a day this month in the business of X-raying draftees and volunteers. The Omahan is Dr. Roy W. Fouts; the Milwaukee physician is Dr. Irving Cowan.

BACK IN TAXES

Representative VINSON, Democrat, of Georgia, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said his committee would investigate these findings.

"Of course," he told the Associated Press, "the Government will get a lot of that back in income taxes."

Figures from other sources Friday indicated that with a mass operation allowing full utilization of a X-ray machine, the cost of producing a 14 by 17-inch negative is about $1.35. The Army pays the physicians $5 for producing and interpreting such a negative. Private X-ray charges usually are much higher.

PAYS 10 CENTS

But at the Chicago recruiting station the Army takes and develops the negatives, then pays three civilian doctors an average of only 10 cents per negative for interpretation.

The United Press quoted Dr. Burt R. Shurly, president of the Detroit Tuberculosis Sanatorium, as saying that establishment has been taking and interpreting X-rays for the Army at $2 each.

That price "covers the cost of the whole operation," Dr. Shurly said. The institution agreed to take the business at that rate "as a patriotic gesture" when Army equipment broke down, he said.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY DOCTORS GIVE FREE DRAFT EXAMS

One hundred and twenty Nebraska physicians serve without pay in making preliminary examinations of some potential draftees, Lt. Col. Frank B. O'Connell, deputy director of State selective service, said Friday.

Colonel O'Connell said the doctors work with the State's 96 draft boards. They examine men with physical defects so obvious that there is a serious question whether they need even be sent to an induction center for examination.

SMALLER X-RAY FILMS PROPOSED

LINCOLN.—State Health Director Dr. Frank Ryder suggested Friday the Army might use small 4- by 5-inch negatives for X-rays and save money.

He said 55 cents a negative might be a fair estimate of cost. The small negatives are used by the State in giving free chest X-rays. The small negatives are viewed through an enlarger for study and then, if necessary, a larger 14- by 17-inch picture is recommended.

At Omaha the Army is paying $5 for each large picture. No small ones are taken.

SIX MORE X-RAY MACHINES HERE—NONE SO HANDY, CHEAP AS DR. FOUTS'

There are six Government-owned X-ray machines in the Omaha area which might help share the job of examining draftees and volunteers for the Army.

But none is available to do the job as handily or at lower cost than Dr. Roy W. Fouts is doing it for the Army, Col. Hardin C. Sweeney said Saturday.

A Fifth Army spokesman in Chicago recently revealed that Dr. Fouts grossed about $10,000 in the first 21 days of August, taking and interpreting chest X-rays of Army recruits at $5 per man. Other information indicated that the actual cost of this work would be between $1.35 and $2 per man.

WHERE MACHINES ARE

These are the Government-owned machines here:

Three new ones at the new Veterans' Administration Hospital at Fortieth and Center Streets.

One at the Veterans' Administration clinic in the Federal Building, Fifteenth and Dodge Streets.

One at Offutt Air Force Base, 10 miles south of downtown Omaha.

One broken-down one—left over from World War II—at Fort Omaha, Thirtieth and Fort Streets.

The Veterans' Administration has not yet hired anyone to operate the new hospital or its equipment. Colonel Sweeney has said he has not been able to obtain X-ray technicians from the Army, even if he had a machine to use.

VA CHARGES $10

The VA charges the Army $10 a plate for pictures taken by the machine at the Federal Building, Colonel Sweeney said. Dr. H. W. McFadden, head of the VA clinic and acting manager of the VA here, flatly refused to give a reporter any information about the use of the machine or the price charged the Army.

"You'll have to talk to Carl Gray in Washington about that," Dr. McFadden declared.

Mr. Gray is the Veterans' Administrator. The World-Herald Washington Bureau found VA offices there closed Saturday.

SAC MACHINE USED DAILY

A Strategic Air Command spokesman said the machine there is being used daily in connection with Air Force physical exams. SAC technicians are doing X-ray diagnostic work and handling blood tests for the Army, but are not doing routine chest X-rays.

Taking recruits to Offutt Base for X-rays would slow the processing of draftees, the SAC spokesman said.

The machine at Fort Omaha was used for processing draftees during World War II, Colonel Sweeney said, but was turned over to the Navy as surplus when the Army gave up the fort. It is now broken down and would cost several thousand dollars and about a month's time to repair, he said.

In Lincoln, State Health Director Dr. Frank Ryder suggested the Army could save money by using 4 by 5 inch negatives instead of the big 14 by 17 it now uses.

The smaller negatives cost about 55 cents each. The State uses them for its free tuberculosis X-ray program, then recommends a larger X-ray if bad signs show up.

It Was Later Than They Thought

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD T. MILLER

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. MILLER of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, eagerness for a recess or adjournment of this long session would be natural even if it were not an election year. But if the majority leadership sends us home while our young men are dying in Korea and our people are apprehensive as to the future, I think the homecoming may not be as pleasant as would normally be the case.

The rank and file of our citizens are deeply disturbed at the way in which we have been losing the peace since VJ-day. They have closed ranks to meet the threats from abroad as good Americans always do, but they are filled with foreboding and frustration. They are shocked by the casualty lists, and fear, with some justification, that they are even heavier than yet announced.

They want a stop put to indecision, fumbling, and extravagance. Parents are demanding to know why, only 5 years after a complete victory in World War II, their sons must be sacrificed again in strange and far-off lands, with the odds so often against them.

Every American, past middle age, has a right to be sick of the old phrase "too little and too late." He has been paying enough taxes and, in most cases, has fought or sacrificed enough in one or more wars to have earned a respite from that old curse.

No, Mr. Speaker, the American people do not want Congress to adjourn while there is a stone left unturned that might aid our men in Korea, and that is not all. They want us to stay on the job until we have a national policy and the ship of state is following a consistent course.

There is every reason they should feel that way. The present administration, by the smear attacks on the Eightieth Congress, has encouraged the people to hold Congress to blame for every thing unpleasant. It is hard for many to understand that our current difficulties stem from other causes, and the principal errors lie on other doorsteps.

Our people are apprehensive and disillusioned. They are shocked to find that the brave talk, emanating from high places, that we were ready at the "drop of a hat" was based on wishful thinking; that the "red herrings" had swum away with our atomic bomb and other top secrets; that Korea was important, after all; and that we have some interest in Formosa, but are not sure just what. General MacArthur has been chastised for saying what its military importance is to us.

The fact that foreign policy is a responsibility of the administration, not the Congress, does not alter the over-all duty of the Congress to be alert to every danger from either within or without. It is not enough to name various watchdog committees—Congress must be ever on watch. It should be especially alert just now. We have in the last few days appropriated many billions—even as we did in preceding years—to build up our defenses. We have learned to our sorrow that only one defense dollar out of seven of the last fifty billion was spent on arms and the tools of war. We have known all along that the Department of Defense had overruled the demand of Congress for a 70-group Air Force, even after we provided the necessary funds.

Here, Mr. Speaker, are just a few of the questions to which the American people are entitled to answers and with which the Members of Congress should be supplied when they return to their districts and are called upon to explain to constituents.

Do we intend to have UMT as soon as instructors are available, or when we return to a peacetime footing, or is it just talk?

What do we intend to do when our GI's fight their way back to the thirty-eighth parallel? Do we stop or go into North Korea?

What are we going to do about Formosa? Shall we stand inactive while east Germany arms to invade west Germany? Will we resist Red China's admission to the UN? What is our new policy toward Nationalist China? Should we secure bases in Spain?

Yes, Mr. Speaker, we should have answers to these questions and many others. True, Congress does not formulate the answers but certainly we have the right to be advised in a general way what our President and State Department have decided as to national policy. We are entitled to know, and the national safety requires, that we have one that is consistent on all fronts. This we have lacked in the past. Our people are rightly concerned over the bungling that has continued since Yalta. They remember that the same hands are at the helm of the ship of state as when Henry Wallace was fired as Secretary of Commerce for making a speech that had been approved a few days earlier. They realize that we are under the same management that described the Chinese Communists as harmless agrarian reformers; that denounced the investigation of Alger Hiss as a red herring, that declined to carry out the program for which large sums were appropriated in 1946 for the National Guard and Organized Reserves and in 1948 and 1949 for a 70-group Air Force.

Mr. Truman only last January 5 announced that the United States Government will not provide military aid or advice to Chinese forces on Formosa, and on June 1, he told a news conference that the world was closer to peace than at any time in 5 years. South Korea was invaded 24 days later. We cannot afford many more slips like that. Until we chart the course or have a new pilot, Congress better stay on deck.

Once again our defenders are feeling the pinch of too little. Let us hope and pray we can avoid the epitaph "too late." Recent events have proven to our leaders that it is later than they thought.

Strengthen Our Espionage Laws

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, August 29, 1950

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following timely article from the Daily Evening Item, Lynn, Mass., of Monday, August 28, 1950:

STRONGER SPY LAWS NEEDED

As is usually the case with legislation destined to ride through Congress in some form or other, no matter what, because of its vital nature, all sorts of hitch-hikers tried to climb aboard the defense production bill.

Most persistent of the would-be free passengers was the Mundt-Ferguson amendment for control of the Communists. Like most of the seventy-odd other hopefuls, it wound up walking.

The free-ride tradition is a political form of lobbying based on the philosophy of scratch my back and I'll scratch yours. Many times it is the only way measures detoured by a lot of fence-straddling can get back on the road to passage.

There could have been no argument for straddling, however, even among the most vote-conscious Congressmen, in the bill for defense production. The public was ready for some form of economic control when the lawmakers on the Potomac first began hemming and hawing.

Such a measure certainly deserved to be driven home by itself, without the confusion of a lot of sudden stowaways.

By the same reasoning, any bill for the control of subversives, whether their luggage is labeled Communist or any other form of potential treason, is far too important to America's future to be tossed into the same legislative baggage compartment with other measures.

Nobody doubts that communism started war rolling in Korea. Nobody—not even Malik and his back-seat drivers in Moscow—has any illusions about what Russian communism is trying to achieve in the UN.

Here at home the American politbureau, convicted of conspiracy to overthrow our form of government, is at large on bail awaiting appeal. At home also, we have just nabbed the eighth person in recent months to be charged with giving away our atomic secrets to Russia.

We have no idea how many others got away. But what has happened so far is a clear sign that we must strengthen our espionage laws. It must be done without hysteria—legislation that neither grabs a free ride nor carries any other free riders on its tailboard.

Otherwise we are likely to backtrack to the witch-burning days of Salem while the sell-outs ride off with the secrets of Los Alamos.

The Honorable William T. Powers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, our country has suffered a great loss. A brilliant jurist, a brave soldier, a good American, has been called to eternal rest. Supreme Court Justice William T. Powers, a veteran of both World Wars, a former Republican leader of my assembly district, died of a heart attack at the age of 53.

Born in Manhattan on February 12, 1897, he was left motherless at the age of two, and brought up in Brooklyn by his father's family. He was working as an office boy at the time he took his examination for West Point. He finished at the top of the list and was then appointed to the Military Academy, from which he was graduated in 1918 with honors.

In World War I he served with distinction and remained with the Army until 1920, at which time he took up the study of law and was admitted to the New York Bar in 1924. He subsequently was admitted to the United States Supreme Court and to the California Bar. His legal activities were not only Statewide, but national and even international. For more than 25 years he was active politically in Republican circles in my district, county, city, and the Nation. In all those years while actively participating as a Republican leader, and many times as a candidate, he made friends of those politically opposed to him. No matter how bitter a campaign was he never had a harsh word for any one.

Between the World Wars, Justice Powers served with distinction in the New York National Guard. He returned to the Army in World War II and served overseas in various areas throughout the Pacific with outstanding courage and devotion. He was elected to the New York State supreme court in 1946. A devout Catholic, he found time to devote himself to every worthy civic and charitable endeavor in our community, participating in Protestant and Jewish charities as well as those of his own faith.

He rendered invaluable service to the cause of Israel when he accompanied me in 1947 to the State of Israel after the untimely death of our good friend, the late Col. David (Mickey) Marcus.

To his beloved widow, Mrs. Anita L. Powers, and his devoted children, Catherine and William, Jr., we extend our heartfelt condolences. We join them in mourning a very grievous loss.

Too Many Cooks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER B. HUBER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Evening Star of August 29, 1950:

TOO MANY COOKS

We seem to be reentering a phase in public discussion of foreign policy and allied subjects by men high in Government that led President Roosevelt, in World War II, to take positive action.

Because of the number and often conflicting statements to the public emanating from members of his own official family, Mr. Roosevelt finally approved machinery through which such statements were cleared before they were delivered. Such clearances became one of the functions of the Office of War Information.

The MacArthur episode, coming on the heels of Navy Secretary Matthews' private adventure in the public discussion of foreign policy, poses the same sort of question to Mr. Truman. He was represented yesterday as saying that both incidents are now closed. He was also represented as believing that there can be but one voice on American foreign policy and that voice must be the President's.

He is right, of course. The conduct of our foreign policy is assigned to the President by the Constitution. In its discussion by men highly placed in Government, he must either approve in advance what is to be said or run the risk of finding himself and his State Department embarrassed in the development of foreign policy by various versions of what it is, some of them lending themselves to the ready interpretation of hostile propaganda. If Mr. Truman does not insist now on the same sort of procedure that his predecessor in office found necessary, he may be forced to do so eventually.

General MacArthur's undelivered statement to the Veterans of Foreign Wars, which had been too thoroughly distributed in advance to be killed by the President's request that it be withheld, should have been submitted to the President, if only as a matter of official courtesy. In this case the President may have objected to General MacArthur's own oversimplified version of the "fallacious" and "threadbare" arguments of those who oppose defending Formosa for fear of alienating continental Asia. That is not the whole story, of course. But whatever may have been the soundness of the arguments against intercession in Formosa before the beginning of aggression by the North Koreans, the arguments were abandoned by the President from that date onward.

For the most part, however, General MacArthur's explanation of the strategic importance of Korea undoubtedly expressed the same cold, hard, and entirely logical reasoning which prompted President Truman, on June 27, to announce that he had "ordered the Seventh Fleet to prevent any attack on Formosa." Nor is there any substantial difference between the President's letter to Ambassador Austin, underscoring by repetition Mr. Austin's recent statement to the Security Council outlining our Formosan policy, and General MacArthur's statement on the same subject. What difference there is screens from General MacArthur's blunt emphasis on the interests of the United States as contrasted with Ambassador Austin's more diplomatic references to the United Nations and his use of such terms as "neutralizing action" to describe the use of our armed forces.

The President's objection to both the MacArthur and the Matthews statements is based on other considerations than the substance of what they had to say.

In the case of Mr. Matthews' suggestion that we might be forced into a war of aggression in order to "compel cooperation for peace," the Navy Secretary was not advocating any such step. He was merely presenting the point of view, frequently discussed in Washington and other parts of the country, of "preventive war" in which we would seize the advantages of the initiative, in the belief that war is inevitable, instead of leaving such advantages to a known aggressor. Mr. Matthews tried to make it plain that he spoke as an individual. As long as he is Secretary of the Navy, he cannot speak as an individual. What he says assumes importance, not because Mr. Matthews said it but because the Secretary of the Navy said it. And when the Secretary of the Navy discusses, no matter how objectively, the theory of preventive war he tends to nullify the Secretary of State's discussion of the same subject, in which the theory was ruled out as contradicting the principles which support our foreign policy.

General MacArthur's role as a military commander is to execute but not to promulgate foreign policy. It would be more becoming for a man who has won such distinction in his own field to stick to it.

Do Russia and Its Satellite Nations Get Strategic and Critical Material From United States?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, I was greatly impressed with a radio news report that I heard delivered by Frank Edwards over the Mutual Broadcasting System on Monday evening, August 28, 1950. Mr. Edwards is sponsored by the American Federation of Labor. In his report he informed his audience, reaching from coast to coast, of a matter that should claim the attention of every American. It is a matter of such importance that in my opinion it should have congressional attention. The report to which I refer was as follows:

EXCERPT FROM FRANK EDWARDS' BROADCAST, AUGUST 28, 1950, MUTUAL BROADCASTING SYSTEM

For days I have been trying to learn the name of the American outfit that shipped a load of molybdenum to Britain, where it was transferred to a Russian vessel for shipment to the Soviet Union. There in Russia, the precious molybdenum is to be used in hardening steel, possibly armor steel for tanks.

The Commerce Department told me flatly that the name of that outfit which sold the molybdenum to be used in Russian steel mills is not public property—unless Congress started an investigation.

I encountered the same rebuff in trying to find out which American oil companies were shipping oil to North Korea and Communist China as late as 60 days ago. I was similarly rebuffed in trying to find out who had the export licenses for the cotton, used in making high explosives, which the Isbrandsen boats were trying to deliver to the Chinese Commies when the Nationalists fired on them.

It would take a congressional investigation to pry that information from the files of the Commerce Department so I am told—and the more I think of it—the stronger becomes my conviction that a congressional investigation of this operation would be well worth it.

To me it seems only fair that the mothers and fathers and wives of this country have a right to know who supplied the enemy with the oil for his tanks, the guncotton for his artillery and the molybdenum for his armor. If our people are going to supply the sons to die in front of enemy weapons, then our people are entitled to know who among us supplied the enemy with those weapons.

A congressional investigation of the export licenses by which some American companies make profits selling war materials to the enemy is in order. And while they are about it, the Congressmen might also inquire into the transactions by which stainless steel is shipped to Sweden and from there to Russia.

Why doesn't Congress open this scheme to public gaze—and let the people of America get a look at these characters who are making profits today selling disaster for tomorrow.

One hundred and fifty American furriers spending $50,000,000 in Russia for furs to make coats for the women of America—and bullets for their husbands and brothers.

In New York today a group of union dock workers refused to unload a cargo of hides, glassware, and 32 tons of ham from Czechoslovakia. Union shop steward Pat Riley said, "Let the owners handle the stuff themselves. Some of us have kids in Korea."

In addition to the above there has also come to my attention a news bulletin issued by Paul O. Peters, editor, of Washington, D. C., dated Thursday, August 24, 1950. It is entitled "Foreign Transactions of the United States With Iron Curtain Countries." It likewise contains information that is startling and supports the criticism made by Frank Edwards in his news report to which I have referred. The news bulletin of Mr. Peters, reads as follows:

FOREIGN TRANSACTIONS OF THE UNITED STATES WITH IRON CURTAIN COUNTRIES

The revelation today that a $100,000 shipment of molybdenum, licensed for export to Great Britain, was transshipped to Russia is having serious repercussions in high governmental circles.

Molybdenum, a highly critical and strategic material used in alloying steel is currently quoted at $2 60 to $3 a pound. Export licenses for strategic materials are issued in the Office of International Trade of the Commerce Department, subject to the approval of the State Department.

The Washington Daily News reports "Officials have been unable thus far to give the name of the firm which obtained the license for the molybdenum shipment." This is a confession of a weakness in our export licensing system. The names of all parties involved in the transaction should promptly be made public. Those responsible for any intentional violation of our laws should be punished, and Government employees who participated in the transaction should be transferred to positions where they no longer can favor Russia and her satellites.

Summary of foreign grants and credits to iron-curtain countries (July 1, 1945 to Mar. 31, 1950)

	Grants	Credits	Total
Albania	$20,000,000		$20,000,000
Czechoslovakia	183,000,000	$30,000,000	213,000,000
Poland	365,000,000	78,000,000	443,000,000
Yugoslavia	299,000,000	6,000,000	305,000,000
Hungary	2,000,000	16,000,000	18,000,000
U. S. S. R.	243,000,000	223,000,000	465,000,000
Total	1,112,000,000	353,000,000	1,465,000,000

The Office of International Trade reported that during 1947 our export trade with Russia reached a volume of $149,129,000 while our imports were but $77,078,000. During 1947, we shipped the Russians $23,428,000 of machine tools; $19,992,000 of electrical machinery and $17,794,000 of mining, well, and pump machinery. We imported from Russia that year $41,000,000 of undressed furs and about $18,000,000 of manganese and chrome ores, and platinum ingots.

One item the Russians seem to buy with alacrity is books and maps of the United States; the imports of which totaled $660,000 in 1947.

The present Korean conflict and the stalemate in the United Nations Security Council should be ample warning to our State Department appeasers that the friendship of Russia cannot be bought with grants and credits, or through international trade.

The information contained in the radio report of Mr. Edwards and the News Bulletin of Mr. Peters reveals a situation that calls for immediate consideration by Congress. The American people should know the why and wherefor of a policy that permits strategic and critical materials to be shipped either directly or indirectly to the countries that are the enemies of democracy. Why should our boys be called upon to fight communism and at the same time our Government grant licenses to export materials that can be used in producing and operating weapons of war against them? There is no justification for such a course. It is time it was stopped.

I have introduced House Resolution 831 to create a select committee to be composed of seven Members of the House of Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker.

The committee is authorized and directed to conduct a full and complete investigation and study to determine the extent to which materials and instruments of war have been or are being exported from the United States, either directly or through other countries, to countries whose possession of such materials and instruments of war is inimical to the national defense and security of the United States.

The committee would be required to report to the House as soon as practicable during the present Congress the results of its investigation and study, together with such recommendations as it deems advisable.

This resolution has been referred to the Rules Committee and awaits its action.

In order that there might be the quickest possible hearing of the matter, and inquiry made as to who is responsible for the policy, and the extent to which export licenses have been issued, to whom and for what materials, I have also brought the matter to the attention of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House. That committee by action taken this morning has directed that hearings shall be held immediately.

A special committee has been appointed to conduct the inquiry consisting of Messrs. ROBERT CROSSER, chairman, Democrat, Ohio; LINDLEY BECKWORTH, Democrat, Texas; J. PERCY PRIEST, Democrat, Tennessee; OREN HARRIS, Democrat, Arkansas; CHARLES A. WOLVERTON, Republican, New Jersey; CARL HINSHAW, Republican, California; LEONARD W. HALL, Republican, New York, and JOSEPH P. O'HARA, Republican, Minnesota.

1950 Resolutions of Fraternal Order of Eagles

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, the Fraternal Order of Eagles, meeting this month in Minneapolis for its Grand Aerie Convention, passed resolutions on seven subjects of great importance today.

I have been a member of this fine organization for 28 years and feel that these 1950 resolutions will be of interest not only to my colleagues in the Congress, but to all readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I commend the officers and members of the Eagles for the true American spirit reflected in the resolutions that follow:

ALL-AMERICAN CONFERENCE TO COMBAT COMMUNISM

Whereas the All-American Conference to Combat Communism represents the determined opposition to communism of over 50 of the fraternal, veterans, civic and educational and religious organizations of our Nation; and

Whereas the All-American Conference to Combat Communism seeks to strengthen the workings of democracy, to support the strengthening of the military defenses of America and its allies, and to demonstrate the moral and economic superiority of democracy to communism, fascism or any other totalitarian tyranny; and

Whereas the Fraternal Order of Eagles became a charter member of the All-American Conference to Combat Communism, recognizing the Communist Party of America as not a political organization for political purposes, but a conspiracy of secret agents of a foreign power, directed and under the strict discipline of the Kremlin rulers in Moscow; and

Whereas the ideals and principles of a fraternal organization, and the ideals and principles of a democratic Nation, are incompatible with the aims and objectives of a Communist Party, which rejects the rule of the majority and rights of the minority, functions as a one-party dictatorship, uses secret police and a rule of fear to eliminate opposition, seeks to destroy freedom of religious worship, uses the cloak of democratic liberties to destroy liberty: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Fraternal Order of Eagles, its delegates in convention assembled, recognizing Communist subversion as a clear and present danger to democratic institutions, pledges its full support to the All-American Conference to Combat Communism in its crusade to strengthen American democracy, to develop awareness of our American heritage and to control and expose subversive activities of emissaries of the Kremlin in our land, and be it further

Resolved, That the Fraternal Order of Eagles go on record as favoring the quarantining of known and revealed members of the Communist Party, barring them from positions in industry, labor or Government where they can sabotage or undermine the security of our Nation, thus meeting the menace of subversion without subverting the basic framework of essential freedoms for which we fight.

FRATERNAL MOBILIZATION FOR CIVILIAN DEFENSE

Whereas the development of new and powerful weapons of mass destruction makes vulnerable the home cities of America and Canada, in the event of another global war; and

Whereas civilian defense precautions require the organization and training of volunteer defense workers to work with the established agencies of local government in minimizing the effects of atomic, chemical, and biological warfare; and

Whereas fraternal and civic organizations can aid in the recruitment of volunteers for emergency service, as well as training citizens generally to protect themselves from fire and blast damage in the event of enemy air raids; and

Whereas fraternal and civic organizations can add muscles, hours and determination to the full mobilization of community resources for the common defense which, in addition to limiting the effect of enemy attack, includes full production, inflation control, emergency housing, labor supply, plant utilization, blood bank reserves, war bond sales, and services to servicemen: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Fraternal Order of Eagles, its delegates in convention assembled, pledge the whole-hearted support and strength of this order to the National Defense Program, our every member pledged to the defense of our cities, our way of life and the great freedoms which are our heritage; and be it further

Resolved, That the Eagles urge the establishment of Civilian Mobilization Councils, to be composed of representatives of civic organizations and social agencies, to assure effective cooperation between public defense agencies and community organizations for the common defense; and be it further

Resolved, That the grand worthy president be directed to appoint an Eagle War Services Board of five members to develop programs for aerie support of established defense agencies and convert the Eagle program for community action to all-out participation in the national defense and preparedness program.

FELLOWSHIP BETWEEN FREE PEOPLES

Whereas one of the significant and hopeful postwar developments has been the widespread growth of people-to-people movements in international affairs, strengthening relationships between governments of the free world by acts of individual and group helpfulness and fellowship; and

Whereas thousands of American churches, schools, fraternal lodges, communities, individuals, and organized groups have extended aid to persons in war-ravaged countries and furthered international understanding by cultural exchanges, interchange of students, exchange of correspondence and ideas; and

Whereas many American and Canadian organizations have extended their services and influence to free nations of the world, with labor groups in the forefront of the fight for democracy through the new federation of non-Communist labor unions and service clubs establishing units in all free nations, the world around; and

Whereas fraternal societies in America need to expand and broaden their concept of fraternal brotherhood among men, meeting their measure of responsibility for world leadership from the democratic influences in our society; and

Whereas the tremendous support given by local lodges of the Fraternal Order of Eagles to Project Berlin, the sending of food and needed supplies to the eastern outpost of the free world on the eve of the threatened Communist demonstrations in that city, demonstrates Eagle awareness of the need for fraternal participation in the worldwide struggle for human freedom: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Fraternal Order of Eagles, through its delegates in convention assembled, strengthen the bonds of fraternal goodwill and international cooperation among the free peoples of the world by support of established overseas relief agencies, by individual acts of fellowship and helpfulness, by aiding the needy and bringing to the people of the free world a better understanding of the fraternal spirit and fellowship objectives of America; and be it further

Resolved, That the Fraternal Order of Eagles become a truly international fraternal organization by establishing Eagle units in foreign nations, authorizing the board of grand trustees to establish the provisions under which such outposts of fraternalism shall operate, linking such Eagle units in other lands with Aeries and members in the United States and Canada by the bonds of fraternal brotherhood, shared ideals and acts of helpful fellowship.

STRENGTHENING THE UNITED NATIONS

Whereas strengthening the United Nations would develop world wide support for international law and order, creating an agency for restraining acts of aggression and building peace, with the honor and integrity of nations insured; and

Whereas specialized agencies of the United Nations have shown the possibility of effective international cooperation in providing food and essential supplies for children and war refugees in devastated countries, in lessening the ravages of malaria, tuberculosis, and cholera in the postwar world, and in providing loans and assistance for reconstruction and development purposes; and

Whereas the flag of the United Nations flies alongside the flag of the United States as troops in Korea, under the command of Gen. Douglas MacArthur, fight the aggression of tyranny in our world; and

Whereas within or outside of the framework of the United Nations, it is imperative that the free and non-Communist nations of the world pool and integrate their military, economic, and moral force, standing together in a resolute defense of their right to be free: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Fraternal Order of Eagles, its delegates in convention assembled, urge the strengthening of the United Nations, the elimination of the veto power in the Security Council, the creation of an international police force to discourage breaches of peace, so that, with or without the presence of Soviet Russia and its satellite nations, the United States can be the great force for peace and progress in the world; and be it further

Resolved, That the Eagles urge that the international police force of the United Nations be known as the United Nations Legion, to be recruited on a volunteer basis from citizens of participating nations, to fly the flag of the United Nations alongside the various national colors, to be organized and equipped and located so as to effectively resist acts of direct aggression against nations.

TELLING THE STORY OF DEMOCRACY

Whereas the ideological conflict of our divided world is represented not only in the massing of armies and armaments, but in the struggle for the support and loyalties of peoples; and

Whereas the Voice of America broadcasts, the radio medium used to promote a better understanding of life in the United States to peoples on both sides of the iron curtain, has blasted the false propaganda picturing America as a land of millionaires, gangsters and oppressed workers; and

Whereas the Crusade for Freedom broadcasts, operating a powerful radio station on the edge of the iron curtain and planning a network of such freedom stations, portrays to the peoples of the world the true American aims for friendship and fellowship with all nations; and

Whereas these and other broadcasts, beamed at the satellite nation peoples, surrounded by barbed wire and the rule of fear, represent our only way of bringing the message of democracy to the Kremlin-dominated parts of the world; and

Whereas the time and huge sums of money spent by Kremlin rulers in seeking to jam these freedom broadcasts, and their propaganda barrage to separate our Nation from its allies by arousing distrust of American aims and objectives, demonstrate the Kremlin fear of the weapon that makes men free—the truth; Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Fraternal Order of Eagles, by its delegates in convention assembled, endorse the Voice of America program of our State Department, the new Crusade for Freedom radio programs, and all ways of piercing the iron curtain to bring the independent voice of a free America to the prisoner peoples of the enslaved nations, and to our friends and allies in the ranks of the plain people of the world.

ALASKA, HAWAII, AND GUAM

Whereas recent developments in Asia high light the importance of the western links in the chain of American defenses, and the people of these outposts of American democracy face great responsibilities in preserving our free way of life; and

Whereas the Territory of Alaska is our first line of defense in the Northwest, from which our planes can rise to repel airborne invaders, and the people of Alaska, as good citizens and good soldiers, have won the rights to full status as an integral part of the Union; and

Whereas the Territory of Hawaii, larger in area and greater in population than several of our States, is a vital stronghold of America in the mid-Pacific, and its people have demonstrated their loyalty and capacity for self-government; and

Whereas the island of Guam was a bastion of the free world in the recent war and is an important base for American defense forces, and its people have won the right to citizenship by a record of patriotism and service second to none: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Fraternal Order of Eagles, through its delegates in convention assembled, urge the Congress of the United States to admit to full statehood the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii, and endorse the granting of Territorial status and full citizenship to the people of the island of Guam.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY PROJECT

Whereas a deep water ship channel from the Atlantic Ocean to the Great Lakes region, where a large share of the American armaments are produced, would be of great value to the national defense program; and

Whereas the availability of high-grade ore deposits in Labrador and Quebec, combined with a deepened St. Lawrence waterway, would assure full-scale operation of the Central States' steel industry; and

Whereas an inland highway of commerce from the Atlantic Ocean to the ports of the Great Lakes would provide direct access by sea to the ports of the world for the industrial and agricultural heart of America and Canada; and

Whereas the St. Lawrence power development would generate millions of kilowatts of electrical energy to stimulate the industrial development and economic welfare of the Northeastern States of the United States and the eastern provinces of the Dominion of Canada; and

Whereas the building of canals, locks, and dams around the unnavigable sections of the St. Lawrence River would expand and develop the national economies of the United States of America and Canada, thus benefiting all sections of the continent: Therefore be it Resolved, That the Fraternal Order of Eagles urge the Congress of the United States to approve the development, jointly with the Dominion of Canada, of the St. Lawrence waterway project.

Academy of Foreign Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUSSELL V. MACK

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 5, 1950

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Speaker, it is as important to our national welfare that our country have well trained and competent State Department personnel to work to keep the Nation out of war as that the Nation have well trained and competent military personnel to win a war when our Nation gets into one.

We, now, have, at Annapolis and West Point, academies to train young men to provide leadership for our Army, Navy, and Marine Corps to win wars. We ought to have an academy, organized and operated somewhat after the fashion of West Point and Annapolis, to train and educate young men to a state of competency and understanding of diplomacy that will lessen the chances of our Nation becoming involved in wars.

I am introducing into the House of Representatives tomorrow a bill authorizing the establishment of such an academy to be known as the United States Academy of Foreign Service. The main purpose of my bill is to provide a well trained, nonpartisan personnel of outstanding quality for the State Department.

It is no secret that in the past and present too many of our State Department executive personnel, the personnel on whose decision often depends our foreign policy and whether or not we shall get into or keep out of war, is chosen not primarily for fitness but because of wealth or political pull in the right places. The existence of this kind of ill-trained personnel in our Department of State is conducive to the kind of blunders most likely to get the Nation involved in war.

The bill which I will introduce tomorrow provides that cadets to be eligible to enter the United States Academy of Foreign Service must be between the ages of 21 and 25 and must have had at least 2 years of college education prior to entering the Academy.

Appointments of cadets to the Academy would be made by Members of the Senate and House, with each Member having "not less than one appointee" in the Academy at any one time. This would provide for an initial enrollment of about 500. This could be expanded from time to time, if deemed necessary, by increasing the number of positions each Congressman is entitled to be filled.

All candidates for admission would be required to pass such qualifying examinations as the Academy management might determine.

In order to prevent the State Department, as now constituted, from dominating the staffing or training of the Foreign Service Academy which my bill would establish, the bill provides that the Academy shall be governed by a board of five trustees. It provides that this board shall consist of the Secretary of State and of two Members of the Senate and two of the House. It provides that the Vice President shall appoint the two Senate Members and the Speaker the two House Members. The Senate and House appointees, in both cases, must come from opposing parties, thereby assuring a nonpartisan board of trustees as far as possible.

The bill provides that the Board of Trustees would employ a president for the Academy at a salary not to exceed $20,000 a year.

Members of the Academy's faculty, under the terms of my bill, would be selected by the Academy's president with and by the consent of a committee on faculty. This committee on faculty, the bill provides, shall be appointed one from each of the Nation's 12 Federal Reserve districts and from lists of names of prominent educators submitted by the governors of the several States. Members of the committee on faculty shall serve without salary but shall be entitled to travel and per diem expenses.

The cost of operating a United States Academy of Foreign Service will not be burdensomely large. The cost of operating the Naval Academy during the coming year is estimated at $5,666,000 and that of operating the Army Academy at West Point at $5,708,000. The cost of operating a United States Academy of Foreign Service should be somewhat less than in the case of these two military schools since the enrollment in the Academy of Foreign Service, at least during its beginning years, would be much smaller. The establishment of such an Academy, as my bill proposes, would, in my opinion, be one of the best investments our Government could make toward the preservation of peace for the American people.

While I have no idea that legislation of this nature can be enacted at this late date in the session, I believe the wisdom of establishing a United States Academy of Foreign Service should be thoroughly investigated and studied at the earliest opportunity by the appropriate committees of the House.

I am convinced that the establishment of such an Academy along the lines suggested by my bill will be a great step toward avoiding future wars and maintaining the peace which is so ardently desired by all Americans.

How Communists Operate

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN S. WOOD

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following interview with J. Edgar Hoover, published in United States News and World Report:

HOW COMMUNISTS OPERATE

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—What should a citizen know about subversive activities? What should he do? Is there any danger to the United States in the mild-mannered acquaintance who insists that Russia is the only true democracy? President Truman recently asked that organizations and individuals report to the FBI all information relating to espionage, sabotage, and subversive activities. To get an inside view of some of the problems which the President's request raised, United States News and World Report put a series of questions to J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the FBI. The questions and his replies follow. J. Edgar Hoover has headed the Federal Bureau of Investigation for 26 of his 55 years. Study at night won him two law degrees by 1917, in his native Washington, D. C.; then the Justice Department hired him. He rounded up alien subversives after World War I, and in 1921 was appointed Assistant Chief of the FBI by Harlan Stone, then Attorney General and later Chief Justice. He became Director in 1924. In World War II, espionage and sabotage were special FBI targets, and after the war the Communist infiltration. Also there was the loyalty check on 2,500,000 United States employees, plus the 120 major laws under the FBI's specific guard.)

Question. Do you think, Mr. Hoover, that Communists are basically agents of a foreign country, or do you draw a distinction between those who are philosophical Communists and those who are tools of the Communist spy rings?

Answer. The teachings of communism are directed toward one final result—world revolution and the triumph of international communism. The achievement of this aim would mean the violent and complete destruction of the American Government. Any person who subscribes to these teachings, regardless of his reason, is working against American democracy and for the benefit of international communism's chief leader, Soviet Russia. The philosophical Communist who advocates Marxism-Leninism might just as well be working as an agent of a foreign power because he is aiding its cause. He is, in fact, however, being played for a sucker by the Communists, who consider him a dupe, a person not to be trusted but only to be used and then discarded.

Question. Do your investigations show that the basic allegiance of a Communist is to a foreign government rather than our own Government?

Answer. Most emphatically. As I mentioned in my previous answer, the ultimate loyalty of fully indoctrinated Communist Party members is to Moscow. Stalin is represented as the foremost leader of international communism, the omnipotent oracle from whom all wisdom flows. The Communist Party is today a Trojan horse of disloyalty, coiled like a serpent in the very heart of America.

It may mouth sweet words of peace, democracy, equality, and flourish gay slogans of international solidarity and brotherhood of men, but its body and feet are from the Russian bear. Wherever the Trojan horse of Communist fifth columns has walked, the indelible footprints of Russian imperialism remain behind.

Question. How do the Communist cells operate? Are these the training units out of which larger numbers of Communists are recruited?

Answer. The basic unit of the Communist Party is the club. These clubs may be shop or industrial clubs; that is, Communist units within a special manufacturing or industrial plant, or neighborhood clubs, drawing members from residential areas. These clubs are coordinated through an elaborate apparatus, from ward, city, county, State, and district organizations to national headquarters in New York City. Because of security reasons, they have now been divided into small groups consisting of three to five members. In these clubs the Communist Party conducts its basic and fundamental activities—instruction in Marxism-Leninism; organization of pressure campaigns; the passing out of leaflets and handbills, the circulation of petitions. Here Communist literature is sold, dues collected, instructions received from higher officials disseminated. The club is the basic operating unit of the Communist Party. Through the club, of course, new members are recruited and indoctrinated.

Question. Do your studies of the Communist techniques over the years show that the Communists are trained to lie about their status?

Answer. The basic premise of communism is deceit and hypocrisy. The Communist philosophy teaches that every available means must be utilized to achieve the final end—world revolution. For this reason the Communist will lie, cheat, and resort to any tactics which will gain his end. He will advocate today exactly what he denounced yesterday. And with a straight face. Has he lied? No; he will say, he's only carrying out party policy. The concept of morality and fair play, as practiced in our democracy, is alien and repugnant to him. Moreover, the Communists employ a purposive double talk, roundabout style, known as Aesopian language, in their literature and speeches, designed to deceive and evade, to clothe their true thoughts. This technique, utilized by Lenin, is the very epitome of deceit.

Question. What does membership in the Communist Party really mean? Does it mean a formal joining or does it mean informal adherence?

Answer. When an individual joins the Communist Party he agrees to accept in full the principles of Marxism-Leninism. I mentioned previously that to accept these teachings means, in the final analysis, working for world revolution—in the boots of Russian imperialism—and the destruction of American democracy.

There is no halfway point: The individual accepts fully these obligations or he does not become a member. If later he refuses to abide by these rules—as defined by the party hierarchy—he is "expelled." This is no "informal adherence." You are either a full member or an enemy.

NO MORE PARTY CARDS

Question. Do Communist members carry cards any more? Did they previously carry cards?

Answer. As a security measure no Communist Party membership cards were issued in 1949. In previous years, with certain exceptions, they were issued. I might mention, in this connection, that the open maintenance of membership records has been discontinued. Today the Communist Party is becoming more and more deceitful and underhanded in its operations.

Question. Are there any sections of the country which are relatively free from Communists?

Answer. Communists may be found in most sections of the United States. Of course, in some areas the Communists are more thickly located than in others. But, as a general rule, the Communists are less strong in agricultural areas. And there is a reason for this.

Question. In what centers do Communists tend to congregate?

Answer. The Communists are strongest today in the industrial areas of the United States—in States such as New York, California, Illinois, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Michigan. Of course, these States, being heavily populated, you would expect more members there than in the less populated States. But that is not the entire reason. The Communists, as a basic principle of infiltration, are interested in possessing strength in heavy industry, that is, coal, steel, rubber, automobile, etc. It is here that, in event of an emergency, they can do their greatest harm to the country's economy.

Moreover, in these industries one Communist Party member located in a strategic job can wreak damage completely out of proportion to his own strength. Through this "heavy-industry concentration policy" the Communists are able to exercise a power far in excess of their numbers. In fact, one of the highest ranking leaders of communism in the United States has openly admitted:

"The Communist Party bases its work directly upon the mills, mines, and factories. Its principle is to make every shop a fortress for communism. * * * It concentrates its work upon the heavy industries and those of a war character."

That is one of the potential sabotage dangers facing America today.

WHY CONVICTIONS ARE DIFFICULT

Question. Are there many suspected Communists or suspected agents of foreign governments who could not be successfully prosecuted even though you have considerable suspicion about them?

Answer. The matter of prosecution, of course, is the exclusive responsibility of the Department of Justice. However, to successfully sustain a prosecution, legal evidence is necessary. Our laws regarding espionage are technical, requiring legal evidence, which is often most difficult to obtain because spies do not carry on their activities in the presence of witnesses but under a cover of stealth, because party members trained in deceit either decline to furnish information or misrepresent the facts in an attempt to conceal the acts of their associates.

Question. Is this because you need corroborative evidence and this is not always possible to attain, or is it because the laws at present are not clear concerning the unlawfulness of Communist activities?

Answer. We have had frequent cases in the past where we have developed the full facts, but, due to the passage of time, the fleeing of witnesses from the United States, and other matters beyond our control, the development of corroborative evidence is physically impossible. As to the adequacy of existing laws, this is a matter not within the province of the FBI.

Question. Have you suggested from time to time to Congress any principles that might be embodied in legislation concerning Communists?

Answer. The FBI is not a policy-making organization and the advocacy of specific legislation is not within the scope of its authority. The FBI, however, has furnished, from time to time, its observations to the Attorney General on ways to strengthen its activities.

Question. Does the FBI have adequate means for the detection of Communists who are foreign agents or saboteurs?

Answer. The Communists, foreign agents and saboteurs operate behind a smoke screen of stealth and deception. There must be a starting point in every investigation. The FBI has the means of detection if it receives sufficient information on which to predicate an investigation.

EVERY ONE A POTENTIAL SPY

Question. Is the FBI interested in knowing of the detection of any Communists, or is it interested only in those who are connected with espionage rings or possible sabotage?

Answer. The FBI is primarily interested in those members of the Communist Party who might be engaged in espionage, sabotage, or who constitute a potential threat to the internal security of the United States. Increasingly, however, with the development of the outward manifestations of a revolutionary movement in the Communist Party, the FBI is interested in knowing the identity of all Communists in the United States, as any Communist, properly qualified, might be recruited into espionage. He may today be circulating peace petitions or selling Communist literature. Tomorrow he may be sabotaging American industry or serving as an espionage courier. We are interested in identifying, therefore, every member of this international conspiracy in our midst, because every Communist is a potential saboteur and espionage agent.

Question. Would you, for instance, have an actual list of 55,000 Communists, or is this an estimate?

Answer. When the figure of 55,000 Communists in the United States was made public, there was considerable speculation in party circles as to the accuracy of the figures. Later, when detailed tabulations by States were made public, the Communists in various districts manifested great concern as to where we obtained our figures.

Question. Are there many Communists who have confessed and turned in valuable evidence to the FBI?

Answer. An individual who has seen the error of his ways and has been converted from the ensnaring tentacles of communism can be as reliable as any other type of witness. Many former members of the Communist Party have been of invaluable assistance in our investigations.

Question. What motivates these Communists to confess their relationships with espionage, etc.?

Answer. What motivates one person might be a minor factor for another individual. Many influences affect these individuals, causing them to seek the truth. However, from an over-all point of view, one factor emerges crystal clear: These individuals have realized that communism was a falsehood and a perversion of the truth.

MANY DISILLUSIONED

Question. Do you believe there are many people who formerly were Communists and who now have changed their views?

Answer. Many individuals associated with the Communist movement—even some of those in high places—have become disillusioned with this godless conspiracy and have renounced their allegiance. They have tasted of communism and found the taste bitter and repugnant. Many of these men and women hoped, through joining the Communist Party, to work for a "bright new world," for peace and improved democracy. But these hopes became shattered—for some quickly; for others more slowly.

Once inside the Communist world they could see with their own eyes the hypocrisy, deceit, and terror which is the essence of Marxism-Leninism. They recognized communism for what it is—brutal tyranny coated with false hopes and promises. For them there was only one course; to renounce communism.

The fact, however, that they have seen the errors of their ways and renounced communism does not entirely excuse their wrongs. The alibi that every person was radical in his youth or was a Communist sympathizer in the 1930's is a malicious falsehood. The great masses of Americans never fell for the schemes of the Communist swindlers.

Question. Do you generally find that confessed Communists or confessed espionage agents are reliable in their testimony—that is, where you have been able to verify or check upon their statements with one or more witnesses?

Answer. The testimony of any person must be judged on the basis of that individual's knowledge of the truth, his ability to know of what he speaks, and, from a practical standpoint in any type of case, the value of his testimony must be interpreted by corroboration. In each case we endeavor to verify information furnished us. In some instances the very nature of the information makes verification impossible, such as a meeting of two people. But, if one of the individuals traveled extensively, or stayed in the locale, these facts, subject to verification, can lend credence to his story. Weight must be given to the witness whose recital of facts can be verified by proof.

Question. Does the FBI determine who shall or shall not be prosecuted, or is the function of the FBI solely to collect the information and transmit it to the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice?

Answer. The FBI is the investigative arm of the United States Department of Justice, charged with the duty of investigating violations of the laws of the United States, collecting evidence in cases in which the United States is or may be a party in interest, and performing other duties imposed by law. The FBI's function is solely and exclusively that of investigation, to obtain the complete and accurate facts. The FBI does not, at any time, evaluate, make recommendations or draw conclusions from the results of its investigations. That is the responsibility of the Criminal Division and the United States attorneys.

Question. Do you believe that pitiless publicity will be helpful in running down Communists?

Answer. Absolutely. The Communists, by their very nature, are conspiratorial. They operate under a cloak of deceit. Communism can be defeated by an alert and aroused public opinion, conscious of the evils of Marxist-Leninist chicanery. The newspapers and magazines, the radio and television, by informing the Nation of the true character of communism, are rendering invaluable services.

I would never fear communism in America if all Communists were out in the open, peddling their wares in the market place of free speech and thought. But they are not. We cannot meet them on an even basis. They are working behind the masquerade of hypocrisy. For this reason America must be vigilant to recognize communism for what it actually is—a malicious evil which would destroy this Nation.

Question. Do you believe that public exposures through congressional committees, when properly safeguarded to avoid implication of innocent parties, could be helpful in drawing public attention to instances and episodes involving espionage and other Communist activity?

Answer. With the laws of libel and slander militantly used by subversives, exposures under oath, with safeguards to protect the innocent, are necessary. A private citizen or even a great metropolitan daily paper does not have the facilities to make the investigations. Hence, many exposures can be made only through an official investigating committee possessing the power of subpena with persuasive facilities such as laws covering perjury and the power to cite for contempt.

Question. Are there any suggestions you can make as to how the public can detect Communists and report them to the FBI?

Answer. A Communist is not always easy to identify. He is trained in deceit and uses cleverly camouflaged movements to conceal his real purposes. But he may frequently be detected by certain common characteristics. He will always espouse the cause of Soviet Russia over that of the United States. His viewpoint and position will shift with each change in the Communist Party line. He will utilize a language of double talk—referring to the Soviet-dominated countries as democracies and complain that the United States is imperialistic. He will attempt to infiltrate and gain control of organizations and subvert them to the use of the party.

My advice to the public is this:

Be alert to the dangers of communism. Report your information immediately and fully to the FBI. Avoid reporting malicious gossip or idle rumor. The FBI is interested in receiving facts. Don't attempt to make private investigations. Leave that to trained investigators. Don't circulate rumors about subversive activities or draw conclusions from information you furnish to the FBI.

Be Sure It's Love Before You Take 'Em Fishin'

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOWELL STOCKMAN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. STOCKMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include a humorous article from the Brooks-Scanlon Pine Echoes for June 1950, edited by my good friend, Paul Hosmer, and published by the Brooks-Scanlon Lumber Co., of Bend, Oreg.

Sports fishermen and hunters say that central Oregon is too good to be true. Awaiting your lure there, in more than 200 lakes in Deschutes County in the district I represent in Oregon, are big fighting rainbow trout, eastern brook, Loch Leven, and Dolly Varden which are an answer to a fisherman's prayer. Hunters may drive direct to good game areas and often see deer, antelope, elk or bear at the roadside. Bird hunters bag pheasants, quail, ducks, and geese in this enchanting outdoor land which varies from towering mountains and western plains to deep forest and open ranges.

To my friends and colleagues in the House and Senate, who often boast about the good fishing in their States, and who also like a bit of humor, I commend the following article:

BE SURE IT'S LOVE BEFORE YOU TAKE 'EM FISHIN'

We are looking out the window of the public library where we go to dodge a rainstorm, when we see a couple of tourist cars go by on their way to Paulina Lake for the opening of the fishing season. This reminds us of a guy from California who comes up here last year to take his new wife fishing on their honeymoon. We run across these love birds up at Elk Lake and we get Albert's side of the story one night at his campfire while his wife is over at the lodge trying to buy a bottle of Djer Kiss 50 miles from the nearest town. Albert, just to keep the records straight, is the bridegroom.

Her name, we learn, is Dotty and she is very agreeable to the eye, although after we get to know her better her name is still Dotty as far as we are concerned. She is dressed in a bright green shirt and a pair of Hollywood riding pants and looks as if she is poured into them and forgets to say "When." She is a menace for looks, although she is no great shakes for brains, but with her sex appeal they are only an incumbrance anyway. Albert is a fisherman of the deepest dye and Dotty is going to show her husband that she likes to live in the woods like a trapper and catch fish. Albert gives her a $40 fly rod as a wedding present and she breaks the tip trying to spear a mosquito the first night out. Albert is a good scout and loves his little wife, but when we see him he is walking on his heels. Love is supposed to be tender, but so is a two-bit T-bone. Albert has been on a thousand fishing trips, but he confides in us—what a helluva difference one wife makes.

Albert and Dotty, taking turns, drive all the way from Frisco in a night and a day, so they get here on the opening. Albert is very anxious to get camped before dark, but Dotty refuses to make up her mind as to just where she wants to camp. All she knows is the places Albert points out are terrible. All the campsites Albert likes are (1) too close to the lake; (2) too far from the lake; (3) too many people; (4) too rough; (5) too much shade; (6) not enough shade; (7) too wet; (8) too dry; (9) not enough people; (10) too many mosquitoes. This too-many-mosquitoes place is the last one Albert can drive to so they start back to look the camping places over again.

Albert explains that there are no mosquitoes at Elk Lake at this time of year and that the one that bites Dotty has been buzzing around in the car ever since they left Redding, Calif. Dotty says she knows that, but as soon as he stops here it bit her and that proves there is something about this place that puts them in a fighting mood.

Albert drives back almost to Deschutes Bridge and decides on the camping spot Dotty thinks is too rough. It is getting pretty dark so you don't see the bumps well, and it strikes Dotty as about right. Albert gets out his $75 umbrella tent and dumps it in the only spot a tent can be pitched. Albert says he is not going to pitch the tent here, he is going to pitch it over by those willows. Dotty says he is not, he is going to pitch it right here. Albert whispers to us on the side to remember this bit of strategy—we may need it sometime.

Dotty gives him a whole history of Daniel Boone while he is setting up the camp. She wishes to know if it wouldn't be best to put up the tent with the door to the east so if there is a west wind it won't blow into the tent. She wants to know did he bring the butter. She wants to know if he isn't doing things backward by driving the pegs before setting up the tentpole. She claims the marshmallows are tough. She says they ought to have the fishing season in the winter when they don't have any mosquitoes. She remembers she forgets the coffee. She suggests eight different places where Albert should build a campfire.

By 10 p. m. Albert is slightly nuts, but has all the household furniture unpacked and a swell cooking fire going. Dotty sits on a jackpine stump and cooks marshmallows on a stick. Albert encourages her by saying there is nothing like a good square meal of marshmallows on a camping trip and—Albert tells us this privately—you can't talk much with your mouth full of marshmallows.

Presently Dotty disposes of the last marshmallows and complains that the smoke all come her way. She maintains that Albert built the fire on purpose that way. The smoke drifts back over Albert and Dotty says it serves him right. Albert says that when he was a Boy Scout he learns how to build a campfire so the smoke goes straight up, but he has forgotten how he did it.

Albert cooks up a pretty good supper of steaks, potatoes and some coffee he had put in the grub box himself, and finally they go to bed. There is a bump under her side of the air mattress Albert buys for the trip. Albert wonders about this as he knows there are no bumps under an air mattress, but he finally and changes sides with her and then he develops there is a bump under the other side, too. So they get up again while Albert rives the bed to the other end of the tent.

Dotty decides there isn't enough air in the mattress and unscrews the cap to blow it up a bit. While she is trying to figure out how to blow air into the thing, all the air leaks out and when Albert gets into bed he finds a bump the size of an anvil under him. So he expends all his remaining breath blowing up the mattress and falls over backwards in a dead faint. Dotty is a little peeved about things. She figures she married the guy for life and then finds out he hasn't any.

In the morning Albert rolls out and makes some coffee and when the sun is up, so is Dotty. Albert has the rods all rigged and decides the water is too cold for flies. He digs out a 6-inch nightcrawler and hands it to Dotty. Dotty tells him to take the boa constrictor away. Albert explains that this is not a boa constrictor; it is the kind of overgrown angleworm the big fish will bite on at this time of year. Dotty says she does not want a big fish as they object too much. So Albert puts on a smaller worm and Dotty stands and looks helplessly at the river. She complains that the river comes too far up on the banks and she can't get close enough to fish. She finally decides she will fish off Deschutes Bridge because she sees on a map where the river runs under it. Albert is to go where he damn pleases up and down the bank and Dotty will catch the fish when he scares them under the bridge.

Dotty drops her line over the railing and doesn't even bother to see where it lands. There are 40 or more snags under Deschutes Bridge that will grab Albert's hook before it even reaches the water, but none of them touches Dotty's. Hers drifts quietly through all of them and into a quiet eddy near the bank. Wham! Just like that, a rainbow about 18 inches long hits it. If it's anybody else in the world the fish will dive into the snags, but Dotty doesn't give him a chance. She lays her pole down on the bridge, kneels on it, and drags him in hand over hand, like a monkey going up a rope. Izaak Walton rolls over four times in his grave.

Albert is all excited and yells up to ask why she don't come down on the bank where she can use her landing net. Dotty replies that she is using it—she has her lunch in it. Albert shudders groggily and staggers off down the river to do a little real fishing all by himself and show his wife up. He wades into a hole and gets his boots full of water, he works and sweats and at the end of 3 hours he has three trout measuring 6¼ inches wet. When he gets back to the bridge, Dotty is still there and has two more big ones lying beside her. Also she has lost her hook. Albert sees an opening and remarks that she has finally found one of the snags. Dotty says she doesn't hook a snag; on her last cast she catches a Dodge on the back cast, and on the time before that she hooks a Pontiac on the way past, but it came off. She wants to know why all the cars in central Oregon have to go over Deschutes Bridge while she is trying to catch a fish.

Albert finally persuades her to follow him upstream and just for variety he rigs her up a minnow outfit and baits it. Dotty looks at the minnow like it was some kind of a yellow fever germ. She wants to know why, if Albert is going to be funny, he doesn't put on a fish big enough to be legal. Albert explains patiently that this is merely bait and that the big fish eat them. Dotty wants to know why if the big fish eat the little fish before they can grow to be big fish, how can there be any little fish grow up to be big fish to eat the little fish. This is getting pretty complicated and Albert explains they only eat part of them. Dotty wants to know what part. This goes on for several minutes and suddenly Albert hears his wife give a yelp. Albert looks back and sees his frau is hooked onto a big one. Just some more of her "damphool" luck, he thinks. Dotty is pretty excited, for a female like her, and says she wishes she was over on the other bank. Albert wants to know why and Dotty says because that's where the fish wants to go. Albert yells to work downstream with him because the water is too fast and she's liable to break the line. Dotty yells back that the water is just as fast down there and looks around her wildly. Suddenly she gets an idea or something. If Albert ever tries this trick on a half pound mud turtle he is going to lose all his outfit except maybe his tent and sleeping bag.

The big fish stays on while Dotty manhandles him upstream a couple of hundred yards and finally keel-hauls him into the only drydock in 6 miles. She puts her rod on the ground, kneels on it, and hauls the fish in hand over hand, as usual. Dotty is so excited, but not enough to forget to remind her husband that there are some things he tells her she still remembers. One of them she says, is to always ease a big one into a quiet eddy to land him. She demands to know where there is a quieter spot on the whole Deschutes River than this one. Albert goes into a fort of coma while Dotty takes the big trout out—and there is her lunch soaking wet in the bottom of the net. Albert sees she is daring him to say something funny, but while Albert is brave he is not brave to the point of recklessness. He does not so much as crack a chuckle.

Well, Albert and Dotty fish all day and just before quitting time the score stands six to six in Dotty's favor. Albert is a little peeved, but is still trying to be the ideal sportsman husband. Just as he is ready to give up and go back to camp he hooks onto the grandfather of all rainbows in the Deschutes. The strike almost tears his pants off and Albert sees he is in for a struggle. He keeps his rod well up and braces himself to wear the baby out. He holds on for half a dozen wild plunges and just then Dotty catches up with him. Dotty is in a slightly sarcastic mood. Aloud she voices the hope that Albert loses him. Albert pays no attention. He is a little surly anyway, due to the fact that his line has hooked itself around the button on his right hip pocket and is causing some trouble. Dotty wants to know if she should climb up the rod and stab the fish for him. Albert says if she does she will find herself right out there in the river with the fish and the hell with her, but if she really wants to do something for her country she can come down and unhook the line from his rear pocket button. Dotty slides down off the bank and takes a look at the tangle. Then she unsheathes the Kit Carson hunting knife Albert gives her on her wedding day, and cuts the line.

Albert's stomach goes down with a dull thud like an express elevator makes when it snaps a cable and lands in the basement. The line runs out, the fish goes down the river and Albert counts 10 slowly. Then he counts 20. It still is not safe for him to say anything so he counts to 12,527. Then he just shoulders his rod and starts back for camp. Dotty trails along behind him and is very sorrowful. She explains that cutting the line is the first thing she thinks of, that if she doesn't cut it Albert probably breaks his $125 rod. Albert says the hell with it and let's go back to camp. Just then Dotty spies the bridge and gets another one of her ideas. She is going to try one more cast off the bridge just to see what might happen. Wearily, Albert says go to it, you can't always be lucky. You can't always miss those snags.

Well, Dotty drops her hook in and it catches on a snag the first thing. She looks at Albert sort of expectantly and waits. Albert at first pretends he doesn't see this phenomenon, but then he begins to think that if he doesn't get this hook loose pretty soon he is liable to be out all night. So he wades out and unhooks the bait. Just as it swings free a huge German Brown hits it in the neighborhood of Albert's shirt tail. Albert becomes somewhat dazed and figures the more wrong a woman fisherman is, the more right she probably is.

Dotty begins reeling in like she was dragging in a grand piano and when it gets to within hailing distance she gives a large heave. With anybody else, of course, the tackle will break and everything go to hell in general. But nothing breaks, the fish goes forty feet up in the air and wraps itself 12 times around the Forest Service telephone wire which runs into Elk Lake whenever Myron Symons can remember to come down and fix it. Dotty looks at Albert and says so get him down, smarty.

Well, Albert is no Einstein, but he has an idea. He takes his hunting knife out of its sheath and he makes a slash with it. He cuts the line, grabs Dotty's net, and waits hopefully for the fish to drop. If the wind hadn't changed, he'd have made it.

All this is a week before we meet up with Albert and Dotty in this camp on Elk Lake and Dotty has not spoken to her husband for 6 days. Albert is pretty discouraged about the future. He wishes us to write a letter to Dotty and explain that he did not deliberately let this fish get away. Albert wonders if friends will write in and tell Dotty that he wouldn't be mean enough to do a thing like that on purpose. Albert wishes us to write a note to Dotty telling her that we've always found him honest. He wishes us to tell her that he did the best he could on that fish.

As a last and rather gasping request, he asks us to tell Dotty just to speak to him again.

Stalin Versus Confucius

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, some years ago there was a fad in this country where all sorts of wise and omniscient sayings were ascribed to the ancient Chinese sage Confucius, who lived about twenty-five centuries ago. These sayings would all begin with the introductory words: "Confucius say * * *."

Confucius is today anathema for Stalin's Russia and Mao Tse-tung's China because of his teachings and philosophical views on human relationship. In Formosa, however, the Chinese celebrated a few days ago the anniversary of Confucius' birth. I have no doubt that the burning of the works of Confucius by the Chinese Communists will not eradicate the name of this old and venerated Chinese philosopher from the history of the Chinese people, just as the burning of books by Hitler did not erase from our civilization the more modern philosophers, writers, and scientists. In the language of the fad: Confucius say when Stalin and Mao Tse-tung are long forgotten or at best are a mere memory of a weird nightmare, Confucius will still be a subject of fruitful study and pleasant reading for the people of China.

My thoughts on the matter are the result of a brief editorial in the New York Herald Tribune of August 30, which follows:

CONFUCIUS: COUNTERREVOLUTIONIST

On Sunday, Formosa put out flags and commemorated the 2,501st anniversary of the birth of Confucius, with Chiang Kai-shek presiding at the ceremony in the Chinese Nationalist administration offices in Taipeh. The sage could not—officially, at least—be honored on the mainland, for Mao Tse-tung had this spring ordered the burning of the works of Confucius, terming them "reactionary and antipeople." However, we have a strong notion that Confucius has not been so easily erased from the past and present of China by a fiery Red decree.

The sententious sayings proved and adopted by men embody racial experience. And racial experience, in the continuity of human nature, can be much the same, whether it is sounded in a pithy phrase in a Vermont general store or remains in teachings both a mandarin and a coolie have tested and found true. Confucius, for instance, taught a lot about human relationships. These, he said, "were continually being violated by the passions of men." This statement, of course, sets Confucius up as a dangerous counterrevolutionist in the eyes of Moscow's followers, with whom such violations, either individual or national, have long been old stuff.

Mao Tse-tung may have burned the works of Confucius, but we will bet him any mandarin's best melon rind cap that for another 2,500 years the sage will be read in China, where a century is but a Kremlin day. For wisdom is like that. Fortunately for mankind, it is a phoenix which survives many historic ashes and many puppet rulers. a bit about any Communist banning of his eternal ideograms.

Facts Behind the Present Crisis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. H. R. GROSS

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention of Members of Congress to a recent and excellent statement made by Ed. Wimmer, vice president of the National Federation of Independent Business.

Mr. Wimmer's statement sets forth some truisms which cannot be denied, painful though they may be to some people who insist that the only danger to this great Republic is external.

Mr. Speaker, the world has produced many idealists and practical men, but comparatively few practical idealists. Ed. Wimmer, in my opinion, is one of the few. As an idealist, he believes with unlimited zeal that small business is the backbone of free enterprise in this country and that little people everywhere are the backbone of civilization. As a practical thinker and businessman himself, he backs up his ideals with concrete suggestions for building a better America and a better world.

Mr. Wimmer's statement follows:

KEEP AMERICA INDEPENDENT

(By Ed. Wimmer)

The real war that is going on today (and it is world-wide) is not a conflict to determine the military supremacy of the nations involved, but instead is a war between two ideas. The Russian idea and the American idea. Only one of these two ideas will survive. Which idea, is the most momentous question that now confronts thinking people everywhere. What most people fail to understand, is that the answer will not be found on the battlefields of blood and guns, but on the battlefields of the minds of men.

Let us consider the facts supporting this statement.

To begin with, suppose you put yourself in the boots of the Kremlinites and look at the present situation from their vantage point. They know as well as you that an all-out war with the United States would result in great damage to Russian cities and Russian industry, even if Russian planes were successful in knocking out 50 percent of our civilian and war industries with one blow. They know that before Russian troops could be landed on American soil that Russia herself would be a shambles.

Consider now for a moment the long time belief of the Russian leaders that "capitalism will eventually destroy itself". Top Reds are unquestionably convinced that the social, economic and political chaos which would follow the distintegration of our system of free enterprise and free government would result in a Communist victory without their firing a single shot. If I were a Kremlinite I would hold to this view and do everything possible to build more and more fear in the United States, and await the day until my American comrades could take over. All indications point to the fact that the Kremlinites believe they can cause us to forfeit our freedoms and bankrupt ourselves—financially and intellectually.

On the other hand there has been a deep feeling among great numbers of Americans (and I am one of these Americans) that the Russian people themselves will liquidate the Kremlinites and destroy communism if they are given time to learn the facts of life and if we, here in America, are able to make our economic system function according to the fundamental principles laid down by the founding fathers. The godlessness of communism will generate its own destruction, for there is a divine something in the souls of men and women that no earthly power can hold back for long.

Speaking as a layman, and without any pretense of being an expert in national or international affairs, my opinion is that a knockout war with Russia would cost us whatever we have left of our system of free enterprise and free government, and leave us with some form of totalitarian control that neither we nor our children would be able to throw off. This should be clear because a war between two such mighty forces as Russia and America would involve the whole world and would climax itself in such chaos as to make a world dictatorship inevitable.

Our great debt has already placed us in a dangerous position, and failure to solve our own social, economic and political problems (as well as our failure to establish free institutions in those countries which we have liberated from nazism and fascism) has left us with a weak family of nations that would be dependent on us for almost everything. It would seem, therefore, that victory for the Russian idea would have to come from the breakdown of economic forces in America, and that victory for the American idea is possible only if we prevent such a breakdown. In other words, we must prove that the American system of free, competitive, private enterprise is capable of meeting the needs of America on both the home front and the battlefront.

If this kind of reasoning is reasonably correct, then the hour calls for the utmost statesmanship on the part of all of our Government officials, and calls for the utmost statesmanship from the leaders in agriculture, industry, finance, labor and all other fields. It means that no one dares to ignore the fact that the best defense we can possibly develop is a strong economy, free of monopolistic powers and as free as possible from bureaucratic controls.

No one is more aware than I that present trends are in the opposite direction—in that statesmanship has been lacking in most of our internal and international affairs. That agriculture has been losing its independence through subsidies, controls and the building of giant combines of farm cooperatives. That trends to giant chains and holding companies have been liquidating thousands upon thousands of individual enterprises. That bigger and bigger government has gone far toward making us a completely dependent people.

To halt or curb these trends under present conditions would seem to be a colossal if not impossible undertaking, but if marked success along this line is not achieved, the American system of free, competitive, capitalistic, private enterprise is doomed—war or no war.

To minimize further trouble with the Russians, I would let them understand and prove to them that if they knocked out 75 percent of our industry in one lightning blow—that within hours fleets of planes would take off with enough atomic bombs and poison gases to erase them from the face of the earth.

So far as control of inflation is concerned, Congress should have the power to investigate any sign of unreasonable profiteering or hoarding, and the Department of Justice should be empowered to prosecute and jail offenders so long as the emergency exists. Control by bureaus are too dangerous. Housing controls, for example, means a halting of building, which means higher rents, which means more drastic rent controls, which means political strangulation of our economic system. Steel, wool, rubber, cotton, grains, refrigerators, automobiles and most other needed products are in surplus or in near normal supply. Before World War II, we were out of everything, and a highly accelerated consumer purchasing power, plus speculation and hoarding, made rigid price and rent controls inevitable.

These facts should be carefully weighed before any drastic steps are taken to put controls on production or distribution. Too many controls will be the death knell of hundreds of thousands of small businesses. One million closed their doors in the last war.

My further recommendations would be that Congress and the President stop talking an all-out war and start selling American ideals as set forth by the founding fathers; which ideals are not understood by any foreign nation; have not been a pattern for legislation, and have not been understood or pursued by American people generally. I say this because no one can disprove the contention that the American Republic was founded on the idea that, "no free society can be built on any other foundation than one which guarantees a maximum of individual enterprise and a minimum of power in the hands of the few." Our experts are unanimously agreed that widespread, independent ownership of farm, home and other enterprise (with local control over local affairs) is the only antidote to private monopoly; the only antidote to labor monopoly; the only antidote to the spread of socialism in this country, and the only antidote to the spread of communism—anywhere in the world.

Every successful person is an advertisement for capitalism, and the only way to increase the number of successful persons and still enjoy freedom is to expand independent enterprise, which results in a wider choice of job opportunities and a greater degree of independence for the working classes. During the past 20 years we have made a lot of successful people through Government spending, war, and after-war prosperity, but in doing so we have actually weakened the fabric of independent enterprise, economic self-reliance, and free government.

I think that if we had not been a monopoly ridden nation at the end of the war, we could have taken a position in Germany, England, Italy, France—and every other nation needing our help—to the effect that those nations use our assistance to develop a free, competitive economy, with local control over local affairs. Such insistence would have resulted in our loans being used to rehabilitate farms, factories, and stores, so that the people could be put to work to rebuild their own communities and work out their own community problems.

Is it too late now for us to start such a program? Have we gone so far in the direction of giant labor unions, giant industries, giant banking systems, and giant government that we cannot stop and turn back? My answer is, "No," and I would begin by proclaiming at once that the distempered economic thinking and distempered political planning of the past will be ended; that while we are preparing ourselves on the military front we are going to develop an economy that will be a pattern for freemen to follow for centuries to come.

Restoration of economic and political freedom in this country calls for no radical or harmful measures. A simple amendment to the Public Utility Holding Company Act, which Congress passed as a measure to unscramble the utility holding company combines, can be applied to all holding companies doing an interstate business; companies such as the du Ponts, A & P, Sears, Roebuck, General Mills, Aviation Corp. of America, etc. This would mean that the Maxwell House Coffee Co. would be separated from General Foods and become an independent enterprise completely free of control by any such holding company octopus as General Foods. General Motors, as another example, should be separated from du Pont control. General Motors is far too big a corporation to be controlled by another corporation and I would ask that Frigidaire in turn be separated frm General Motors, along with other corporations not directly related to the production of automobiles. Carried out in every field, a decentralization program such as this would put ownership and control of banks, hotels, factories, processing plants, wholesalers, and yes, the retail business into a new framework of genuine free enterprise, which would automatically unwind big labor and big government.

Any study of the years preceding the crash of 1929 reveals that they were years of chain-store expansion and years of merger and consolidation—even on the agricultural front. The depression years which followed the crash of 1929 carried us to the very brink of disaster, from which we were snatched by Dr. Roosevelt and his New Deal. During the 5 years that followed we witnessed a greater transfusion of public funds from Government to governed than had ever been spent by any elected official or king in world history. By 1938, however, we were diving into another depression, from which we were snatched by the defense boom of 1939—and in 1941, the bombing of Pearl Harbor put us in clover.

Nine years have gone by. Three hundred thousand American boys have died. Another 100,000 are in hospitals. We have a $260,000,000,000 debt and a tax bill of $60,000,000,000 annually, and at this writing we are advocating that our former enemies be re-armed and rehabilitated at our expense so they can help us fight our former ally—Russia.

Do you think we would have gotten into this mess if we had taken God into our economic and political life, and if we had held to the fundamental principles of free enterprise and free government? The answer, of course, is an emphatic "no"—and if we will take God into our hearts now and come forth with a program that little people of all nations can understand, this generation of Americans may yet become the beginners of a new era of peace, prosperity, and the pursuit of happiness.

Lenin said, "Germany will arm itself out of existence. Britain will expand itself out of existence. America will spend itself out of existence."

Two of his predictions have come true. Will he be right on the third?

The answer is "Yes"—unless we mend our ways.

Lovre Farm Plan Explained

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD O. LOVRE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. LOVRE. Mr. Speaker, I should like to offer for the RECORD an analysis and explanation of the self-financing, full-parity, farmer-managed farm program which I have introduced. I call the attention of the Members particularly to the provision which provides specific protection in farm planning for the family sized farmer. This plan provides the full 100 percent of parity for the farmer without doles and grants.

This legislation has been introduced as H. R. 8509 and hearings have been held before the House Committee on Agriculture.

It should first of all be recognized that the farm problem is a price problem and that unless agricultural production exceeds demand there is seldom a problem. When that happens, prices are severely depressed, working a hardship on the farmer and nonfarmer alike. The crazy-quilt economic pattern of booms and busts in America proves beyond a shadow of a doubt that national income is always at least seven times gross farm income. In the event that it becomes necessary to assure farm prices the Lovre "Grass Roots" plan strikes at the root of the evil by providing for the orderly marketing of farm produce.

Its objectives are:

1. A farmer-controlled plan: The program would operate from the bottom up rather than from the top down as at present. Farmers themselves would manage the program through elected county committees and State and national boards. The program would become operative only after a two-thirds affirmative vote in a national referendum.

2. Self-financing: Marketing quotas allocated on over-all normal United States domestic requirements would regulate sales instead of acreage controls regulating production. In the even of surplus, the producer thereof could sell it only after purchase of additional marketing certificates from his county committee. Proceeds from sales of additional marketing quota certificates would finance disposal of surplus and the administration of the program. The self-financing feature assures an agriculture that stands on its own feet with its head high without dependence upon Government doles or subsidies. Savings to taxpayers and recovery of money invested in surplus crops would be sufficient to balance the national budget this year and save billions in the future.

3. Full parity to farmers: The plan recognizes that less than full parity for the farmer means loss in gross farm income and a resulting seven-times drop in national income. Producers would be assured of full parity on their share of normal domestic consumption. The National Board would maintain price through purchases and loans financed by sale of surplus marketing quota certificates.

4. Protection for the consumer: The consumer's grocery bill would not skyrocket because the bill authorizes the National Board to sell on the domestic market when prices reach 105 percent of parity.

5. Two-price system: The plan would be based on the same principle used in every business today (sell bulk at parity price; dispose of surplus at sale price). The farmer would receive one price (full parity) for his share of domestic consumption at the market place. If he produced surplus and decided to dispose of it he would net a lower price on that part of production. The price differential would be used to finance disposal of surplus.

6. Orderly disposal of surpluses: With money collected from the sale of surplus marketing quota certificates, the National Board would dispose of surpluses by: (1) A food stamp or school lunch plan; (2) exports consistent with United States commitments (United States might trade food to foreign nations for strategic materials such as rubber, uranium, magnesium, and so forth); (3) development of new chemurgic uses for farm products such as plastics, medicine, fuels (this field has hardly been explored).

7. Protection for family-sized farmer: The Lovre plan recognizes that 6,000,000 out of the 10,000,000 business units in America are independently owned and operated farms. Thus, any long-range program must be based around the family-sized farmer. In the prosperity of the small operator, the backbone of America's productive and consumptive capacity, rests this Nation's strength or weakness. One section of the bill spells out protection for the family-type farmer.

8. Coordinated soil-conservation program: Recognizing that soil conservation is vital to progressive prosperous agriculture, the Lovre plan contemplates a comprehensive, Government-encouraged program to protect the Nation's most valuable resource—the fertility of the top soil.

EXPLANATION OF OPERATION

Farmers would choose their own organization by electing county committees and State and National boards to direct the program from the appropriate level. The national board would work with the Secretary of Agriculture who would decide each year normal domestic demand of each farm product. When production exceeded demand, quotas based upon the latter would be established and divided among farmers who would, through operations of the national board, receive full parity on this portion of production. If a farmer produced more than his quota and wanted to sell it, he could buy additional marketing quota certificates, paying enough for them to finance food stamp or school lunch programs, exports, and new nonfood commercial uses of products. The individual farmer would control production. Those who created surplus would take a loss.

The Lovre plan would operate under the same sound principle as a country merchant uses to sell house dresses, for example. He sells bulk at parity price and the carry-over he saves for the following season or sells at a discount. Assume the parity price of wheat is $2. One farmer has a quota for 10,000 bushels for which he is guaranteed full parity. He produces 11,000 bushels and wants to sell the extra 1,000 bushels rather than store them. He must purchase extra marketing quotas at, say $1 per bushel, to market this grain. The sale price to him on the market is still $2 (or he could get a full parity loan on it), but the difference would go to the national board which might issue food stamps good for perhaps 75 cents on the product of a bushel of wheat. Or it might export wheat for $1.50 per bushel. The board might also subsidize plants finding new uses for wheat at $1 per bushel. Anything left over from these operations would be returned to the farmer. Thus, the farmer would net $2 (full parity) on his 10,000 bushels (his quota) and anything from $1 up on his surplus. It would depend upon the cost of disposing of it. The farmer would not be subjected to governmental acreage controls; he would regulate his own production because the net he would realize from the surplus would, from year to year, decrease to the point where he would voluntarily reduce the amount of his production.

Selling surplus or calling loans when parity was exceeded would protect the consumer. While the consumer who could afford it would pay full parity for his food (the same as he expects to pay for his automobile or furniture), persons of low income would participate in a food-stamp plan to increase their dietary requirements.

DETAILED ANALYSIS OF H. R. 8509, THE LOVRE GRASS-ROOTS FARM BILL

I. Commodities covered: A. Cotton; B. Potatoes; C. Tobacco; D. Food-feed: 1. The term "food-feed group" means corn, wheat, barley, oats, rye, grain sorghums, hay, grass, and other products normally used for livestock feeding, and hogs, cattle, sheep, poultry, chicken eggs, and dairy products. 2. All items in this group are treated as one. 3. Parity quotas, marketing quota certificates, surplus certificates, disposal fees and refunds in this group shall be computed and expressed in terms of comparative units. (a) "Comparative unit" means that quantity of a commodity in the food-feed group the value of which at the parity price for that commodity equals the value of 10 bushels of corn at parity price.

FULL PARITY PLAN

II. Parity quota: A. Parity is defined as parity price determined in accordance with provisions of section 301 (a) (1) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as in effect immediately prior to the enactment of the Agricultural Act of 1949. B. The Commodity Credit Corporation, under direction of the National Board is authorized and directed, by making purchases of such commodity in the open market from time to time during such marketing year to remove from domestic market channels such quantities of the commodity as may be necessary to insure that the current market price does not fall below its parity price.

III. National Farmers Council: A. Independent agency of the executive branch. B. Consists of: 1. National Board: (a) Composed of Secretary of Agriculture and six members: (1) Members elected by members of State boards annually. 2. State board for each State: (a) Composed of five members: (1) Members elected by county committee annually. 3. County and local committees: (a) Established under section 8 (b) of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act, as amended.

TWO-PRICE SYSTEM

IV. National parity quota: A. Annually the National Board shall proclaim: 1. Quantity of each commodity that will be consumed within the United States. 2. Quantity that will be available. B. In the food-feed group the proclamation shall be limited only to each feed commodity that will be consumed or available for consumption in the United States by human beings, livestock and poultry. 1. "Feed commodity" means any commodity in the food-feed group except hogs, cattle, sheep, poultry, eggs, and dairy products. C. The quantity proclaimed for consumption plus a carry-over (not in excess of 50 percent shall be the national parity quota).

VOLUNTARY ADOPTION

V. Referendum: A. Within 30 days after the proclamation the National Board shall hold an election if it finds: 1. That the quantity of a crop available for sale will exceed the amount to be consumed. B. After the program has been in effect for any commodities, 15 percent of those who voted in the last referendum can petition the National Board to hold an election. C. Only those producers of feed commodities in the food-feed group can vote or sign a petition. D. Two-thirds of those voting must vote for the program before it goes into effect.

SELF-FINANCING

VI. Apportionment of parity quotas: A. National Board apportions the national parity quota among States. B. State board apportions the State parity quota among counties. C. County committee apportions the county parity quota among producers. 1. In the food-feed group quotas to be given only to producers of a feed commodity. 2. Family sized farms are to be protected and encouraged.

REGULATES MARKETING

VII. Marketing certificates: A. After a parity quota is issued to a producer he shall be furnished with a marketing certificate entitling him to market a quantity of the commodity equal to the quota apportioned to him. 1. It is unlawful for any person to sell, offer for sale, or purchase any quantity of a commodity located in the United States, produced, or imported by him, in excess of the quantity he is entitled to market. B. When there is a sale of a feed commodity for feed purposes to producers of hogs, cattle, sheep, poultry, eggs, or dairy products the purchaser shall be given a marketing certificate that entitles him to market a number of comparative units of the food-feed group equal to the number of comparative units of the commodity so sold. C. Surplus marketing certificates will be issued upon payment by the producer of a disposal fee. 1. This provision is applicable to all importers. 2. Disposal fee to be high enough to finance the differential between parity and what the National Board can dispose of the surplus for, including administrative costs. (a) Refund excess to producers.

MECHANICS

VIII. Commodity Credit Corporation: A. Under direction of National Board. B. Make loans of 100 percent of parity. 1. Only on nonperishable feed commodities. 2. Only on so much of the production of any producer as does not exceed his parity quota plus the quantity as to which he has paid a surplus disposal fee on. C. Authorizes study for insuring loans made by private persons under same terms and conditions, and report to Congress by the National Board. D. Farm storage to be used and using existing facilities whenever practicable. E. Authorizes purchases in open market in order to insure current market prices from falling below parity.

SURPLUS TO USEFUL PURPOSE

IX. Disposal of surplus: A. Export at such prices and in such quantities as will not be inconsistent with international food and agricultural agreements to which the United States is a party. B. Distribution thereof at low prices (approved by the National Board) under programs designed to safeguard health, improve the diets of low-income groups, or encourage the consumption by school children of nutritional agricultural commodities. C. Distribution thereof, at prices approved by the National Board, under programs designed to develop new scientific, chemical, and technical uses for agricultural commodities and products and byproducts thereof. D. Selling the commodity in the domestic market at the current market price therefor if the current market price is higher than 105 percent of the parity price for the commodity, except that selling begun under this paragraph may, with the approval of the National Board, be continued so long as the current market price of the commodity remains above the parity price therefor.

SOIL CONSERVATION

X. Conservation and development of agricultural resources: A. Directs National Board to report to Congress recmendations for Government-encouraged program for development and conservation of Nation's agricultural resources. B. Recognizes that research, education, technical operations, and material assistance, financial and otherwise, are necessary and distinct elements in soil conservation and development of land and water resources.

Franco and Free Enterprise—Article From the New Leader

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, August 30 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, the current issue of the anti-Communist publication, the New Leader, published in New York State, carries an article entitled "Franco and Free Enterprise," written by two Spaniards who, too, are anti-Communists, and are associated with the government in exile of the Basque Republic.

I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FRANCO AND FREE ENTERPRISE—THE DICTATOR OUR SENATE WANTS TO AID IS PRESIDING OVER THE SYSTEMATIC EXTERMINATION OF PRIVATE INDUSTRY IN SPAIN

(By Jaume Miravitlles, frequent New Leader contributor, represented the exiled Government of Catalonia in the United States; and Jesus de Galindez is the representative of the exiled Basque Government in this country)

An American loan to Franco may supply the final push needed to make Spain's economy completely totalitarian. It is ironical that this loan—if voted by Congress—will be extended in the name of preserving free enterprise. Actually it would result in drastic curtailment of private industry and the increased power of government monopoly.

While most American proponents of aid to Franco are familiar with the political arguments against a United States loan (the weakness and unpopularity of his regime, his previous support of Hitler, etc.), few of them realize fully the economic implications of American aid. The fact that Franco is a poor risk for a loan is generally known; but the planned destruction of private enterprise which would accompany an American loan has not been noted by either proponents or opponents of United States aid. The plan, named after the ruler of Spain's economic destiny, is called the Suances plan.

Suances, according to Sam Pope Brewer (New York Times, May 15), "got the idea from seeing the colossal enterprise grouped in Germany under the name of Hermann Goering Works." The consequence of this journey and the deep impression which it left on Suances, was the creation in Spain of INI (Instituto Nacional de Industrias) in 1941. INI is the instrument for introducing economic totalitarianism to Spain.

When Franco named Suances Minister of Economy several years later, he was in position to control foreign trade and, through the Spanish Foreign Exchange Office, to regulate foreign exchange. At the same time, Suances retained his position as head of INI. Thus Suances is a Goering, Todt, Funk, and Schacht, all rolled in one.

RUIN RESULTS

Suances' first idea was to convert Spain from a "flower garden and pantry" into a manufacturing and industrial country. The first part of the plan was fulfilled; that is, Spain ceased being an agricultural country. Before Suances, Spain produced 4.2 million tons of wheat a year; only 2.6 million tons of wheat have been produced annually since his advent. From 660,000 cubic meters, oil production sank to 270,000 cubic meters.

But this had been foreseen by the Suances plan. The deficit was to be overcome by means of a planned integration of the Spanish and Argentine economics. In this way, the Franco-Peron protocol was born. In exchange for wheat, fats and Argentine beef, Spain was to send manufactured products.

The Franco-Peron protocol, said the two principal protagonists, Suances for Franco and Miranda for Peron, would give the world a lesson in economic integration more far-reaching than the Marshall plan. The port of Cadiz would be converted into the bridgehead of America in Europe. The two Spanish-speaking countries would give the materialistic and near-sighted Anglo-Saxon world a valuable lesson in political morality.

But the collapse of Spanish agriculture was accompanied by a collapse in industry. Steel production fell from 1,000,000 tons to 700,000. Argentina lived up to her end of the "Procotol," and sent wheat, meat, and the raw materials. But Senor Suances could not deliver the manufactured goods, whereupon we witnessed the denunciation of the "Procotol" by Argentina, and the resignation and exile of its principal defender, Senor Miranda.

Despite this fiasco, Suance's influence on Franco and his personal intervention in the economic problems of the country have increased.

INI was converted into a state economic monopoly, competing dangerously with private interests in the economy. Nothing could be done in Spain without Suances' approval. Purchase of raw materials broad, capital investments at home, decisions regarding the new business, were determined, not by private enterprise or by the necessities of the country, but by the arbitrary fiat of the new economic czar.

ONCE QUIT

One incident in 1941 made the grave conflict between private enterprise and INI explode. On May 19, the Cabinet discussed the distribution of properties belonging to the Allgemeine Elektrische Gesselschaft. Two groups of private industrialists and financiers from Bilbao and Barcelona, the two largest economic centers in Spain, presented justified demands which were supported by the Ministry of Finance and its minister, Senor Benjumea. Suances asked that AEG be absorbed by the state through his INI. Franco's entire Cabinet opposed Suances. Franco himself remained silent when Suances tendered his resignation.

The news of the resignation of Goering's disciple was received, according to Arno Dosch Fluerot, of the Christian Science Monitor, "with open rejoicing, especially in the business cities of Bilbao and Barcelona. One of the biggest industrialists of Spain put it: 'We were all ready to hoist our banners and celebrate our liberation.'"

Franco's silence regarding Suances' resignation and his speech delivered at the opening of the Madrid Agricultural Fair 7 days afterward, in which he stated that "Spain had to return to its traditional economy," made it look as though Suances' hour had finally come.

But the illusion was short-lived. A few days later, on June 3, Franco attended the closing of the national engineering congress, also held in Madrid, and emphatically announced that "economic liberalism had been the cause of Spain's decadence" and that the country needed a planned economy.

After the speech, which constituted a declaration of solidarity with Suances' totalitarian ideas, the latter's influence increased considerably in Spain.

Here are a few examples of how INI is systematically destroying private enterprise in Spanish industry.

A private automobile factory, the property of the Catalan industrialist, Eugenio Cortes (Eucort), announced its bankruptcy in Barcelona and the loss of 30,000,000 pesetas. At the same time, the creation of a new automobile factory in Madrid, subsidized by INI with an initial capital of 600,000,000 pesetas, was announced.

The private bank, Tusquets, a traditional institution in the Catalan economy, announced the closing of its doors, due to the state's failure to help out in the crisis produced by the government-decreed deflation of credits.

The Banco-Hispano-Colonial, Catalonia's commercial bank, was absorbed by the Banco Central, one of the big five in Spain.

INI subsidized the creation of the cotton industry in the Andalusian zone of Malaga and created internal revenues for the shipment of almonds to the Catalan manufacturing center of Reus—two mortal blows dealt to two branches of production entirely in the hands of private enterprise.

Regarding the Basque section of the country, another large production center, Sam Pope Brewer writes (the New York Times, June 10):

"The present steel industry in the Basque country of northern Spain will suffer because the new project (INI steel factories in the Asturias), like any other that is controlled by the INI, will get preferential treatment and that, though uneconomic itself, will force out the existing prosperous companies."

This implies that Suances practices a policy of "industrialization" which really consists of deindustrialization as far as Catalonia and Euzkadi are concerned.

Why? Because these two centers, the decided champions of liberal economy and political democracy, are the two principal obstacles to Suances' totalitarian plan, and of his principal supporter, Generalissimo Franco. For this reason, with the help of the Germans, Catalonia's President Luis Companys was shot. For this reason, Franco prohibits the profoundly Christian Basque country from using its own language in their prayers and on their tombstones.

The Catalan and the Basque private economies—and their political demands for decentralization and democracy—are now the two principal obstacles on the road to the totalitarian and parasitical industrialization of Spain. American aid to Franco would only speed the march toward economic statism.

Propaganda Is Franked: Public Pays

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, in a recent issue of a newspaper published in the interests of cooperatives, there appeared a very timely article which I think the people of the State of Nebraska and the other States of the Union may be interested extremely in reading.

This article deals with certain matters relating to the activities of the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities, to uncover abuses of the franking privileges of Congressmen by reactionary lobbying organizations, and specifically calls attention to the fact that the ultimate objectives of this lobbying probe were ninefold.

By way of introduction to the article itself there appeared a cartoon styled "Sh-h-h! No fair asking questions" and it pictured seated in a small chair with improvised stumpy legs and arms, a giant money bag tied tightly, puckerstring wise, at the top. On the lighted face of this money bag was a huge dollar sign and underneath this dollar sign were the large capitalized words "Propaganda Funds" and immediately beneath these words were two closely set eyes resembling those of a pig, an indented nose, a fish-like mouth, and a stubby index finger placed at right angles with the center of the mouth, which was meant to indicate that silence was demanded on the part of a member of the Lobby Committee who faced this brutish monster and held in his hand a large sign upon which appeared the words "Investigation of Lobbying Activities."

In the past it has been bombastically asserted, in high, low, and intermediate places alike, throughout America that to ask these lobbying groups or their personnel any questions about their entire lobby-business activities was an invasion of their constitutional rights. The persons who make these assertions in my opinion, do not know any more about constitutional law than a hog does about a clean shirt.

Just why such a legally besmirched character as Edward A. Rumely is so sacrosanct that he cannot be questioned about his full lobbying activities, or the doings of his organization, is difficult for any sane person in our land to understand. Just why such personages as Mr. Rumely and his ilk cannot be asked questions by means of a questionnaire, which they may answer or not answer as they see fit, could be determined to be a violation of any constitutional rights, as one high church dignitary recently claimed, is still harder to understand, unless one is willing to state as a fact that the mere asking of a question by mail of any person is also invading a constitutional right. I feel that good, practical common sense, dictates that no constitutional right whatsoever was violated by Mr. Buchanan's committee in sending out their letter of inquiry, and I am sure that no person with even the faintest comprehension of rights guaranteed under the Constitution of the United States would or could so claim.

The article which I have reference to is as follows:

PROPAGANDA IS FRANKED: PUBLIC PAYS—LOBBY COMMITTEE UNCOVERS HUGE MAILINGS BY CCG—4-YEAR COST: $300,000

You foot the bill for distributing the propaganda of the Committee for Constitutional Government whether you like it or not, according to evidence uncovered by the House committee investigating lobbying in Washington. This is how it works.

Congressmen elected and paid by the taxpayers to carry on the Nation's business are given the privilege to mail free: copies of their speeches, the Congressional Record or any part of it, all public documents published by order of Congress, and official correspondence. The name of the Senator or Representative appears on the envelope together with the word "Free."

At least five Members of Congress have turned their mail-franking privilege over to CCG for free mailing of its propaganda. In the past 4 years, free mailing for this one lobby, according to committee evidence, has cost the American taxpayers between $240,000 and $300,000.

ON LOBBY PAYROLLS

Investigation by Benedict F. FitzGerald, chief counsel for the committee, shows that a Congressman not only allows CCG to use his franking privileges but also is on its payroll. He is paid $350 a month for a regular column, according to Edward A. Rumely, executive secretary of CCG. The column is then mailed free under his frank.

Rumely, who was convicted as a German agent in World War I and later pardoned, testified that during the past 4 years CCG has sent out 8 to 10 million pieces of mail under the free mailing privileges of Senators and Representatives.

The House lobby investigating committee began hearings in January in an attempt to ferret out pressure groups of all kinds. To make lobbying just as public as fish in a glass bowl, the committee created shortly before Congress adjourned in 1949, is inquiring about:

OBJECTS OF PROBE

1. Lobbying activities by unregistered persons or organizations.
2. Undisclosed receipts or expenditures by lobbyists and lobby organizations.
3. Undisclosed interests behind lobbyists and lobby organizations.
4. Methods of soliciting or obtaining funds for lobby activities.
5. Methods of expending funds for lobby activities.
6. Practices and abuses of lobbyists and lobby organizations.
7. Specific lobbyists and lobby organizations whose activities warrant detailed study and investigation.
8. Practices and abuses of Government officers or employees in regard to lobbying.
9. Specific Government departments, agencies, officers, or employes whose lobbying activities warrant detailed study and investigation.

Zionists Honor President Truman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, it was my great privilege to attend at the White House today with Mr. Benjamin G. Browdy, the president of the Zionist Organization of America and a noted industrialist from my home Borough of Brooklyn. The occasion was the presentation to President Truman of the annual award of the Zionist Organization of America, as directed by a resolution unanimously approved at its fifty-third national convention, held in Chicago, July 1–4, 1950.

The award was given to President Truman in recognition of his contribution to human welfare, his untiring efforts for democracy and peace, his fight for the cause of civil rights, and his historic role in founding the State of Israel and the aid he has given Israel since it was established more than 2 years ago. For all his efforts and zeal for these causes President Truman has truly earned for himself the title "The first citizen of the world."

Needless to add, that the President was very pleased to receive this award. In accepting it, the President reiterated his profund belief in the eventual establishment of a truly permanent world-wide peace, toward which he will continue to exert his every effort. Since Mr. Browdy is leaving for a short trip to Israel on Friday of this week, the President asked him to pay his respects to President Chaim Weizmann and Prime Minister David Ben Gurion of Israel.

The award is in the form of a large silver plaque, beautifully inscribed. The text is as follows:

THE ZIONIST ORGANIZATION OF AMERICA
presents this award to
HARRY S. TRUMAN
President of the United States in grateful recognition and heartfelt appreciation of his invaluable contribution to human welfare . . . his untiring efforts to advance the ideals and traditions of democracy everywhere . . . his incomparable leadership in resisting aggression everywhere throughout the world . . . his zealous and never-ending work for permanent world-wide peace . . . his unyielding devotion to the cause of Civil Rights in America and of equality of opportunity to all, regardless of race, color, and creed . . . his never-to-be-forgotten part in founding the State of Israel, in its prompt recognition as a member of the family of nations, and in laying the cornerstone of its political and economic security . . . by all of which he has earned for himself, according to our deepest conviction, the title of

The First Citizen of the World

In testimony whereof we have affixed our signatures, by order of the Executive Committee and the National Administrative Council, this 30th day of August 1950.

BENJAMIN G. BROWDY, President.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, August 30, 1950

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, in the July 1950 issue of the magazine named "UAW-CIO Ammunition," published by the International Union of the United Automobile, Aircraft, and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, of which Walter P. Reuther is the president, contained an article which is a sort of a miniature who's who in fascism in the United States, and which article I feel is of great importance to the people of the State of Nebraska and every other State in the Union.

This is especially true when one stops to consider that there is to be elected this fall, from all of the States of the United States, 435 Members of the House of Representatives, and in many of the States, candidates for the Senate will be elected also.

Since about 84 percent of the press of the United States, as I have been reliably informed may be properly listed in the Reactionary column, and no chance is afforded the voters in many instances to learn about some things which the reactionary Press of the Nation do not wish to have publicized, I feel that it would be in the interest of the people of this Republic to be given the information in part, at least, as disclosed in the article appearing on pages 7 to 12 of the aforementioned magazine.

It is my earnest hope that this information may be brought to the attention of every voter in the Union because it is so important that they know and evaluate properly, some of the forces which are endeavoring to influence the voters in the next national election. I feel that the Democratic Congressional losses in several of the States were due entirely to the fact that the personal history of the men running the Fascist propaganda mills of the nation which took part in those elections, were not brought directly to the attention of the people, and it is my earnest hope that some means may be devised by the liberals who work for reactionary newspapers, which I understand are about 90 percent of the employees, may find a way to get this information and other information into the proper channels where the voters may have full and free access to it.

The article I have reference to is as follows:

NEITHER THE RICH NOR THE CORPORATIONS SPARE THEIR TAX EXEMPTIONS

America's future: One of the subsidiary propaganda organizations of Mervin Hart's Committee for Constitutional Government. It sponsors a radio program called Americans Speak Up, which is carried as a "public service" by 80 radio stations in 30 States and the District of Columbia. A fund-raising telegram for this organization started since America First went berserk.

Robert Lund, Listerine millionaire and sachem in the NAM, who has been associated with almost every Fascist organization started since America First went berserk.

Ragnar Hummell, Texas cement manufacturer.

J. Howard Pew, Pennsylvania oil millionaire and shipbuilder, who is the financial mainstay of the Republican Party in Pennsylvania and contributor to election campaigns on the side of reaction in places like Florida, North and South Dakota, and anywhere else money can tip over a liberal.

Charles R. Hook, steel company executive.

Edward F. Hutton, Wall Street broker, also on the directing board of most Fascist organizations, and leading figure in the Freedom Foundation, which has Valley Forge as its address and which awards prizes each year for the best "free enterprise" propaganda.

Lammot DuPont, one of the oldest and weirdest DuPont brothers.

American Medical Association: The closed-shop union of doctors in the United States, which assesses doctors $25 a year to lobby against a national-health program for the American people. As part of its campaign it is working with the National Association of Real Estate Boards, the Committee for Constitutional Government, and similar organizations. It cooperated with these organizations in forming the National Committee to Limit Federal Taxing Powers. Edward Rumely, testifying before the House Lobbying Committee, declared that several State medical associations had bought copies of the John T. Flynn book, The Road Ahead, and distributed it. Marquis Childs, quoted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, declared the AMA had distributed 1,000,000 copies of this book. The AMA, which reported lobbying expenditures of $1,500,000 in 1949, now operates the biggest lobby slush fund in the United States.

Barger, Harry: Washington lobbyist for the National Economic Council (one of the organizations run by Mervin K Hart, self-confessed Fascist and letter-writing crony of two of the oldest and wierdest DuPonts). At the same time Barger was a paid lobbyist for the National Economic Council he was employed by Republican Representatives.

Benson, George: A "doctor" who is president of a nonaccredited "college" at Searcy, Ark. With funds contributed by Allis-Chalmers, General Motors, and other big corporations, Harding College produces movies, turnover talks, and radio programs in Hollywood that emphasize how harmful it is for workers to get wage increases, how health insurance is communistic, and how the Fair Deal, the British Labor Government, and Russian communism are identical. Through a tie-up with the big movie companies the films are shown as shorts in many theaters. Radio stations broadcast the radio programs as public service presentations. GM, Allis-Chalmers, and other corporations force their workers to listen to the turn-over talk presentations. A speech by Benson was run into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and reprinted and franked around the country by the Committee for Constitutional Government. The speech made the point that the more education people have, the more crime and the more communism you have. Benson opposes Federal aid to education.

Books: Books distributed by the Committee for Constitutional Government include:

Why the Taft-Hartley Law, by Irving G. McCann.

Compulsory Medical Care, by Melchior Palyi.

The Road Ahead, by John T. Flynn.

Constitution of the United States, by Thomas James Norton.

Hunter's Revolution.

Labor Monopolies or Freedom, by John Scoville.

Book sales by the Committee for Constitutional Government have fallen off substantially since the committee's activities have had some light put on them.

Committee for Constitutional Government: Now being investigated by the House Lobbying Committee. According to congressional reports it spent more money for lobbying than any other United States organization except the American Medical Association. It spent $620,632 in 1949 against AMA's $1,500,000. Has spent $5,500,000 in 7 years. Irenee du Pont gave the organization $11,000 in 1949. Other contributors included J. Howard Pew and Edward F. Hutton, Wall Street broker and America Firster. Claims people we have inspired helped defeat in the last elections a Florida and North Carolina Senator. Distributed 60,000 copies of John T. Flynn book, The Road Ahead, in North Carolina during campaign.

Two basic techniques: (1) to publish anti-labor, probig business books, and persuade rich men and corporations to buy them and distribute them to schools, libraries, churches, and newspapers throughout the country (Rumely, acting head of the outfit, gets 4 percent commission on every book sold; field agents of the outfit get up to 10 percent on every book sold).

(2) To get reactionary Congressmen to read speeches it prepares into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and then to get reprints from the RECORD and mail them out by the freight carload free over the signatures of the Congressmen.

Dresser, R. B: National Republican Committeeman from Rhode Island, power in National Association of Manufacturers decisions, who asked Edward Rumely what the NAM ought to do to pass the twenty-second amendment to the Constitution to lower taxes on the rich. Rumely told him to keep the NAM out of sight. In November 1948, Dresser prodded Rumely to get the Committee for Constitutional Government working harder against reenactment of a rent-control law. Besides Dresser's coordinating activity, other evidence which reveals the NAM tie-up with the Committee for Constitutional Government (in addition to the interlocking officers and powers) is the distribution by NAM of the Flynn book, The Road Ahead.

Du Pont, Irénée and Lammot: Two of the oldest and weirdest members of the du Pont family, whose private empire included substantial holdings in the General Motors Corp., the du Pont Co., United States Rubber, Remington Rand, and substantial chunks of the rest of America.

Irénée and Lammot are the chief financial backers of both the Committee for Constitutional Government and the National Economic Council, through the letters in the possession of the House Lobby Committee seem to indicate that the brothers du Pont are under the hypnotic sway of Mervin K. Hart, of the National Economic Council, at the moment.

Records show up $24,000 they gave to the National Economic Council in 1945–47. In 1948–49, Irénée put up $22,000 more.

Lammot, when asked to solicit 100 to 200 leading American corporations for the National Economic Council, refused, because, "I cannot individually solicit contributions from corporations when I well know that the company with which I have spent most of my working life, namely, the du Pont Co., in all probability will not comply."

Irénée's letters to Mervin Hart did not show such sensitivity. They dealt with the details of getting tax exemptions. In one case, when Irénée thoughtlessly made a contribution which could not be deducted, he got into a long correspondence that ended up with Hart agreeing to falsify his records to make the tax saving for Irénée.

Flynn, John T.: Former New Republic editor, who once wrote brilliant articles and books demonstrating the necessity of most of the legislation for which the Fair Deal stands today. Originally sincerely opposed to war, he took a violent dislike to President Roosevelt, and gradually shifted over to become a violent Roosevelt hater.

He began his journey toward the Fascist madness by joining America First, and as each of his books attacking Roosevelt has come out, he has moved farther and farther away from his first principles.

His the Road Ahead, which has now become the most effective publication of the propaganda cartel, has been distributed in the millions of copies by the extremely rabid rich.

Franking privilege: United States Representatives and Senators under the law may send letters through the mail free if the letters carry their signatures in the upper right-hand corner. This franking privilege is supposed to be used only to send out mail in connection with the Congressmen's official duties.

The Committee for Constitutional Government, the National Economic Council, and the other organizations in the propaganda cartel, get Congressmen to send out cartel propaganda over their franks.

In 1949 the Committee for Constitutional Government admitted that it sent out 2,853,000 pieces of mail free, with 2,450,000 pieces going out over the frank.

Over 4 years the eight to ten million pieces of free mail admitted to have been sent over congressional franks have cost taxpayers between $240,000 and $300,000. Actually House Lobbying Committee investigators believe more than 50,000,000 pieces of mail have been sent out.

The free-mail racket was discovered when CIO Housing Committee Director Leo Goodman lost his way in the basement of the Capitol one night and stumbled on enough of the franked free mail to fill a freight car.

Fruehauf, Harvey: Of the Fruehauf Trailer Co., long-time antiunion employer, many-time violator of the National Labor Relations law, who sent out a money appeal on behalf of the Committee for Constitutional Government, in which he said the Committee for Constitutional Government "was second only to the National Association of Manufacturers in getting what it wanted from Congress."

Gannett, Frank: Millionaire publisher of a string of 21 newspaper and farm magazine, who put up the money for the Committee for Constitutional Government when it was formed in 1937 as the National Committee To Uphold the Constitution. Testified before a House of Representatives committee in 1944 that the Committee for Constitutional Government was spending $300,000 a year to protect free enterprise and to smear the New Deal. Told the House of Representatives committee that up until 1944 the Committee for Constitutional Government had put out 60,000,000 pieces of literature opposing the New Deal.

Hart, Mervin K.: President of the National Economic Council. A self-confessed Fascist, he also has a grade label from the Americanism committee of the Illinois American Legion, which called him a native Fascist.

He's a key guy because of his intimate relationship with Irénée and Lammot du Pont, which assures him almost unlimited funds, and which at the same time enables him to hit up other millionaires in the country with the Du Pont seal of approval.

In 1940, he declared that, "I wonder sometimes if one of the causes of our trouble today does not arise from the fact that we have been overdrilled into believing we are a democracy."

He told the House Lobby Committee that the Supreme Court should be abolished because the Justices are all Socialists and that they should be barred from holding judicial office.

A powerful money raiser, his letters to the Du Ponts show how he operates. First, he promoted dough from Lammot du Pont. On the strength of that he hit up Irénée du Pont. Then with the Du Ponts in the bag, he got them to write letters to their pals asking them to contribute. As contributions came in, he wrote to the Du Ponts about them to see if he couldn't promote some extra change by exciting their sense of competition.

To give them something to contribute for, he

1. Showed the Du Ponts how they could contribute and pay for their contributions out of their taxes.

2. Changed the records of his organization to enable Irénée du Pont to take a tax deduction Hart's records showed he wasn't entitled to.

3. Proposed that Irénée du Pont finance additional lobbying in Washington.

4. Suggested the Du Ponts pay an organizer to set up Fascist Fives, committees of five men in each community, to work on school boards, churches, colleges. They will serve as a nucleus around which perhaps a score or two of men can presently be gathered to fight for things that are American.

5. Hoped that the Du Ponts pay for canned editorial service to go to country papers, for a speakers' bureau, and for a service which would help people write letters to newspapers.

Besides milking the Du Ponts, Hart runs the half dozen or so organizations connected with the National Economic Council.

Interlocking directorate: The American Medical Association and the real-estate lobby are new recruits to the propaganda cartel that has grown up out of the night soil of America First, the National Economic Council, and the Committee for Constitutional Government.

Now all these organizations are linked together in the National Committee to Limit Federal Taxing Powers. But before the new recruits came in the propaganda cartel outfits were closely linked up with the National Association of Manufacturers and with each other.

Three directors of the Committee for Constitutional Government are also directors of the National Economic Council.

Their personnel are woven back and forth through these organizations (among others):

American Enterprise Association.

America's Future.

Constitution and Free Enterprise Foundation.

Foundation for Economic Education.

Fighters for Freedom.

Public Affairs Institute (not the Public Affairs Committee, which is legitimately concerned with public affairs).

Spiritual Mobilization.

National Council of Profit-Sharing Industries.

How and why they operate is explained by Lammot du Pont, one of the weirdest and oldest Du Ponts, who wrote to C. O. Hodges, vice president of the American Cast Iron Pipe, of Birmingham, Ala., on February 7, 1949 (and sent a copy of the letter to Mervin K. Hart: "To do anything in the way of public education, sound views have to be put in a form that the public will read more or less inadvertently * * * that is one of the reasons why a multiplicity of organizations, such as Spiritual Mobilization, the Foundation for Economic Education, and the National Council of Profit-Sharing Industries is effective, rather than wasteful. Each one appeals to a certain area, but no one appeals to all of them. I think the National Economic Council has a certain audience * * * it acts as a catalyst on the other organizations and people."

Kamp, Joseph: Executive vice president of the Constitutional Educational League, who has been in the hate racket since 1919. He is now serving a 4-month jail sentence for refusing to give any facts about his organization to another congressional committee that was conducting an investigation of propaganda activities 6 years ago. The Supreme Court just refused to hear his appeal.

Kamp has also refused to answer questions for the Buchanan committee.

Kamp's materials, which are anti-Semitic and anti-Negro, used to turn up every time wage earners tried to organize in unions. Now they circulate chiefly in the South during union campaigns.

King, Williford I.: Chairman of the Committee for Constitutional Government, a retired New York University economics professor, who for many years has appeared before congressional committees to testify against minimum wage laws, unions, taxes on the rich, rent controls. In an article which appeared in the Sentinel, a newsletter of the Committee for Constitutional Government, he declared that the country should "sacrifice the privilege of knowing how our Representatives vote." What is needed, he said, is an "electric machine that would record the total and nothing else." By this method, he said, it would be possible to get a Congress that would vote against unemployment compensation.

Millionaires: Prized possession of the Committee for Constitutional Government is a list of 10,171 millionaires to whom it sends fund-raising letters, sometimes over the signatures of people like two of the oldest and weirdest Du Ponts, Irénée and Lammot. The committee also has another list of 8,000 persons who have from $500,000 to a million bucks in their bank accounts.

National Committee To Limit Federal Taxing Powers: A superlobby which includes the National Associatiaon of Real Estate Boards, National Republican Roundup Committee, Southern States Industrial Council, American Retail Federation, National Tax Equality League (phony small-business organization, financed by big business, which the lobbying committee showed propagandizes against cooperatives), Conference on American Small Business Organizations, Optimists International, and the American Medical Association.

This organization was formed to pass the twenty-second amendment to the Constitution, which would reduce the taxes of the rich and cripple the Government. The amendment was originally dreamed up by the Committee for Constitutional Government. The promise of lower taxes in this amendment was used as sucker bait to get the rich to support the Committee for Constitutional Government. Important organization because it shows how the AMA, the Real Estate Lobby, and the crack-brain propaganda cartel all work together.

Lobbying law: Propaganda cartels conceal their activities in many ways.

Some important methods:

1. Under the Federal law applying to lobbies, they must report all contributions of $500 or more. To get around this, the Committee for Constitutional Government asks that contributors give it $490. Then no names are filed.

2. Supporters of these organizations kick in dough by buying the publications of the organizations and giving them away. Sales don't have to be reported, contributions do.

3. By organizing stooge organizations, the propaganda cartels make it possible for some of their organizations to operate without any Government supervision. Thus the Foundation for Economic Education supplies distortions to the National Economic Council, the real-estate lobby, and the entire network. But since it does no lobbying, and operates as a nonprofit research organization, it can set itself up so that donations to it are tax-exempt and so that no report to Congress need be made of its income. The Foundation for Economic Education has a $300,000 annual budget which is supplied to if by Chrysler, Du Pont, Ford, General Motors, Libby-Owens-Ford, GE, Standard Oil of New Jersey, Champion Spark Plug, Auto-Lite, Nash-Kelvinator, and similar companies, including many so-called charity foundations.

National Economic Council: Mervin K. Hart's propaganda meal tickets, the coordinating center for a half dozen other reactionary propaganda mills.

The National Economic Council:

1. Supplies speeches to reactionary persons.

2. Agitates the very rich about the dangers of socialism, communism, and the handout state.

3. Gets them in a state of mind where they cooperate in the legislative programs of the corporation personalities who stand behind these activities.

4. Prepares and distributes misleading reactionary materials and news letters to schools, key community people, newspapers, magazines, and radio.

5. Acts as a central clearing house for all the specialized propaganda centers (which operate masked as research organizations, tax organizations, religious organizations, and so on).

In 4 years the National Economic Council collected and spent $500,000 that it reported. Among the contributors to it have been the Du Ponts; General Robert Wood, of Sears-Roebuck; Donaldson Brown, vice president of GM, and the Judge Armstrong Foundation (the Texas oil millionaire's foundation which tried to give a small Mississippi college millions of dollars if it would dedicate itself to anti-Semitic and anti-Negro principles—the college refused).

Other recent contributors have been the Bucyrus Erie Co., J. I. Case, Carter Carburetor, and Joseph Grundy, of the Pennsylvania Republican Party and the Pennsylvania Manufacturers Association.

Two special contributors: a charity, no less, which operates tax free, the Volker Charities Fund, of Kansas City, Kans.

The other contributor, Beech Aircraft, of Wichita, Kans., which gave $5,998.65, 1 cent for each share of stock outstanding. Across the face of the check was written: "Payment for work in opposing socialism and communism in America, and for the maintenance and strengthening of American private enterprise, private property, and individual initiative."

It is worth noting that the country outside the United States where the National Economic Council's publications are circulated widely, is the Union of South Africa, where racial tensions are more dangerous than anywhere in the world and a kind of semi-Nazi government is in power.

Nelson, Herbert U.: 'Twenty-five thousand dollars a year executive vice president of the National Association of Real Estate Boards. Probably the man who is due most of the discredit for crippling public housing, eliminating the section of the last housing law which would have enabled self-supporting people to buy decent homes; for hooking up pipelines into the Federal Treasury to enrich real estate racketeers, and for watering down rent control.

In a letter to H. T. Maenner, of Omaha, Nebr., on May 31, 1949, he described his activities and his principles, "I do not believe in democracy. I think it stinks."

Spark plug in the new National Committee to Limit Federal Taxing Powers, he has long worked intimately with the NAM and the propaganda cartel.

In the letter to Maenner, for example, he said: "* * * favors we have had from other great associations, especially the NAM, are matters which cannot be discussed but which have built up our organization in many intangible ways."

Peale, Norman Vincent: Former secretary of the Committee for Constitutional Government, who still free-lances down the same side of the street. When the American Guard was organized in Anderson, Ind., by key personnel in the General Motors Delco-Remy and Guide Lamp plants for the purpose of taking over both the Democratic and Republican Parties, Peale was invited in to speak to American Guard meetings. The American Guard is also a pumping station for John T. Flynn's The Road Ahead.

Questionnaire: To get information for its investigation into lobbying, the House Lobbying Committee sent questionnaires asking for basic information about lobbying activities to 166 American corporations that were known to have engaged in lobbying, to the CIO, the AFL, and to Edward Rumely's Committee for Constitutional Government, Mervin K. Hart's National Economic Council, and Joseph Kamp's Constitutional and Educational League.

The CIO, the AFL, and most of the 166 corporations replied promptly, but two corporations, Inland Steel and Southern California Edison, have refused to supply information.

Rumely and Kamp have also refused to comply with the House committee request. Hart has answered some questions, balked at others.

The Colonel McCormick newspaper combine also displayed alarm that something damaging might be uncovered. Both the Chicago Tribune and the New York Daily News trumpeted for help in shutting off the light that is being thrown on the propaganda cartel's activities.

Reader's Digest: Key publication in the propaganda cartel. When The Road Ahead, by John T. Flynn, was summarized in the Reader's Digest, the Committee for Constitutional Government sent out 4,000,000 post cards urging people to be sure and read it. It supplied additional reprints in the millions for distribution by corporations and rich men.

Organizations slandered in the book, attempting to reply to the false charges in The Road Ahead, were brushed off and not given space to reply by Reader's Digest.

In the same way, the National Association of Real Estate Boards got the Reader's Digest to print a dishonest attack on rent control called No Vacancies. Then a stooge organization of the Committee for Constitutional Government, the Foundation for Economic Freedom, had 5,000,000 copies of this article run off as a reprint from the Reader's Digest and mailed them all over the United States. The article was also reprinted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

In advertising the Flynn book, The Road Ahead, Reader's Digest quoted the New York Times as saying, "One of the two most important books about the contemporary scene that we will have this year." But it left out the rest of the Times' statement, which went on to say the two books were important because "they are the latest and most extreme manifestation of an endemic hysteria presently affecting a considerable segment of our population."

Rumely, Edward A.: Twenty-five thousand a year executive vice president of the Committee for Constitutional Government. Jailed during First World War as agent of German Government. Given $1,000,000 by German Government to buy New York paper to spread German propaganda. Closely associated with Ku Klux Klan.

Schools and colleges: Particular target of the propaganda cartel has been the school system.

Writing to Irénée du Pont on June 3, 1947, Mervin K. Hart, president of the National Economic Council, said:

"We are having a list prepared of all the colleges, universities, and public libraries and Protestant churches in the United States."

The college, school, and Protestant church list served a double purpose. It propagandized very important community leaders and at the same time it enabled the propaganda cartel to be financed at the expense of the United States Treasury.

If, instead of making a direct contribution, the Du Ponts purchased books from the propaganda cartel and gave them to schools, the cost of the books could then be deducted from their taxes.

The propaganda cartel officials got a profit off the propaganda, which financed their activities. The schools and churches were propagandized. The Du Ponts, among others, paid for these activities out of their tax deductions.

In this way the Committee for Constitutional Government sent 10,000 copies of its book on the Constitution of the United States to Fordham University, 3,500 to Notre Dame, 2,700 to Georgetown, 2,200 to Yale, 6,000 to the University of Miami in Florida, and 4,000 to the Lincoln Memorial University in Tennessee. Five thousand copies of this book were distributed through the parochial schools in Detroit.

On January 16, 1948, Lammot du Pont approved a list of libraries, colleges, and churches to which he had ordered National Economic Council publications sent.

On March 7, 1949, Constance Grier, librarian of the University City Public Library in Missouri, wrote to Mervin K. Hart to thank him for the National Economic Council publications. The complacency of people toward socialism, she said, is distressing. To overcome it, she was displaying the publications on the magazine rack of the library.

Scoville, John: Former chief economist for Chrysler, now dead, who began working for the Committee for Constitutional Government in 1937. His book, Labor Monopolies or Freedom, calling for the destruction of labor unions, has been widely distributed by the Committee for Constitutional Government. Hanging the snide phrase, labor monopoly, on unions is supposed to have been his idea. He is also supposed to have invented the phrase, court-packing, as a trick to fight President Roosevelt's proposal that the Supreme Court be brought up to date. Of the union movement he said, "the evil thing must be rooted out."

Tax evasions and possible frauds: On January 12, 1949, Mervin K. Hart, of the National Economic Council, wrote to Irenee Du-Pont, "* * * we have altered our records to conform to what we know was your desire, namely, that the proceeds of the Phillips Petroleum stock, as well as the $2,000 for which you sent your check, were intended to purchase subscriptions."

The alteration probably saved Irenee Du-Pont in income taxes very nearly the amount of his contribution.

If he paid considerably less than the price for which the Phillips Petroleum stock was sold, he saved more than the amount of the contribution, so that he actually made money over his donation (at the expense of the Federal Government).

Stock manipulations offer the rich many possibilities for tax evasions, but in the propaganda cartel there are activities which would bring people less rich very near one of Uncle Sam's stone mansions.

1. Contributions to the phony foundations sponsored by the National Economic Council are checked off by the rich on their income taxes as contributions to educational and charitable organizations. Essentially these activities, however, are neither educational nor charitable (where is the charity in a propaganda and lobbying campaign for race hatred and tax exemptions for the rich?).

2. The support of organizations like the Committee for Constitutional Government and the National Economic Council by buying books from them and giving the books to educational institutions (that never asked for them) enables the rich to avoid paying income taxes.

3. To make a narrow point—the cost of printing and distributing John Flynn's book The Road Ahead, is being paid for by taxpayers through tax avoidance.

This book says the Fair Deal is more dangerous than communism, and that the Federal Council of Churches is Communist for all practical purposes.

SLITHERING SEQUENCE OF FUNDS AND FRANKS

Here is how General Motors ($50,000 contribution), Chrysler ($40,000), the du Pont Co. ($40,000), and the phony tax-evading foundations set up by Sloan ($20,000), Kresge ($15,000), and the other big rich operate the Foundation for Economic Education (also tax exempt).

In September 1946, two college professors were hired by the foundation to do a job on rent control.

They prepared a pamphlet called "Roofs or Ceilings," which made the argument that rent ceilings created the housing shortage.

These pamphlets were distributed by the National Association of Real Estate Boards.

Then John Scoville, of the Committee for Constitutional Government (and former chief economist at Chrysler), took the material and rewrote it.

The Scoville edition was handed to a former president of the NAM by the Committee for Constitutional Government Washington representative.

The next time the Scoville piece appeared was in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Then 500,000 reprints from the RECORD were made and sent out all over the country free (at your expense).

Twenty-second amendment to the Constitution: The Committee for Constitutional Government proposal that would limit Federal taxes to 15 percent of the aggregate annual individual incomes in the United States Effect of the law would be to reduce the taxes of the rich and to cripple the Federal Government. Endorsements of this amendment were slipped through 17 State legislatures before anyone woke up to what was happening. Then five States rescinded their action. Now the National Committee to Limit Federal Taxing Powers has been formed to push the amendment again. The AMA is interested because the amendment would make the passage of a national health program impossible.

UXYZ: The information in this alphabet comes chiefly from the hearings conducted by the House Lobbying Committee. Other sources were speeches of Representatives.

Essentially this information reveals that special interests which profit from monopolizing some particular economic activity (real estate, cement, medical care) have combined with the National Association of Manufacturers and the huge corporations to form a super propaganda cartel.

They are self-confessed opponents of democracy and do not scruple to conspire to subvert the Government.

Like the Communists who held up Russian Government treasury trains to finance their revolution, these conspirators use money they chisel from the United States Government by tax evasion and franking abuses to carry on their reactionary revolution.

Employment of the Physically Handicapped

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MATTHEW M. NEELY
OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 31 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an address by Gov. Okey L. Patteson, of West Virginia, at the National Employ the Physically Handicapped Week meeting in Washington, D. C., August 9, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests and friends, it is a real inspiration to meet with you today, and to witness your enthusiasm and interest in this most worthwhile work. You are rendering one of the finest and most valuable services humanity has ever found in its heart to give—that of helping the handicapped to become taxpayers instead of tax consumers. I am deeply and vitally interested in the physically handicapped, and am always anxious to cooperate in every phase of this program.

The appeal to employ the physically handicapped should not be considered an emotional one. It is really sound business, because "ability" and not "disability" counts on a job; and business and labor surveys show that the handicapped worker is just as productive and dependable in his work habits and attendance record.

In view of my deep interest in the handicapped, I have worked very closely with the various departments and agencies which have charge of this program in my State. Therefore, I want to talk to you today about the past accomplishments and future plans for the expansion of this much-needed and most worthwhile program in West Virginia. I can assure you that I am very proud indeed of the physically handicapped record in our State.

Quite naturally, I do not in any way consider myself an authority on the subject of rehabilitation and selective placement work. However, I do know some of the problems, and attitudes of the men and women who have met with disabling accidents, and many of you present here today have actually experienced that first terrible shock—that feeling of doubt and uncertainty about the future. If this program had no other value than the fact that it fills so many of our citizens with hope for the future, then it would be priceless.

The rehabilitation of a man's outlook is just as important as rehabilitating his physical handicap. I shall never forget an experience which I had some years ago. I was called to a hospital to see a man of middle age who had lost both legs in a mine accident. He was the breadwinner of a large family, and had become very despondent because he felt that he could no longer support his family, and that he himself would be a liability to his wife and children. He felt that his family would be better off if he were out of the way. That thought preyed on his mind to such an extent that he actually attempted to commit suicide.

A visit and a heart-to-heart talk with this individual, convinced him that all he needed was the will power and determination to help himself, because, with the aid of rehabilitation he could again become the self-supporting head of his family. I am happy to report that today that man is a self-respecting, independent merchant, educating and supporting his family far better than he could have done as a day laborer, which he was before the loss of his legs.

We need to remember at all times that hope and confidence are most important. The disabled must be lifted from a state of despair to a hope-filled world. We must not measure our rehabilitation program in terms of tax returns and increased production alone. Most certainly these are important, and need to be emphasized, but human values are much more important. Please do not misunderstand me, because I do not advocate giving sympathy to the handicapped. In fact, the handicapped himself does not want sympathy. He just wants an opportunity to make an honest living for himself and his family, but, of course, he does need understanding and intelligent help.

That, then, brings us to the need for selective placement. Trained interviewers and counselors assure the employer that he will interview only the man who can do the job which is available. Selective placement permits us to do a dollar-and-cents job for the employers and the State, and at the same time help the individual in a material and humanitarian way. When the disabled veteran is as well qualified as a nonveteran, he receives preference, which, of course, is the established policy throughout the country. During the past 5 years, almost 10,000 West Virginians have been placed through the efforts of the West Virginia State Employment Service and the veterans' employment representative. Many of these persons were prepared for employment by the Veterans' Administration and the State rehabilitation division. The average number of rehabilitations per hundred thousand population is 35 for the Nation, and the number for West Virginia is 81, which proves that our State is doing an outstanding job in this field Furthermore, over 50 percent of the handicapped who have been employed during the past 5 years, have been disabled veterans.

This represents a sizable placement job in West Virginia, but actually gives only a partial picture of the result of the rehabilitation and placement program. It omits entirely the large number of persons who were hired by employers through their own efforts, and not through any of our public employment offices. Many employers hired the handicapped workers because of the fine educational campaign which was so ably carried on by each of you in this work.

The success of the national-employ-the-physically-handicapped program in West Virginia is due in a large measure to cooperation at the community level. Our Statewide efforts have been to stimulate the work of our local committees. One method which was used most effectively has been the building of keen competition for two annual awards—one, a large loving cup which is presented to the city with the best placement record; and the other a copper plaque presented for the best information program.

Some communities arouse interest by having what they term "kick off" banquets, which are held in cooperation with local industry, veterans, service clubs, civic leaders, public officials, management, and labor. The citations made to employers indicate increasing cooperation between labor and management in connection with the employment of the handicapped. Also, the cooperation between our rehabilitation service and the miners' welfare fund to help the severely disabled miner is most effective.

Another successful method employed in our State, which is also used by many other States, is the distribution of booklets listing qualifications and availability of the rehabilitated for employment. Also, the rehabilitated man is invited to civic club luncheons or dinners. Quite naturally, he is just introduced as a guest, but at the same time prospective employers are aware of the fact that he is available for employment. Some of our cities have staged national-employ-the-physically-handicapped parades, with bands and floats, which is found to be most effective in certain rural areas.

The American Legion awards an annual citation, which has been of invaluable aid in the over-all program. In addition thereto, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled American Veterans, and the AMVETS are now planning to sponsor various awards to spur the placement of disabled veterans. Quite naturally, it is important that the State government itself set an example in hiring the handicapped, and I have urged upon all my department heads the great importance of offering employment to the physically handicapped, whenever such person is qualified to fill a job that is vacant. A check of our personnel records reveals that there are a large number of physically handcapped now employed by our State government.

Added interest has been manifested in the national essay contest, due to the fact that the local employers have added worthwhile State prizes to the national prizes which were contributed by the Machinists' Union and Disabled American Veterans. We in West Virginia were quite proud last year when one of our boys, Howard Kite, won third prize in the national contest. Interest in this contest has more than doubled, as evidenced by some 200 entries which were submitted in 1950 by 40 high schools. This year, one employer in West Virginia sponsored a banquet for the presentation of awards to our State winners in the contest. This contest, together with our program of awards to outstanding employers, has aided materially in bringing about a year-round program in West Virginia. It is always hard to sustain the interest of the newspaper and radio in the same type of publicity, but the variety of news injected by the contest and awards, do help to keep the national employ and physically handicapped program before the public 52 weeks a year, instead of just concentrating on publicity for a week or so during each year.

Our West Virginia Rehabilitation Division has attracted national attention through expert rehabilitation services provided for a number of special groups, among which are the coal miners, the mentally handicapped, and the tubercular. Vocational rehabilitation, without doubt, is one of the major public services which ministers to the needs of the citizens of our State.

We are all quite proud of the work of the national employ the physically handicapped program in West Virginia. The 1949 record is indeed outstanding. However, there are many thousands more in our State who need to be rehabilitated, and many of the rehabilitated need jobs. Yes, there is much for us to do in our State, just as there is in yours.

If I were asked to give a formula to a State committee for success in the national employ the physically handicapped program, I believe I would suggest that you "direct more attention to the local community program, by helping to establish working committees of labor, management, veterans, public and civic leaders." If this program is working at the crossroads you will have no worries about it up here on Constitution Avenue.

Without doubt, one of the noblest things any person can do for his fellowman is to aid the unfortunate to help himself. We all know that we are never happier than when we render services to others. We cannot do a good deed for another, without becoming a better man—a happier man—a more contented man.

As I said, this program is of vital interest to me. I can assure you that some of the greatest thrills I have ever had in my life have come from helping those who have lost a limb, or are handicapped in some manner. To help a disabled person to obtain a job and become self-supporting and self-respecting brings happiness that I would not trade for anything else in the world.

I take my hat off to the industrial leaders who are beginning to recognize that this great reserve of partially disabled manpower can render invaluable service. If total war comes, our Nation will need every rehabilitated man and woman in America, and Uncle Sam will find them willing and able and eager to do their part to help keep and preserve the traditions of the greatest country on the face of God's green earth.

Tribute to James H. Ely by Hon. Edward Martin, of Pennsylvania

HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, August 31 (legislative day of Thursday, July 20), 1950

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a statement regarding a testimonial dinner on August 26, 1950, honoring James H. Ely, of Waynesburg, Pa., upon his retirement as grand master of Pennsylvania, Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senator MARTIN spoke at a testimonial dinner on August 26, 1950, honoring James H. Ely, of Waynesburg, upon his retirement as grand master of Pennsylvania Independent Order of Odd Fellows. Mr. Ely once served under Senator MARTIN as a member of the famous Twenty-eighth Division, which the Senator later commanded as major general.

In the course of his remarks, Senator MARTIN said:

"No matter how high the cost may be in suffering and sacrifice, the people of the United States must be ready to pay the price of victory if peace is to be restored on a lasting basis.

"Are we awake to the dangers?

"Are we aroused to the vital need of complete and total mobilization of all our strength in the cause of our flag and our Republic?

"Do our people understand that we may be plunged into another world war that could last for 20 years?

"Do they realize that babies born today may reach selective-service age before the menace of communism is crushed and defeated?

"Unfortunately, there has been a disposition in some quarters, official and otherwise, to regard the conflict in Korea as a small matter—just a border incident that will soon be over.

"But every casualty list from the blazing battle front proves how wrong they were.

"There is a tendency among some of our people to think that we can continue Government spending as usual, business as usual, and pleasure as usual.

"But I am convinced that such thinking is dangerous folly. I am convinced that the preservation of individual freedom in the United States and the future of the world depends upon American strength, American patriotism, and American sacrifice.

"We are facing a time when the highest patriotic principles must be called forth in defense of our country and our way of life.

"The Odd Fellows, for more than a century and a quarter, have preached and practiced 100-percent Americanism.

"Now is the time to intensify that patriotic activity. As an organization and as individuals you can wield powerful influence to alert every American to his full duty.

"I would like to offer some suggestions which, in my judgment, should be part of an American program:

"1. We should support universal military training to provide a well-trained reservoir of manpower for our armed services. If we are to preserve our Republic its wars must be fought by the people.

"2. We must have total mobilization of all our resources—labor, industry, agriculture and finance, and all our moral and spiritual strength.

"3. We must fight inflation by restricting credit and by placing controls on prices and on salaries and wages at the same time.

"4. All critical materials in short supply, needed for war production, should be placed on a rigid system of priorities and allocations.

"5. All Government spending, Federal, State, and local, not directly connected with national defense, should be reduced to the lowest possible level.

"6. As far as possible the cost of war should be paid out of current revenue. Otherwise we may lose our freedom of the individual, even though we win the war.

"7. We must stamp out law evasion, racketeering, black markets and profiteering.

"8. We must constantly teach the meaning of the American way of life.

"9. Those who prefer communism to Americanism should be deported if they are not citizens of the United States. If naturalized, their citizenship should be revoked. Native-born Communists should be placed where they cannot sabotage our military effort, our war production, or our schools and churches.

"10. We should work for a great spiritual awakening, based on the eternal truths of the Holy Bible. We must recognize that God stands at the portal of destiny.

"If all of us whole-heartedly support such a program it will serve notice on Joe Stalin that we really mean business. In my opinion that is the only way total war can be averted. Complete mobilization may persuade Russia to back down. Weakness is an invitation to further aggression.

"God-fearing, law-abiding Americans pray for Divine help and guidance. Communism denies God. It worships the State.

"We believe in the Fatherhood of God. In that faith lies our hope for lasting peace in the world."
